SEC. 30. Section 7 of the Child Nutrition Act of 1966 is amended by inserting after subsection (i) the following new subsection:

"(j) The Secretary shall conduct a study of the allocation formula and procedures under section 7 of the Child Nutrition Act of 1966. Such study shall provide information on State costs and contributions for administrative expenses, as well as the merits of a State matching requirement. The Secretary shall submit a report of such study to the Congress, together with any recommendations, by January 31, 1985.".

Page 26, line 15, strike out "and 29" and inset in lieu thereof "29, and 30".

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, I did not interrupt the reading, because I would have had to have read the amendment if the Clerk had not. It is self-explanatory. It is what we have just talked about.

Mr. Chairman, I yield to my committee chairman.

Mr. PERKINS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, we agree to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GOODLING).

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. PERKINS

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Montana (Mr. WILLIAMS) is not here, but he has a technical amendment which I will offer in his stead.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, in committee the gentleman from Montana (Mr. WILLIAMS) offered an amendment which was adopted which made children from families receiving food stamps automatically eligible for free lunches and simplifying the income verification for these children.

The Williams amendment today modifies that provision of the bill to make these same children also eligible for free breakfasts. That was the gentleman's original intent in the committee and this is the amendment that I am offering today.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. PERKINS).

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE OFFERED BY MR. BARTLETT

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by Mr. BARTLETT: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(1) in subsection (c)(2) by striking out "1984" and inserting in lieu thereof "1987";

(2) in subsection (g) by inserting "$1,471,000,000 for fiscal year 1985, $1,525,000,000 for fiscal year 1986, and $1,597,000,000 for fiscal year 1987" after "September 30, 1984,".

(3) in subsection (h)(1) by striking out "1984" and inserting in lieu thereof "1987".

(b) Section 7(i) of the Child Nutrition Act of 1963 is amended by striking out "1984" and inserting in lieu thereof "1987".

(c) Section 19(j)(2) of the Child Nutrition Act of 1966 is amended by striking out in the first sentence "1984" and inserting in lieu thereof "1987".

SEC. 2. (a) Section 13(p) of the National School Lunch Act is amended by striking out "1984" and inserting in lieu thereof "1987".

(b) Section 14(a) of the National School Lunch Act is amended by striking out "1984" and inserting in lieu thereof "1987".

Mr. BARTLETT (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, by offering this amendment in the nature of a substitute, I would return the House to the nexus of the debate on H.R. 7.

We have gone through a number of amendments during this debate. I would offer this amendment as an opportunity for Members to vote for current services funding of child nutrition programs and to reauthorize these programs in their exact format as contained in current law. This amendment, Mr. Chairman, would simply reauthorize the programs that are in this legislation—WIC, NET, State administrative expenses, summer feeding, and other programs.

This amendment would provide for the reauthorization of the current programs and the current law for an additional 3 years. It would allow for a continuation of services for the needy with inflation factored in; it would be a current services substitute so as to continue the same level of services.

The current services substitute does not include any of the provisions which were added in committee and which therefore add on costs to nutrition programs. This amendment would, for example, not raise the WIC authorization, does not raise the authorization for nutrition education training, and it does not attach H.R. 4091 to the bill. Let me pause at that point. It seems to this Member that it is the addition of H.R. 4091 that caused this bill to have less than bipartisan support when it came out of committee.

Now, some Members of this House voted for H.R. 4091 when it came through the House and some voted against it. The point is it has already passed. It could be brought up by the Senate at any time that they would choose. To add H.R. 4091 to H.R. 7, which adds enormous funding, simply would derail this child nutrition bill also.

My amendment would delete the provision for tiering in the child care program, it would delete the addition of the food service equipment service program, and it would delete the allowance for private vendors to reenter the summer food program. In short, it would delete the extraneous add-on and costly programs from H.R. 7, while reauthorizing existing child nutrition programs.

In terms of dollar savings to the taxpayers, Mr. Chairman, I have prepared a chart, which I will share with the House as a whole. H.R. 7, in its present form, would increase over current services the expenditures by the Government by a total of $297 million in fiscal year 1985, $393 million in fiscal year 1986, and $480 million in 1987, for a total of $1.17 billion.

So, if the House favors reauthorization of child nutrition programs without the addition of an extra $1 billion in spending then the House should vote for this substitute amendment, which would simply reauthorize those programs.

Mr. Chairman, one other point. That is, this amendment is very close—in fact, it may be identical to the original bill that was offered in the committee before the committee began markup.

I think a reauthorization of child nutrition is what is needed and not the addition of spending that could well result in no legislation at all being passed. The add-ons have already derailed H.R. 4091 so that H.R. 4091 has not been considered by the Senate and will likely not become law.

With this simple reauthorization I think we would serve the children who are being assisted by the child nutrition programs quite well.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I think we all understand that back in 1981 when we had the Gramm-Latta vote No. 2, we cut this program $1½ billion. We have only since that time sought to restore to the program 14 percent of that cut. We cut these programs 35 percent in 1981, and this increase today is only restoring about 14 percent of that cutback.

And what did we do by reason of that cutback in 1981? Let me tell the Members. The paying children in the school lunch program dropped from 14.7 million down to 11.2 million as a result of that big cut.

At that time we had the greatest feeding program in the world and we are trying to do something for the reduced-price children here. At that time a meal was only costing the reduced-price children 15 cents. And today, as a result of that cut, it is costing them 40 cents. And we are trying today to reduce that cost to the children to only down to 25 cents.

So there is nothing in this bill that is extravagant anywhere along the line. The amounts added back to these programs are minimal, about $200 million in 1984 and about $400 million to 1985, considering the good that will be achieved.

I think we all want to remember that these programs were cut by 35 percent in 1981 and as a result, 3 million children have dropped out of the school lunch program in the last 3 years and as many as 1 million of these children are poor.

We ought to begin to repair this damage by restoring some of the funds which only amounts in this bill to about 14 percent of the funds cut in 1981. These programs were cut in 1981 more than any other means-tested program.

I would hope that we would not want to go farther today with a substitute that will not only cut back the free and reduced-price programs, but will again perhaps knock another 3 million children out of the paid program.

We have a good bill. We brought here a good bill. It is my hope, Mr. Chairman, that we vote the substitute down because none of us wants to further destroy a great program and what we will do is knock another 3 million children out of this program.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. JEFFORDS

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JEFFORDS: Section 9 of the National School Lunch Act is amended by adding at the end thereof a new subsection as follows:

"(e) A school or school food authority participating in a program under this Act may not contract with a food service company to provide a la carte food service unless such company agrees to offer free, reduced-price and full-price reimbursable meals to all eligible children.".

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe this amendment will be controversial. The situation we are dealing with here is a new one which is coming into play.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFORDS. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. PERKINS. Is this an amendment to the original bill?

Mr. JEFFORDS. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. JEFFORDS. I think the gentleman is aware of my amendment and will enthusiastically agree with me on this matter.

Mr. Chairman, under this amendment we are trying to deal with an emerging problem. In the school lunch program we have found that a profitable aspect is the a la carte offering to our young people. The a la carte service in combination with the type A school lunch program works to the advantage of all children participating in the school lunch program. What we are seeing now in just a few instances could grow and pose a substantial threat to the national school lunch program. Specifically, I am referring to the push being made by the fast food industry to enter the school feeding market. Fast food company representatives are approaching local school authorities, offering to lease school building space and free local districts from operating at least a part of the school lunch program; namely, the a la carte meal service. When this happens, the profit made from the a la carte service which, when operated by the school food service, must be reinvested in the school's overall meal service, disappears. Stated somewhat differently, the profits recognized in a la carte sales serve to defray the costs incurred in the national school lunch program and are especially important in keeping the costs of lunches reasonable. When meal charges go up, participation drops, and many schools could be faced with a decision of whether or not to continue their participation in the federally assisted national school lunch program. The national school lunch program is the only national program available to insure that nutritionally balanced meals are available to children from low-income families.

All this amendment says is that if a food company wishes to come in and run a local school lunch program, it must be willing to operate the traditional, type A national school lunch program and offer free, reduced-price and paid category meals as well as any a la carte meal service. It will preclude food service companies from skimming off the profits associated with a la carte meal service, thereby jeopardizing the fiscal well-being of the national school lunch program.

That is the essence of the amendment. I do not believe it has any controversial aspects.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, as I understand the gentleman's amendment, he is seeking to protect the school lunch program against fast food chains, and so forth?

Mr. JEFFORDS. Coming in and ripping off the profitable aspects and leaving the national school lunch program to deal with the more expensive aspects, resulting in a decreasing number of schools participating in the school lunch program as we know it and increasing numbers ending up with just a fast food outlet for the kids who can afford to pay for lunch at school.

Mr. PERKINS. And all the gentleman's amendment does is to assure that all children who are eligible are fed?

Mr. JEFFORDS. That is correct.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, we have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFORDS. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has an excellent amendment, and we agree to that amendment.

Mr. JEFFORDS. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont (Mr. JEFFORDS).

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas (Mr. BARTLETT).

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote, and pending that, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently a quorum is not present. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 2, rule XXIII, the Chair announces that he will reduce to a minimum of 5 minutes the period of time within which a vote by electronic device, if ordered, will be taken on the pending question following the quorum call. Members will record their presence by electronic device.

The call was taken by electronic device.

The Clerk announced the following pair:

On this vote:

Mr. Paul for, with Mr. Fascell against.

Mr. FISH changed his vote from "aye" to "no."

So the amendment in the nature of a substitute was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Chairman, I rise as a member of the committee and as a cosponsor of this legislation to add my voice of support to H.R. 7. This legislation is essential if we are to attempt to restore some of the drastic cuts that were imposed upon our child nutrition program in 1981 as a result of the Omnibus Reconciliation Act—which slashed these programs by a total of 15 percent. More importantly, H.R. 7 provides for modest growth in this program by adding $80 million for the special supplemental food program for women, infants, and children. Finally, it should be noted that funding for H.R. 7 is consistent with the first concurrent budget resolution (H. Con. Res. 280) which assumes full funding for these programs.

Let me take a moment to refresh the memories of those here who might not recall what the 1981 Gramm-Latta bill has wrought on this program.

As one who did not support the 1981 omnibus legislation—I opposed it for what it did to programs such as this—programs which serve to give the working people of this country some financial relief if they are to remain a part of the labor force. In many cases the children that are served by this program are part of families who work—but cannot afford to provide them with an adequate diet without these programs. The cuts that prevailed in 1981 were aimed at the working poor—and for that we have paid dearly. This bill attempts to reverse the regressive policy which has resulted in a loss of nearly half of this program—$1.5 billion.

The 1981 bill resulted in 3.6 million children being dropped from these programs—children of the working poor. The number of schools have also dropped off—from 93,770 to 90,500. Many of these schools are nonpublic schools and public schools that serve large numbers of needy children. These are the very same students—and the very same schools—that we are trying to help.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that this bill is a dramatic illustration of the fact that we can put our money toward a more compassionate and humane set of programs. We can demonstrate that we are succeeding in reversing the damage of the past and moving toward growth in these programs for the future.

Since 1981 the loss in noncash benefits to poor households has been dramatic, averaging $170—with those making $10,000 or less the hardest hit with a loss of $250 in cash benefits. These same 10,000 households have also lost $160 in noncash benefits, and have net a mere $20 from the tax cut.

Laudably, H.R. 7 moves in the same direction I believe the majority of the Members of this House want to move. For the second time in 2 weeks—the first being the passage of the first concurrent budget resolution last week—we are putting ourselves on record in support of the maintenance of a compassionate and humane approach to government.

I also wish to advise my colleagues that this legislation contains an important provision which I offered in the committee, that reestablishes the food equipment assistance program, which was also lost in 1981. This amendment was based upon legislation authored by my good friend and colleague from New York, Mr. SOLARZ, H.R. 4911. Restoration of this program is essential particularly to nonpublic schools which serve large numbers of low-income children. According to the U.S. Catholic Conference, the demise of the equipment program has severely hampered the growth of the lunch program in many poorer neighborhoods. These schools are being forced to choose between serving meals with funds provided under this act—or use these same funds to purchase equipment. As a result, many schools are struggling with obsolete equipment in need of constant repair or replacement.

H.R. 7, as amended, authorizes $10 million a year for 4 years over the life of the bill, for the equipment program. It targets funds to the neediest of districts by requiring, as a condition of participation, that 60 percent or more of the children in that district be receiving free or reduced-price lunches. Testimony before the committee confirmed the need for this program and, I am pleased that we were able to restore this important component to this program to assure that our schools have the appropriate "infrastructure" to fully operate these programs.

In addition to the equipment program, I wish to make note of the remaining major provisions of H.R. 7 which merit our support:

Under the school lunch and breakfast program, the bill requires OMB to seek congressional approval before attempting to change the poverty guidelines of the programs as they relate to eligibility. The bill also eliminates the requirement for local agencies to verify the income of free and reduced-price students unless Congress provides full funding for such activities. To further assure that all needy individuals receive benefits from this program, H.R. 7 exempts food stamp and AFDC households from additional verification and makes recipients of food stamps, AFDC and State public assistance programs automatically eligible for free school lunches. Finally, the bill requires USDA to conduct a feasibility study on self-financing of the universal lunch program, extends the school lunch pilot project study of alternative means of providing assistance under the school lunch program under the "cash-in-lieu of commmodities" program and extends the "offer versus serve" provisions in the school breakfast program.

Under the summer food program, a provision was added to allow private, nonprofit organizations—including summer camps—to participate if they serve not more than 2,500 children daily at not more than 25 sites and prepare their meals onsite.

Under the child food program, we restore the "tiering" system of reimbursements for child care centers. This system is necessary if we are to provide adequate assistance to centers which serve large numbers of low-income children and reduce the paperwork burden to these same centers so they can concentrate on providing services instead of filling out forms.

Under the WIC program, H.R. 7 provides for the following:

Creates WIC as a capped entitlement and provide $80 million in fiscal year 1985 for program expansion and improved program administration through curtailing activities of OMB, requiring State agency outreach with AFDC and allowing States to spend 102.1 percent of their annual grant to assure that all funds appropriated will be used to the benefit of clients.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, this bill incorporates the provisions of H.R. 4091 passed overwhelmingly by the House last year by a vote of 306 to 114. This bill lowered school breakfast and lunch charges, improved school breakfast meal patterns and provided additional meals for CCFP.

In sum, it is important that we act to pass this legislation. These programs cannot expire for the very individuals they serve are those who are hardest hit by recent ravages in Federal income maintenance programs as well as unemployment. The working poor of this country are the very ones who have suffered from the cuts in these programs and they are the very same people we are trying to assist with this legislation. It has been the topic of nine hearings before the Subcommittee on Elementary and Secondary Education, of which I am a member. I commend my chairman, CARL PERKINS, for his dedication not only to this legislation, but to the child nutritions programs as a whole. His leadership has been instrumental in assuring that the neediest of our citizens in this Nation are served by this program.

This bill also recognizes that schools, as focal points in our communities, can be used to serve the nutritional needs of seniors. The bill allows feeding sites to serve as meal sites to seniors, as long as no reductions in meals to children occur. As an original member of the Select Committee on Aging, I have maintained a longstanding commitment to our nutritional programs for the elderly under the Older Americans Act, and I believe that this provision in H.R. 7 complements those programs.

I urge support for this legislation.●

● Mr. CONTE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 7, a bill to extend and improve the Child Nutrition Act.

The devastating effects of hunger and malnutrition are faced daily by many people in this country. In my own State, the department of public health has recently shown, in a report entitled "1983 Massachusetts Nutrition Survey," that a significant number of low-income, preschool children suffer one or more signs of malnutrition. The report found that "there may be between 10,000 and 17,500 chronically undernourished, low-income, preschool children in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts." Pointing to probable consequences, the survey stated that "the implications of this level of undernutrition include retarded growth, impaired learning ability and increased health problems."

The special supplemental food program for women, infants, and children (WIC) is a proven defense against chronic malnutrition. In fact, the WIC program is one of the most effective and efficient programs run by the Federal Government. A study by the Harvard School of Public Health documented not only a marked decrease in the incidence of low birth weight by those enrolled in the WIC program, but also reported that each dollar spent on the kind of prenatal care that WIC provides saves $3 in future hospitalization costs. This cost/benefit ratio is far above most programs sponsored by the Federal Government.

The WIC program currently serves about 3 million infants, children, and pregnant and postpartum mothers. The program supplies supplemental food, nutrition information, and prenatal care to qualified low-income individuals who are shown to suffer nutritional risk. At present, over 10 million persons are eligible, yet the program serves less than a third. In my district, only 27 percent of the need can be met, with only approximately 19 percent of the eligible 1- to 5-year-olds being served. This modest increase in WIC authorizations is a first step to meet this important need.

Back in January, in response to these rising problems of malnutrition, I introduced H.R. 4661. This bill, in part, sought to extend and increase the WIC authorization. Today, therefore, I wish to commend members of the Education and Labor Committee for moving on my suggestion and that of many other members to expand the WIC program.

Mr. Chairman, I strongly support this move to include increased WIC authorizations in this child nutrition legislation and urge my colleagues to support this measure.●

● Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 7, a bill to extend and improve the National School Lunch Act and the Child Nutrition Act of 1966. This bill will restore a small portion of the funds cut from child nutrition programs since 1981, and will improve certain features of these vital programs. We must take this step toward insuring that the children of the world's wealthiest country are adequately nourished.

Every provision of this complex bill—the child care food program, the summer food program, the nutrition education and training program, and the others—merits the strong support of the Congress. I would like to explain in some detail, though, how the enactment of two sections of this bill, namely, the WIC amendments and the school lunch program amendments, will improve the lives of children in the Third District of Connecticut.

In New Haven, Conn., WIC programs supplement the diets of 7,350 high-risk pregnant and nursing women, infants, and children under the age of 5. Of these 3,325 are served through Yale New Haven Hospital, 1,925 through St. Raphael's Hospital, 1,375 through the Hill Health Center, and 725 by the Fairhaven Community Health Center.

Elizabeth Gersten of the Fairhaven clinic has helped to make WIC the success it has been in my district for the past 10 years. In Ms. Gersten's judgment, "WIC is a phenomenally successful program." She explained that WIC serves crucial functions in addition to providing its participants with individually tailored quantities and combinations of milk, fruit juice, eggs, fortified cereal, peanut butter, dried beans, and infant formula.

"WIC brings people into the health center, it keeps them coming, and it gets them tied into health care," states Ms. Gersten. As we struggle to contain the soaring costs of health care, we should be pleased to continue a program like WIC which gives people at health risk basic, nourishing food; significantly reduces the incidence of low birth weight; teaches people the broad principles of nutrition; and connects these people into the health-preserving screening and treatment system.

Connecticut has been exceptionally smart about positioning itself to take advantage of WIC dollars as they became available. An official at the State department of health emphasized to me that Connecticut serves two-thirds of the people in the State eligible for WIC, while the national average is only 30 percent. And by law, in every State, a minimum of 80 percent of the money Congress appropriates to WIC must be spent on food.

While spotlighting the State's achievements, though, we should look to the shadows also. One-third of the low-income pregnant women, infants, and children in Connecticut determined by the medical profession to be at nutritional risk cannot be served by the WIC program because of lack of funds.

H.R. 7 extends the WIC program for 4 years. It provides for modest program growth, and makes changes in the program to improve administration. Along with its other strongly warranted provisions, these WIC measures make H.R. 7 a priority bill for adoption by the Congress.

Another section of this bill with special relevance to my congressional district is the school lunch amendments. Towns throughout south-central Connecticut are experiencing increased financial strain on their school lunch programs, and many of these problems date to the Omnibus Reconciliation Act of 1981.

The 1981 legislation cut the Federal reimbursement for school lunches, raised the price charged to the child, tightened eligibility requirements, and excluded private schools whose annual tuition exceeds $1,500 from participation in the school lunch program. As a result of these changes, participation dropped sharply. In fiscal 1981, 27 million children were fed by the school lunch program. By fiscal 1983, only 23.4 million children took part. And the number of schools involved dropped from 93,770 to 90,500.

Some of the schools which opted out of the program were in the Clinton School District. Dr. Joseph Cirasuolo, superintendent at Clinton, explained that their program costs would actually have been higher had they stayed with the Federal subsidy.

Mr. D. Edward Mas, superintendent of Hamden public schools, told me yesterday that the Hamden program will run at least a $30,000 deficit next year and if the Federal subsidy were to be reduced any further, their program could not be continued.

H.R. 7 may help school districts like these continue to offer free and reduced-price meals to children with low-income families. By increasing the Federal reimbursement rate for reduced-price meals, and making a number of changes in the law designed to increase participation in the school lunch program, H.R. 7 will help restore this crucial Federal program to its intended scope.

● Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in support of H.R. 7, the School Lunch and Child Nutrition Amendments of 1984.

Three years ago, President Reagan had his way: This Congress acquiesced to his demands and slashed $1.5 billion from child nutrition programs. Those of us who fought those cuts warned then that the results would be disastrous. Our fears have been borne out. In the school lunch program alone, nearly 4 million fewer poor children participate today than in 1981.

Now we are fighting back. This bill will restore those funds and help restore a sense of fairness to our country. We can bring the Federal subsidy for the school lunch and school breakfast programs back almost to the 1981 levels. We can strengthen WIC, the program so vital to pregnant women, infants, and children whose diets are dangerously inadequate.

Passage of this bill is both a practical necessity and a moral imperative. For $1.5 billion, roughly the same amount of money President Reagan wants to spend on the military budget each day, we can fund these programs adequately for an entire year.

Let us show President Reagan what fairness means. Let us tell him this is an investment we cannot afford to miss. I urge my colleagues to vote for H.R. 7.●

● Mr. LELAND. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 7, the School Lunch and Child Nutrition Amendments of 1984, and commend my colleagues, Mr. PERKINS and Mr. MILLER, for their leadership on this issue.

H.R. 7 reauthorizes school lunch and child nutrition programs and restores funding to the school lunch, breakfast, and child care food programs. Most critically, this bill will authorize increased funds for those individuals especially at risk—an additional 150,000 low-income, pregnant and nursing women, infants, and children will be served by these programs by fiscal year 1985.

H.R. 7 will restore only 15 percent of the funds which were cut from child nutrition programs in fiscal year 1982. This increase in the fiscal year 1984 authorization level is just sufficient to prevent reductions in the number of persons served by the program in 1983; and still, tragically, less than one-half of the persons who are eligible and in need will be able to obtain services under WIC.

H.R. 7 is supported by the American School Food Service Association, the National PTA, and the child nutrition community. I urge my colleagues to support the recommendations put forth by the Education and Labor Committee in H.R. 7. We cannot afford to alter the structure or reduce the scope of the child nutrition programs if we are to maintain a strong commitment to the health and welfare of this Nation's most valuable resource, its children. Thank you.●

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I just want to take a minute to indicate what we have done to this point as far as amendments are concerned.

We eliminated the entitlement status for the WIC program. There were perfecting changes in the summer feeding program. More specifically, we limited the number of sites a private sponsor may operate to 15. We permitted only self-prepare sites that are operated by sponsors who provide yearlong activities for children and have demonstrated management and fiscal capacity. We gave the first right of refusal to the schools and units of local government to run summer feeding programs sites. We limited the tiering change in the child care food program. We also placed a 2-year limitation on the freeze on the current means for determining income eligibility for free and reduced-price meals.

Some of the additions we may wish to deal with in conference committee. There is $100 million extra in WIC. Tiering will cost $9 million extra, equipment $10 million extra, the summer feeding program $14 million extra, and $42 million for the breakfast program. In short, some perfecting amendments were accepted here; there are several remaining changes which I trust we can work out in conference committee to make certain reductions in child nutrition program costs. It is very clear that if we wish to see the five child nutrition authorities scheduled to expire on September 30 reauthorized—namely, the summer feeding program, the commodity distribution program, the nutrition education and training program, the State administrative expenses, and the WIC programs—if we want to continue those programs, then this is the vehicle we need in order to so do. As I indicated, we will try to clear up some of the few remaining troublesome policy issues we were unable to clear up on the floor when we go to conference.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. GOODLING. I am happy to yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to take this opportunity to compliment the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. GOODLING. All through the debate and in committee, he has offered constructive amendments. Several of them have been adopted. He has made a great contribution, along with other Members on the minority side.

But I do want to state—and I think the gentleman will agree—that we have only restored 14 percent of the $1.5 billion that was cut out of this legislation in the Gramm-Latta vote in June 1981. So this bill is not bloated anywhere along the line. Every penny in it is necessary. In fact, the bill is presently underfunded. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania has been a cautious member and has offered constructive amendments, and I think he deserves the compliments of every Member in the Chamber.

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, I would like to merely say that the change made in the Reconciliation Act of 1981 have represented savings of between $1.4 and $1.5 billion annually since their implementation in fiscal year 1982.

This legislation which is designed to fine tune some of the Reconciliation Act changes will not eliminate the bulk of these cost savings.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GOODLING) has expired.

The question is on the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended.

The committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended, was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose, and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. WRIGHT) having assumed the chair, Mr. LEVITAS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 7) to make permanent certain of the authorizations of appropriations under the National School Lunch Act and the Child Nutrition Act of 1963, pursuant to House Resolution 478, he reported the bill back to the House with an amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute adopted by the Committee of the Whole? If not, the question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 343, nays 72, not voting 18, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following pair:

On this vote:

Mr. Jones of North Carolina for, with Mr. Paul against.

So the bill was passed.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The title of the bill was amended so as to read: "A bill to extend and improve the National School Lunch Act and the Child Nutrition Act of 1966."

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AUTHORIZING THE CLERK TO MAKE CORRECTIONS IN ENROLLMENT OF H.R. 7

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that, in the engrossment of the bill, the clerk be authorized to correct section numbers, punctuation, and cross references and to make such other technical and conforming changes as may be necessary to reflect the actions of the House in amending the bill H.R. 7.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION FOR SUBCOMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE OF COMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES TO SIT ON TOMORROW, WEDNESDAY, MAY 2, 1984, DURING THE 5-MINUTE RULE

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Merchant Marine of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries be permitted to sit at 10 a.m. on Wednesday, May 2, 1984, for the purpose of marking up the following bills:

H.R. 5505. To amend title XII of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936 (war risk insurance);

H.R. 3289. To establish a commission to study the defense-related aspects of the U.S. merchant marine;

H.R. 5091. To authorize appropriations for the maritime construction differential subsidy for fiscal year 1985;

H.R. 5220. To protect the national defense shipyards of the United States; and

H.R. 5364. To authorize the construction of versatile motor-vehicle-carrying vessels under title VII of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936.

The ranking minority member of the committee, the gentleman from Washington (Mr. PRITCHARD) and the ranking minority member of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. SNYDER) have been apprised of the markup time and date and are in accord with this request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 3457, SOIL CONSERVATION ACT OF 1984

Mr. PEPPER, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a privileged report (Rept. No. 98-727), on the resolution (H. Res. 493) providing for the consideraiton of the bill (H.R. 3457) to prohibit the payment of certain agriculture incentives to persons who produce certain agricultural commodities on highly erodible land; to allow farmers who plant perennial grasses and legumes as a means of building soil quality, rotating crops, or protecting land from wind and water erosion to enter a certified voluntary set-aside program; and to allow the Secretary of Agriculture to enter into long-term contracts with farmers to remove certain erosion-prone lands from cultivation, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 5167, DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE AUTHORIZATION ACT, 1985

Mr. PEPPER, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a privileged report (Rept. No. 98-728), on the resolution (H. Res. 494) providing for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5167) to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1985 for the Armed Forces for procurement, for research, development, test, and evaluation, for operation and maintenance, and for working capital funds, to prescribe personnel strengths for such fiscal year for the Armed Forces and for civilian employees of the Department of Defense, and for other purposes, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 5, rule I, the Chair will now put the question on each motion on which further proceedings were postponed earlier today and then on each motion postponed on Monday, April 30.

Votes will be taken in the following order:

H.R. 5041, House Concurrent Resolution 275, House Concurrent Resolution 261, H.R. 5188, H.R. 5147, H.R. 4585, House Joint Resolution 537, H.R. 5050, H.R. 5076, H.R. 4263, H.R. 4596, H.R. 3787, H.R. 5100, H.R. 3472, and H.R. 4952. On each of which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Chair will reduce to 5 minutes the time for any electronic votes after the first such vote in this series.

NATIONAL ALZHEIMER'S DISEASE MONTH

Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 451) designating the month of November 1984 as "National Alzheimer's Disease Month," and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do so simply to say that the minority has no objection to the legislation.

Mr. LOWERY of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COURTER. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LOWERY of California. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, I rise today to reaffirm my support for House Joint Resolution 451, which declares the month of November 1984 as "National Alzheimer's Disease Month." I would particularly like to thank Mr. LELAND for arranging his schedule so as to bring this important legislation to the floor today.

Alzheimer's disease, which is the primary cause of senile dementia, affects over 2 million Americans, most of whom are over 65. The course of this disease is progressive and irreversible, beginning with simple forgetfulness followed by severe changes in personality and memory. This debilitating disease accounts for more than one-half of all nursing home admissions which, when translated into dollars, costs an estimated $30 billion annually—a cost virtually uncovered by private health insurance or medicare.

Consider too, the ever-increasing "golden-age" population and it will not be difficult to imagine the enormous impact of this disease on our society. I agree with Jerome Stone, president of the Alzheimer's Disease & Related Disorders Association, who recently stated that if something is not done to check the progress of this disease, it will be the most serious health problem of the next century.

It was with great hope that I introduced House Joint Resolution 451, as well as similar legislation which, for the past 2 years has brought recognition upon those sometimes forgotten silent majority of our senior citizens. Passage of comparable legislation has proven to be tremendously helpful in focusing national attention on the unique problems of Alzheimer victims and their families.

As an honorary member of the San Diego board of directors and the national advisory committee of the Alzheimer's Disease & Related Disorders Association, it is with much pride that I mention that local chapters of this organization have increased by 40 percent—an impressive statistic for a disease which appeared unknown only a few years ago. The services provided by this group are vital, for they help defer, by offering professional care in a homelike atmosphere, the trauma and expenses of institutionalization, as well as alleviate the emotional stress on the victim's family.

The cause of Alzheimer's disease is, as of yet, unknown although there are many committed individuals throughout this country who are diligently working toward a cure. In my district alone, much has been done to promote research. For example, Dr. George Glenner, who is affiliated with the University of California, San Diego School of Medicine, established the Nation's first brain bank, to exclusively study Alzheimer's disease. This brain enhanced bank with the recent addition of two internationally acclaimed professors, has the dedication necessary to pinpoint the cause of this dreadful, mind-ravaging disease. Here in Washington, Congress stepped-up medical research funding and last year, Secretary of HHS Margaret Heckler created an interagency task force to specifically examine Alzheimer's disease.

It has only been in the last few years that this disease has received national attention, and Mr. Speaker, it deserves no less than a national effort. A virtually unheard-of disease, AIDS, was targeted by HHS, as the No. 1 health problem and just examine the monumental breakthrough. In as little as 3 years, we may have a vaccine for this frightening, newly observed medical syndrome, a disease which baffled doctors, scientists, and medical researchers only a couple years ago. I am confident that by streamlining research funds, increased congressional support, and alerting our society to the tragedy of this ailment, the same success story can happen to Alzheimer's disease. Mr. Speaker, I believe that by declaring November 1984 as "National Alzheimer's Disease Month," this will significantly further enhance public awareness of the fourth most common cause of death and bring us one step closer to identifying the cause of this horrible illness.

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GONZALEZ). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mrs. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I will not object, I rise to thank the gentleman from Texas for bringing this legislation to the floor, and to all of those who have had a part in making it a reality.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to objection, and I will not object, but I would just like to take this opportunity to congratulate the gentleman from Texas for bringing forth this legislation. It serves to focus further attention on one of the most serious ailments that confronts the people of our Nation, and absent this focus, who is to say when resolution would be obtained and sufficient remedies will be produced.

Like many other diseases that plague our Nation, hopefully this, one day, will be just a sad place in America's history.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

H.J. RES. 451

Whereas more than two million Americans are affected by Alzheimer's disease, which is a surprisingly common disorder that destroys certain vital cells of the brain;

Whereas Alzheimer's disease is the fourth leading cause of death among older Americans;

Whereas Alzheimer's disease is responsible for 50 per centum of all nursing home admissions, at an annual cost of more than $20,000,000,000;

Whereas in one-third of all American families one parent will succumb to this disease;

Whereas Alzheimer's disease is not a normal consequence of aging; and

Whereas an increase in the national awareness of the problem of Alzheimer's disease may stimulate the interest and concern of the American people, which may lead, in turn, to increased research and eventually to the discovery of a cure for Alzheimer's disease: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the month of November 1984 is designated as "National Alzheimer's Disease Month". The President is requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such month with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL NURSING HOME RESIDENTS DAY

Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 198) designating April 27, 1984, as "National Nursing Home Residents Day," and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. COURTER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would just like to make the point that the minority has no objection. We are very much in favor of passage of the legislation.

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

S.J. RES. 198

Whereas over one million older Americans reside in nursing homes and one in five older Americans likely will reside in a nursing home at some time;

Whereas nursing home residents have contributed to the growth, development, and progress of this Nation and, as elders, offer a wealth of knowledge and experience;

Whereas Congress recognizes the importance of the continued participation of these institutionalized senior citizens in the life of our Nation;

Whereas in an effort to foster reintegration of these citizens into their communities Congress encourages community recognition of and involvement in the lives of nursing home residents;

Whereas the Congress recognizes the importance of safeguarding the rights of nursing home residents; and

Whereas it is appropriate for the American people to join in support of nursing home residents to demonstrate their concern and respect for these citizens: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That April 27, 1984, is designated as "National Nursing Home Residents Day", a time of renewed recognition, concern, and respect for the Nation's nursing home residents. The President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe this day with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. LELAND

Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

Amendment offered by Mr. LELAND: In the resolve on page 2, line 3, strike "April 27, 1984" and insert in lieu thereof "April 26, 1985".

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas (Mr. LELAND).

The amendment was agreed to.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

TITLE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. LELAND

Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Title amendment offered by Mr. LELAND: Amend the title so as to read: "Joint Resolution designating April 26, 1985, as 'National Nursing Home Residents Day'."

The title amendment was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL PHYSICAL FITNESS AND SPORTS MONTH

Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 232) to authorize and request the President to designate the month of May 1984 as "National Physical Fitness and Sports Month," and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I will not object, I just point out the fact that some time early today I received a letter from a high school friend of mine pointing out the fact that sometime in the fall it will be 25 years since I graduated from high school. It is hard to believe that that much time has gone by.

Reflecting over those 25 years, I think there are two things that the American society as a group has grown more conscious of, and I think both are very definitely pluses.

First of all, we are much more environmentally concerned about our environment, clean air, clean water, and clean land; and second, I think this country is much more concerned about physical fitness. I think both of those concerns are my concerns. I know that the gentleman from Texas, MICKEY LELAND, has those concerns as well, and I think we have progressed well in those 25 years by bringing up to more public consciousness those two areas.

Therefore, it gives me great pleasure to mention the fact that I am very much a proponent, a cosponsor of this legislation. It is important, indeed, for all Americans to revere their own health, the function of their own bodies, and any time we pass a resolution that sets aside a month so that America can be concerned about physical fitness, it is something that deserves the attention of this Congress and certainly the attention of the American people.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

S.J. RES. 232

Whereas one of every two adults in our country is a regular participant in exercise and sports;

Whereas the number of physically active men and women has doubled in ten years and continues to grow rapidly;

Whereas today we recognize that physical activity is an important part of daily life for people of both sexes and of all ages;

Whereas physical activity is vital to good health and is a rich source of pleasure and personal satisfaction;

Whereas our physical fitness and sports programs are one of the primary means by which we strengthen our bodies and refresh our spirits; and

Whereas it is essential that we make fitness and sports programs increasingly available so that all of our citizens will be able to experience the joys and benefits they offer: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating the month of May 1984 as "National Physical Fitness and Sports Month", and to call upon Federal, State, and local government agencies, and the people of the United States to observe the month with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on House Joint Resolution 451, Senate Joint Resolution 198, and Senate Joint Resolution 232, the resolutions just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my special order may be called at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

TRIBUTE TO ANSEL ADAMS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. PANETTA) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I am going to proceed for approximately 5 minutes under a prior agreement. I will recognize those who want to introduce their comments into the RECORD.

Mr. Speaker, I have invited my colleagues here tonight to give some sense of the profound impact which Ansel Adams had upon our lives and our country and—perhaps—upon the way we look at both. I welcome you all here tonight; your presence alone speaks well of the strength and depth of the impression Ansel left with us.

In remembering, one is tempted to note the best-known accomplishments of a man like Ansel Adams. It is difficult not to do so; his professional accomplishments were many and well known. Ansel Adams was a giant in photography. His rise to prominence in the field of photography coincided with a metaphorphosis in photography in this Nation, and contributed to it. Within the lifetimes of other well-known photographers such as Alfred Stieglitz, Imogen Cunningham, Edward Weston, and Paul Strand, Ansel Adams sought successfully to establish photography as a distinct art form in which the photographer interpreted rather than recorded a scene. Perhaps more than any of these talented photographers, Ansel Adams assisted the transformation of photography from a hobby (as it was for him in his youth) to an expressive and fine art. To accomplish this transformation, he published books on fundamental principals of photography, he helped found the department of photography at the Museum of Modern Art, he published books of his own work, he directed exhibitions, lectures and seminars regarding photography. And he photographed.

His photographic survey of a Japanese-American internment camp directed national attention to the plight of internees. Prints of his photograph of a moonrise over Hernandez, N. Mex. and of the moon and Half Dome in Yosemite National Park hang now in the world's premiere museums. He photographed Presidents. He presented and directed numerous shows and exhibitions. Collections of his work are the mainstay of home collections and photographic libraries across the country.

Yet, despite the deserved fame his photographs brought him, it was not notoriety that attracted him most strongly to photography. Rather, he wanted most to portray his subjects in their finest moments, and thereby to capture and express his deep admiration for them. The high degree of precision and resolution which characterized his finest work reflects well the painstaking care with which he prepared for a shot, and illustrates his nearly-unyielding commitment to precise, realistic interpretation of the wonders which he saw. With characteristic ability, Ansel articulated this commitment well when he said: "a great photograph is a full expression of what one feels about what is being photographed in the deepest sense, and is, thereby, a true expression of what one feels about life in its entirety."

One look at "Monolith—Moonlight over Half Dome, Yosemite" gives a clear impression of the depth of feeling Ansel held for the natural grandeur which he photographed. This photograph, taken in the Yosemite Valley where Ansel passed 60 summers, was clearly—as he termed it—an "assignment from within."

Ansel used terms like "magical" to describe that quality in nature which he sought to capture in his photographs. He wrote once of New Mexico to Alfred Steiglitz saying, "The skies and land are so enormous and the detail so precise and exquisite that wherever you are, you are isolated in a glowing world . . . where everything is sidewise under you and over you, and the clocks stopped long ago." These expressive words close to identifying the wonderment, affection, and joy he derived from the natural world he photographed. But his work—in photography as well as other pursuits—help express more completely this love.

In an interview earlier this spring, Ansel referred to his life's work (his photography, his work with conservation, and his work as a part-time lobbyist and gadfly to Washington) by saying: "I like what I'm doing, and this is my vacation." As the recipient—or target—of some of Ansel's many missives, I can attest to the persuasive manner in which he employed all of his talents and resolve to preservation of our Nation's natural wonders.

As official photographer and director of the Sierra Club, Ansel came to Washington in 1935—his photographs in hand—to lobby for a bill which would preserve the Kings Canyon area as a national park. Ansel's photographs came to the attention of Secretary of the Interior Harold Ickes and ultimately to President Franklin Roosevelt, who were persuaded to request Congress for the area's protection. In 1940, Congress responding by establishing the Kings Canyon Park. Later, Ansel lent his support to passage of the Alaska Lands Act, which protected 100 million acres of wilderness land in Alaska.

This talented photographer and onetime musician once said that the greatest gift God had granted him was the Earth itself. His appreciation of this gift was evident as he worked to preserve the natural areas he loved so well. Areas near his home like Yosemite, and the Big Sur coast—which he once described as "the grandest meeting of earth and ocean in the world"—were as dear to him and deserving of preservation as any. Through his work with the Big Sur Foundation, an organization committed to preservation of the Big Sur coast, he played a central role supporting legislation I introduced in 1980 to establish a Federal-local partnership for land planning on the Big Sur coast. During this successful period of public involvement, Ansel continued to lobby, to direct, and to inspire for the preservation of wild and scenic areas with his characteristic wit, good nature, and exceptional talent.

I will miss the wit and good nature he displayed with such zest through his life. While we will miss his friendship and vitality, we are left with the comforting knowledge that his work will continue to inspire future generations—as it did him—as an expression of his love of nature and his dedication to its preservation.

Again, let me welcome you all here this evening.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentlewoman from California (Mrs. BURTON).

Mrs. BURTON of California. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, it will be difficult to imagine this world without Ansel Adams, but it is equally impossible now to see the Sierras and other western landscapes without remembering how he has captured their beauty. These images of nature cannot be separated from the memory of the artist who added such a panoramic dimension too our visions of the American West. In fact, I like to think of Ansel as a landscape choreographer who combined shadow, light, and the natural elements of our environment into a perfect drama for the eye.

His creative achievements and conservation activities are too lengthy to adequately enumerate here, but from his early days of using a Kodak Brownie to the time he took on James Watt, Ansel's life was a unique example of creative force combined with a powerful passion for our environment. This vitality, vigilance and dedication to highlighting beauty and fending off threats to its preservation were evident in every task he approached.

The contributions Ansel made to his hometown of San Francisco, alone, are monumental. In 1932, we San Franciscans were honored by his first one-man show at the M. H. De Young Memorial Museum. He later organized a photography department at the California School of Fine Arts (San Francisco Art Institute). We also benefited from his expertise and ideas as a board member of the Sierra Club for 37 years. In 1972, when the Army relinquished control of open lands in San Francisco, Ansel worked with my late husband, Phillip Burton, to see that overzealous developers were not allowed the opportunity to urbanize this natural open space. It was later to become the Golden Gate National Recreation Area.

His letter-writing campaigns in support of our Environment were well known and apparently he wrote almost daily about threats to our public lands and resources. From water shortages in the southwest to the dangers of acid rain in the Northeast, Ansel was an ever watchful and able steward of our environment. In California, he protested offshore drilling, worked to preserve Mineral King as a national park and championed wilderness preservation as a top priority for our State. The list goes on.

There was Ansel Adams, the genius, philosopher, activist, and complete artist, and, as if that were not enough, there was yet another Ansel Adams.

Just a few years ago, my husband and I had the very special experience of sharing an Easter holiday with Ansel and his lovely wife, Virginia. Ansel made certain that nature-loving Phillip Burton had a real opportunity to experience the outdoors. We walked in the woods, had long talks about the future of our planet and it was one of the rare times I recall that Phillip actually put his Chesterfields aside and relaxed in the very woods he struggled so in Congress to preserve for future generations. This encounter, and the many others we shared over the years, had a profound effect on my personal philosophy and appreciation of our environment.

It was indeed an honor for me to accept the "Ansel Adams Wilderness Society Award" on behalf of my husband last May. Ansel once said of Phillip: "When history looks back over our decades, Phil Burton will stand out as a colossus of achievement in preserving the beauty of the world and its benedictions on future generations." The same can be said of Ansel Adams.

The citation from the Presidential Medal of Freedom awarded Ansel Adams in 1980 aptly concludes with: "It is through his foresight and fortitude that so much of America has been saved for future Americans."

As long as this rare and wild beauty of nature is protected, we will remember Ansel's work and thank him for his signature across our landscape.

It must be reassuring to Virginia, and all of Ansel's family, to know that such an extraordinary legacy is bequeathed to our Nation.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentlewoman.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from California (Mr. LEHMAN).

Mr. LEHMAN of California. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding, and most especially for arranging this special order today to honor Ansel Adams.

Ansel was a dear and beloved friend of all who care for the integrity of the American landscape. He was a tireless champion of environmental causes, a vigorous advocate of protecting the natural beauty of our coastline, our mountains and our deserts.

It was Ansel Adams more than any other single individual who deserves credit for the establishment of King's Canyon National Park in the congressional district which I represent.

It was his magnificent photographs that finally convinced President Franklin D. Roosevelt of the need to protect this precious segment of the Sierra Nevada in Fresno County, Calif.

His artistry was as diverse as our national parks; but Adams always returned to the Sierra Nevadas for inspiration. Yosemite Valley, the John Muir Trail, and Mono Lake have no better friend than this photo laureate of the American West.

Adams vision, his humor, and his fresh approach to the world around us are the human legacy he has left alongside his art.

Ansel Adams illuminated the grandeur of California's remarkable landscape for millions who had never experienced it.

For those of us who have, he both deepened and sharpened our awareness that great miracles are still happening all around us. His impact as a Sierra naturalist can only be compared with John Muir. His work will survive for all time.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

We will miss Ansel Adams, his vitality, his artistry, his dedication, but I think his photographs and his memory will forever inspire others to follow in his footsteps.

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, Ansel Adams is dead at the age of 82. California has lost a favorite son, and the world has lost an artist whose famous photographs have made his name a household word. Adams is the man who has been given credit for turning photography into an art form, and he left 13,000 prints as his legacy of lifetime achievement.

Born in San Francisco in 1902, Adams was originally trained as a concert pianist. But by the age of 28, he decided that photography was his true calling, and within 2 years he opened his first one-man show. Adams broadened his talents over the years to become author, teacher, and critic.

Ansel Adams is probably best known for two black and white photographs from the 1940's that captured split-second scenes of nature in all its splendor. "Moonrise, Hernandez, New Mexico" 1941 was made even more dramatic after years of experimenting with developing techniques in the darkroom. Adams captured his beloved Yosemite National Park in 1944 with "Clearing Winter Storm."

His respect for the outdoors earned him a position on the board of directors for the Sierra Club, where he worked for 37 years as a dedicated protector of the environment. In that role, he was frequently called upon to testify on Capitol Hill where he sought to influence legislators and Presidents alike.

In a fitting tribute to Adams in his dual roles as artist and environmentalist, his ashes will be scattered from the Yosemite mountain peak whose majesty he captured on film, and whose timeless beauty he fought to protect.

All of what I have said is a part of the public record of this great man's life. As a personal note I should add that while I had met him on one or two occasions, I was proud of the fact that he was concerned enough about environmental politics to support my campaigns over the years. He was knowledgeable, concerned, and involved in a wide range of issues, and he put his money where his concerns were. There should be more men like Ansel Adams.●

● Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker—

Life gives you pretty much what you give it. She gives beauty to those who try to add to her beauty. She gives happiness to those who share her happiness with her. She gives, even, love to those who love her.

This quote aptly describes Ansel Adams and his zeal for life. Ansel was a very special and selfless man who generously shared his talents and energies with others. Indeed, he was a man who constantly gave to others. Much more than an outstanding photographer who filled our lives with beauty, he made us respect photography as an art form and taught us to appreciate the beauty or our natural landscape, which can so easily be taken for granted.

Ansel Adams did not limit himself to photographing beauty—he sought to preserve it in other ways. He was active in environmental causes and frequently spoke out on various environmental issues. In the thirties he worked hard to convince Congress of the need to establish Kings Canyon National Park and was successful in his efforts. He became very active in the Sierra Club, contributing frequently to its bulletin and serving as its director for 37 years. His love for life and the opportunities it presented was unlimited.

Aside from perfecting his own craft, he shared with others his techniques through various books which he published and the seminars and lectures that he conducted at various colleges and universities.

Ansel Adams will always be remembered as a man who gave his all throughout his life—and in return, life gave him beauty and happiness in his work.●

● Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, Ansel Adams is no longer with us and we mourn his death, but what a life he lived and what a legacy he left. From my position as chairman of the Interior Appropriations Subcommittee, I know how his years of work with the Sierra Club and the conservation movement have enriched this country. Ansel Adams made photography an art form and he used that art and his passion and intellect to enrich our lives and to protect the beauty of this world. His life was a magnificent blend of the artistic and intellectual with the technical and very practical aspects of the 20th century. We and our children are in his debt, and I offer my most sincere condolences to Mrs. Adams and his family.●

● Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, it is with deep regret that I acknowledge the passing of a man so great as Ansel Adams, truly a legend in his own time.

The talents of Ansel Adams helped to instill a sense of pride in the hearts of all those who live in the Great Western United States. His ability to capture the strength and beauty of such western treasures as the Yosemite Valley made him a hero to lovers of the outdoors. In addition, his photographic techniques revolutionized the field and left an important legacy for generations to come.

Yet, for all his artistic talent, Ansel Adams was also a humanitarian. He spent much of his time teaching, establishing facilities for education, and sharing his artistic appreciation with a variety of Americans. Ansel Adams' artistic vision showed us a glimpse of our world that we had never seen before, and his humanitarian vision taught us how to appreciate it.●

● Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in memory of Ansel Adams. This man was a brilliant artist who, for over half a century, showed us the splendor of America in a unique, clear, and sensitive way. He brought new meaning to the art of photography for he pioneered the concept that photography could be more than mere documentation; indeed, it could express a world vision.

Since childhood, I have been an avid amateur photographer. The work of Ansel Adams influenced me from the start. I have experimented with different films, light sources, and processing techniques, shooting a variety of subjects and thoroughly enjoying this fascinating hobby.

Most of us remember Ansel Adams for his photos of the exceptional places of natural beauty in our country. He was a passionate speaker for protecting the environment and traveled extensively. Some of his best known and beloved works are dramatic scenes taken in the Sierra Nevada Range and the Southwest.

Mr. Adams' desire to depict America extended to his interest in people, as well. In 1944, he published a photographic survey of the Manzanar relocation camp in California where Americans of Japanese ancestry were interned during World War II. The title of this book, "Born Free and Equal," plainly stated Ansel Adams' concern for minority groups and the injustice to which one particular group was exposed. He used his superior skills as a photographer to insure that a tragic part of our Nation's history would not be forgotten.

The powerful photographs in this book, along with his legacy of exquisite pictures of our natural world, reflect a man of courage, ingenuity, and dedication to his art. It is with sadness that I note the death of Ansel Adams, yet there is strength in knowing that his noble contributions to our American heritage will live on.

Thank you.●

● Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague from California, LEON PANETTA, for his leadership in arranging this special order on behalf of Ansel Adams. He is a man the world will truly miss, and I am honored to be able to pay tribute to him.

Ansel Adams died a week ago last Sunday at the age of 82. He was probably the best known photographer in the United States. He devoted more than 50 years to his career and he became the most widely exhibited and recognized photographer of his lifetime. World renowned for his dramatic landscapes of the American West, Adams was also acclaimed for his contributions to photographic technology and photography as an art form.

In addition to his work as a photographer, Adams was a prolific teacher and writer, an environmental activist and a part-time lobbyist. He often testified here in Washington on behalf of protecting and preserving the environment he so passionately treasured.

His photographs have been published in more than 35 books and portfolios, and his own books have sold more than a million copies. A frequent lecturer at the Museum of Modern Art and at colleges all along the Pacific coast, Adams also conducted workshops and seminars in the Yosemite Valley. It was Yosemite where Adams shot his first photographs with a box Brownie camera.

Ansel Adams has left a lasting impression on our lives. And although his physical life has ended, his wonderful spirit and his treasured art form will be with us always.

Last Sunday, the attached article appeared in the Los Angeles Times, opinion section, which beautifully illustrates Ansel Adams' contribution to photographic art. I ask unanimous consent to reprint this article so that I may share it with my colleagues.

A HISTORIC ACT OF FAITH IN THE LAND—ANSEL ADAMS' ROMANTIC ROOTS

(By William Wilson)

When Ansel Adams died last Sunday at age 82, we lost a pioneer camera artist of grandiose vision. In his vintage years he had himself become something of a national monument, like the magnificent mountains, valleys and rivers he photographed. He was very nearly more of a folk hero of media mythology than an artist. His pictures were widely appreciated, but that had something to do with his looking like a salty, white-bearded backwoodsman who fought for ecological causes and made pictures that broke records at auction during a now-defunct boom in art photography. It is well for the citizens who thought of him as Paul Bunyan to remember he had wanted to be a concert pianist. It is well for aesthetic perfectionists who felt him tainted by popularity to contemplate his real contribution.

Because he worked with lens and film, developing methods of expression unique to his medium, there is a tendency to regard Ansel Adams as a child of that 150-odd years the photographic art has been with us, a "modern" artist. His was, however, a 19th-century sensibility at its core.

Adams' imagery belongs to an archetypal American preoccupation with the Land. It is a vision cradled in the European Renaissance, when bit by bit it dawned on brave explorers of the sea that there literally was a New World out there. It's hard for us to recreate the immense upsurge of adrenaline that discovery must have caused in every soul from the soldier of fortune to the idealist and debtor longing for one more chance. Imagine a modern space flight returning with the information that, just out there beyond the moon, lies a perfectly habitable planet just waiting to be colonized. Every jaded earthling with an ounce of imagination would be rejuvenated.

America did that to the Old World's worn soul. The continent was settled because that bracing vision of the Land hovered ever before its enthralled votaries. The Land of Promise. The Promised Land. It has all the resonance of religious revelation. No matter how venal, stupid, violent and exploitative humankind became, the Land remained forever both virginal and fecund. Frederick Edwin Church painted its awesome Andes peaks like atavistic gods cloaked in gorgeous sunsets. Martin Johnson Heade saw the Land benign and nurturing, covered with mammalian haystacks.

There we have it. The essential American artistic vision had to be based on the fixated American beatific conception: the Land. To this day Europeans confronted with vintage American art see landscape as our most inspired accomplishment. We have used landscape for eveything. Thomas Cole spoke moral allegory through it. Castles hovered in the sky. The Hudson River School's meandering river enjoyed sluggish transcendental contemplation. The Luminists brought hallowed stillness. Alfred Pinkham Ryder disgorged a nightmare of tiny boats about to capsize in tumultuous seas lit by a seductive, indifferent moon. By the time Jackson Pollock gets hold of it, most folks can no longer see it's landscape and we have outrun our story.

Ansel Adams was not the last to inherit the recognizable version of the American Sublime, but he was one of the last to make it move us. He did so here in the West, in California and Yosemite where Albert Bierstadt had once made Manifest Destiny sing in orotund operatic choruses of paint. My country tisofthee on the big rock candy mountain and down in the valley solo.

Something was eroding paradise. History rained it with countless droplets of war, doubt and empty pop-top beer cans. Ansel Adams came to grips with that. If Mt. Rushmore is really only an ashtray, you have to admit that Death Valley, Mt. Williamson and the towering peaks of Yosemite are only shades of black and white made to appear on a peice of paper by chemicals in solution.

The place of glorious fulfillment changed its location. It was still out there at certain specific sites in the world. It was, however, no longer universally lodged in the human psyche as the symbol of fulfilled aspiration. We would henceforth settle for a landscape viewed between the French windows and the back fence or spewed upon subway cars with a spray-can. Those with a more exalted conception might make desert landscape with earth-moving machines or try to direct light through a volcano crater, but people would not connect it to the old Sublime.

Ansel Adams kept the link. He retained the shadow of breathtaking nature as an act of individual faith and an invitation to any romantic who willfully assests grand belief in spite of the evidence.●

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, I was deeply saddened this week to learn of the passing of America's best loved and best known photographer, Ansel Adams of California. A warm and good humored friend, Ansel Adams was a man who made it his passion to observe and capture the powerful majesty of nature on film, yet stand in awe of the raw beauty of the outdoors.

Ansel never claimed to be called to the art of photography. Instead, his first love was the inspiring beauty of his native California. As a young man, a trip to Yosemite National Park convinced him of the need for a "visual diary" which would allow him to share the awesome spectacle of the park's features through pictures. A commitment to detail, honed through years of training as a musician, drove Ansel to perfect his pictures and master the photographic arts. His favorite subject in those early years, Yosemite, would be an intimate part of his work for more than 50 years.

A deep motivation to capture the truest image possible led Ansel to explore the intricacies of photography in pursuit of clarity, beauty of tone, and sharpness of detail. His brief work with the talented young photographers in Group f/64 in the early thirties produced a school of thought that strongly influenced the direction of American photography. To students of the technical aspects of the photography, Ansel Adams will be remembered for his development of the "zone system" to control tone and specific textures and contrasts in each part of his panoramic views of nature.

The technical contributions of the man are but a small part of what made Adams the revered figure he is in American photographic circles and among the people. Adams was simply in love with the natural beauty of this country. In its varied settings he observed the wonder of natural design and texture. By capturing that beauty for millions of people who would get no closer to the wilderness than a book of pictures, Adams instilled in generations of Americans an appreciation and love for the natural diversity of their homeland.

He was quietly religious. But for those of us who knew Ansel and viewed the reverence with which he approached his subjects in nature, there could be little doubt of his deep love of the forces that had created the world he sought to photograph. The greatest works of art are created by God, but thankfully a few mortals are capable of preserving the beauty and wonder of such works with a depth of sensation that touches all mankind. Ansel Adams was such a man.

Many of my colleagues are well aware of Ansel's deep commitment to insuring that the natural beauty of our country would be preserved for our future generations. The sight of this large, broad-shouldered, Stetson-wearing man with the perpetual smile was well-known in our Nation's Capitol. He was a hard-nosed and empassioned advocate of wilderness conservation and strengthening of our national park system. He would remind us that we held the beauty of our Nation in our hands, and failure to protect those natural wonders would irreparably damage the character of America.

Ansel was honored many times for his commitment to conserving America's natural beauty. The Sierra Club, an organization which he served as a director for more than 35 years, honored him with their Muir Conservation Award in 1963. The U.S. Department of the Interior presented him with the Conservation Service Award in 1968. President Carter paid tribute to a distinguished career by presenting Ansel with the Presidential Medal of Freedom in 1980. And five prestigious American universities added to his laurels by conferring honorary doctorate degrees on the basis of his lasting contribution to photography and conservation.

The publication of 7 original portfolios and 30 books kept Ansel constantly on the move throughout the United States. He was far more than a "western photographer," though his works in that area alone would have insured his fame. Instead, he traveled widely to experience the diversity of his country. From Hawaii and Alaska to New England, Ansel pursued the grandeur of the American outdoors. He largely sought to capture landscapes free of man's influence, dramatically breaking with that tradition in 1944 when he published the moving "Born Free and Equal" which depicted the lives of Japanese-Americans interred at the Manzanar Relocation Center in California during World War II.

Always, though, he would return to his lifelong home of northern California. While he made his final home in Carmel, he would often walk the coastline and photograph the foothills of my district in the San Francisco Bay Area. Knowing the beauty of the area so well, I have always been amazed at Ansel's ability to find one more new vista to photograph that seemed to be created just for him.

The passing of Ansel Adams at the age of 82 has saddened his friends and appreciators. But the vision of this man will not pass as long as his photographs capture the brooding strength of the outdoors. America will remember Adams as a man who walked softly through the forests, and viewed the richness of this land as a blessing for all generations to behold. Ansel Adams will be remembered as a man who illuminated the land he loved with an eloquent light.●

● Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, April 22, Ansel Adams, one of the great creative artists of our time, perhaps the greatest photographer, a leading conservationist and a magnificent human being, passed away at the age of 82.

Ansel Adams, one of the warmest and most unpretentious of human beings, suddenly looms bigger than life. It is difficult, in retrospect, to reconcile his legendary achievements, as an artist and as a human being, with the compass of a human life, even one that filled 82 years of living to the full.

Mr. Speaker, I was one of the many who had the real pleasure and privilege of getting to know Ansel Adams personally, to experience his humor and generosity, his dedication to preserving the American earth, and to hear some of his insights as a creative artist. Being an amateur photographer myself and a Member of Congress who shared his love of our land and its natural beauty, I felt like a disciple sitting at the foot of the master.

Only last month, I received a note from Ansel, written on one of his beautiful photographic notecards, urging timely action to protect the South Fork of the Merced River in California. I was happy to be able to report to him that Congressman TONY COELHO had introduced legislation to accomplish that purpose and that a hearing on it has been scheduled by the Public Lands Subcommittee. Ansel concluded his note with the statement that he was dedicating the last of his diminishing energies to the struggle to bring a more sensitive national leadership, believing that "the world as we know it" hangs in the balance.

Our finest tribute to the vision and genius of Ansel Adams will be to carry on his work of protecting our great natural heritage, revealed in all its mystical beauty by his superb photographic works or art.

Mr. Speaker, I offer for printing in the RECORD, following these remarks, two articles about Ansel Adams from the Washington Post of April 24. One, by Paul Richard, is entitled "1902–1984: Master of the Camera, Poet of the Landscape, Protector of the Wild." The other article, by Dale Russakoff, is a brief but sensitive biographical sketch summarizing Ansel Adam's life of twin commitment to art and activism.

1902–1984: MASTER OF THE CAMERA, POET OF THE LANDSCAPE, PROTECTOR OF THE WILD

At photography—and politics—Ansel Adams was a master.

When he came to Washington, as he often did, Adams would dress up like the Old Man of the Mountains. He'd were a string tie and a Stetson. He'd scratch his grizzled beard, grin his impish grin, snap his red suspenders—and go about his business with implacable intensity. Adams had two missions here. One was selling photographs. The other was pressuring politicians into helping him preserve the wild landscapes that he loved.

At both of his two missions, Adams, 82—whose heart gave out on Sunday night—was enormously successful. He was the grand old man of the environmental movement. His photographs appear in nearly a million books. He had countless exhibitions and honors. He was best loved and best known of American photographers.

Adams was in some ways a 19th-century artist who flourished in the 20th. The technically impeccable, usually unpeopled, photographs that brought him fame blend two differing traditions of American landscape art, one factual, one fanciful.

Adams was not the first good artist to go into the mountains. The western landscapes he portrayed had been portrayed in the previous century by photographers and painters. The painters leaned toward poetry, the photographers toward prose. They taught him different things.

"Not everybody trusts painting," said Adams, "but people believe photographs."

His photographs are believable in part because their details seem absolutely right. When he shows a still-young aspen tree growing in New Mexico, one can take a magnifying glass and study every leaf. When he shows a field of stones, one can see the texture of every rounded rock.

Adams as a lobbyist was comparably effective. His pictures of California's Kings Canyon, hand-carried to Washington in the 1930s, helped lead to the creation of the 455,000-acre Kings Canyon National Park. Adams, a Sierra Club director from 1936 to 1970, worked over every President from Franklin Roosevelt to Ronald Reagan. He made phone calls, he wrote letters. When Interior Secretary James Watt was in office, Adams would dash off a letter of complaint—to newspapers and congressmen—almost every day.

"You should see him lobby," said his friend Bill Turnage in 1979. After seven years as Adams' business manager, Turnage had become the head of the Wilderness Society. When Adams came to Washington, they would work the Hill together.

"We run this Abbott and Castello act," said Turnage. "I let Ansel start. he speaks about the spirit, then I hit them with the details."

Adams the photographer took a similar approach. The majesty of landscape, and its minutiae, too—the spirit and the details—dance together beautifully in his finest works of art.

He was a masterful technician. He invented the "zone system" of exposure, he taught 5,000 students, and his printing sets a standard that has rarely been surpassed. When, in 1932, Adams, Edward Weston, Imogen Cunningham and Willard Van Dyke began to work together, they called themselves "Group f64," in honor of the smallest lens opening then available. They like f64 because it offered the greatest depth of field and the sharpest possible focus. "A lot of younger American photographers," observes John Szarkowski of the Museum of Modern Art, "have no clue about how much they've been influenced by Ansel's rigorous sense of obligation to using the machine well."

The scientist in Adams insisted on the precise replication of the smallest detail. But he was a poet, too.

"Ansel Adams was complaining about the clouds when I first met him," wrote David Brower, then director of the Sierra Club. "They weren't yet what they ought to be, but he thought they would get better."

The early western photographers took nature as they found it. C. L. Weed, C. E. Watkins, E. J. Muybridge and their colleagues were rock-hard men who left us rock-hard pictures. They cared little for the arty. They were scientists, explorers. They rode mules to Yosemite. Their cameras were cumbersome, their lenses were handground. They hauled carboys of acid and fragile glass plates up the rocky slopes. They did not sleep in lodges, but outside, on the ground. Their pictures call to mind the pictures the first astronauts took from outer space. They brought back to the cities accurate, convincing images of marvels rarely glimpsed before.

Bierstadt and Moran and other 19th-century painters of the mountains cared less for reportage than they did for drama. Their pictures feel like operas. In the wilds they made sketches that were relatively straightforward. But when they returned to New York, to their studios, they pulled out all the stops. Their lakes are just a bit too clear, their peaks a bit too high. They liked to dress their mountains with waterfalls and rainbows, sunsets, stormy clouds, little bears and deer. Their pictures aren't believable. They are too gaudy, too romantic.

Like Bierstadt, like Moran, Adams often stretched the truth a bit. He wasn't always a "straight" photographer. He once admitted that he dodged the crosses in the foreground of his "Moonrise, Hernandez, New Mexico," his most famous image, to make them just a bit lighter and more ghostly.

As a young man in California, Adams studied to be a pianist. The day he died, his family and friends gathered in his Carmel, Calif., home to hear a recital by his favorite pianist, Vladimir Ashkenazy. When he talked about the aims that guided him in art, Adams often spoke of seeking "spiritual resonance, as moving and profound as great music." When one looks at Adams' photographs, one can almost feel him there behind the camera, a maestro in control, conducting all those boiling clouds and those shafts of sunlight that seem to shoot, on cue, through the stormy clouds.

"Purism, in the sense of rigid abstention from any control, is ridiculous," he wrote. "A great photograph is a full expression of what one feels about what is being photographed in the deepest sense, and is, thereby, a true expression of what one feels about life in its entirety."

Washington's Harry Lunn, the dealer who helped make Adams rich, used to say, "there are two markets for photography—there is one for Ansel Adams, and one for everybody else."

A single print of "Moonrise" sold recently for $71,500. It wasn't a unique object; its edition had been "limited" to 942. Suppose each "Moonrise" print is worth that much. That means that the artist, with one click of his shutter in 1941, had made a golden goose whose golden eggs today have a combined market value of more than $67 million.

The most popular American artists—Norman Rockwell, Andrew Wyeth, and Adams, too—tend to lend their art a quality of almost shameless emotional exaggeration. Most of Wyeth's pictures are a bit too morbid, most of Rockwell's too goody-goody. Szarkowski writes that "the natural world," as seen by Adams, "is infinitely varied in aspect . . .: its grand vistas and its microcosms are never twice the same . . .; the landscape is not only a place, but an event."

Still, something in his pictures suggests a benign propaganda. No tin cans mar his landscapes. His elegant, authoritative, perfectly made prints show us what we wish the world outside to be. He was a true believer. His mission was to awe.

One great photographer, Paul Strand, helped show Ansel Adams the path that led to art. Another, Alfred Stieglitz, gave Adams his first one-man show 46 years ago.

"It is all very beautiful and magical here," Adams wrote Stieglitz from New Mexico many years ago. What he said of that landscape could describe the viewer's experience of Ansel Adam's art:

"The skies and land are so enormous and the detail so precise and exquisite that wherever you are you are isolated in a glowing world between the macro and the micro—where everything is sidewise under you and over you, and the clocks stopped long ago."

ANSEL ADAMS, PHOTOGRAPHER AND ENVIRONMENTALIST, DIES AT 82

(By Dale Russakoff)

Ansel Adams, the photographer who celebrated the majesty of nature through panoramic pictures of the virgin American West and a lifetime of environmental activism, died of a heart ailment Sunday at a hospital near his home in Carmel, Calif. He was 82.

Renowned for his twin commitment to art and activism, Mr. Adams worked at both causes until the end. He had recently finished his autobiography and was at work on a series of technical books on photography. On the day he died, aides said he dictated notes on his concern over threats to the natural environment.

Mr. Adams was one of a small group of 20th-century photographers credited with elevating his field from a hobby to an art form. He took his first snapshot at age 14 in Yosemite National Park with a Kodak Brownie box camera and spent much of the rest of his life capturing on film the contrasting light, beauty, and power of the American wilderness.

"We will remember him more than anything else for his vision of the western landscape," said John Szarkowski, director of the department of photography at the Museum of Modern Art in New York City. "He understood that the earth was not just a sculpture, it was an event, constantly changing. That's what he explained in his pictures, which is why they were so moving and why they gave us another sense of what the world was about."

Szarkowski and others said it was Mr. Adams' creative energy and intensity, as much as his artistic achievement, that distinguished him. Even in his later years, friends said, it took two, full-time darkroom assistants working in shifts to keep up with him.

Mr. Adams' heralded photographs of Kings Canyon and his personal lobbying efforts as a director of the Sierra Club in the 1930s helped persuade Congress to preserve the 455,000-acre wilderness area as a national park.

For the past three years, he wrote a letter a day to congressmen and newspapers decrying the Reagan administration's environmental policies, which he once branded "the Pearl Harbor of our American earth." He often said that only his Pacemaker and his fight against Reagan and former Interior Secretary James G. Watt kept him alive.

Last summer, after Mr. Adams told Playboy in an interview, "I hate Reagan," the president invited the photographer-conservationist to meet with him. After a 50-minute session at a Los Angeles hotel, Mr. Adams emerged to call the president "sincerely cordial" but unconvincing. Borrowing a phrase from Oscar Wilde, he said Reagan "knows the cost of everything and the value of nothing."

"Ansel believed everyone had a responsibility in the larger world, that an artist couldn't just withdraw," said William A. Turnage, executive director of the Wilderness Society and a close friend and former business manager of Mr. Adams. "He became one of the most important environmentalists of the century. His work had a tremendous impact on the way Americans understand nature."

Born in San Francisco Feb. 20, 1902, Mr. Adams had his first encounter with the raw power of nature at age 4, when the great earthquake of 1906 hurled him into a brick wall, leaving him with a broken nose that later became one of his best-known trademarks, along with his brushy white beard, tall presence and Stetson hat.

He embarked first on a career as a concert pianist, with photography as a hobby, but committed himself full time to the camera and the serious study of light, form and nature in 1930. He dated this interest to 1915, when at age 13, he went daily to see the Armory Show, the revolutionary modern art exhibit of impressionists and surrealists, at the San Francisco World's Fair.

Mr. Adams returned to Yosemite each summer after snapping his first picture there. In 1919, he joined the Sierra Club, and later became caretaker of its Yosemite Valley headquarters. He became an expert mountaineer in pursuit of pictures of the vast, rocky expanse.

"The excitement of Yosemite became strong and filtered through me into some esthetic experiences, which probably were supported by similar experience I was having in music study," Mr. Adams recalled in a 1975 interview.

Mr. Adams' early works were impressionistic and soft-focus, but under the influence of photographer Paul Strand, whom he met in 1930 in Taos, N.M., he moved toward conveying sharp, stark details. In 1932, he joined Edward Weston, Imogen Cunningham and others to form Group f/64, whose name refers to the small lens opening of a camera, symbolizing the depth of field and sharpness of image that Mr. Adams and his compatriots sought.

In 1935, Mr. Adams attracted the attention of the renowned photographer, Alfred Stieglitz, with his first technical manual, "Making a Photograph." The next year, Stieglitz sponsored a one-man show of Mr. Adams' work titled "An American Place," at his New York City gallery.

Over the years, Mr. Adams helped develop the concept of "equivalents," which he described as the link between the spiritual excitement that a photographer feels about his subject and the image he creates of it. He said this allows the spectator to create his own "equivalent."

Mr. Adams also was a proponent of the concept of "visualization," which frowns on retouching, requiring an artist to see and feel the final print of a picture before releasing the camera shutter. He developed the breakthrough "zone system" of film exposure to control specific textures and contrasts in each part of a panoramic vista.

A prolific writer, Mr. Adams published a series of technical works, known as the Basic Photo Books, and numerous collections of his photographs, of which the most famous include the luminous and haunting "Moonrise, Hernandez, New Mexico," and the mystical "Monolith, the Face of Half Dome."

More than 1 million copies of his books have been sold, and more than 5,000 students have attended his workshops. He is also well known for "Born Free and Equal," a photographic record of the lives of thousands of Japanese Americans interned at the Manzanar Relocation Center in California during World War II.

Mr. Adams helped launch the first department of photography as a fine art at the Museum of Modern Art in 1940, and in 1946 he founded the first academic department of photography at what was then the California School of Fine Arts.

On Sunday, Swiss pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy performed at Mr. Adams' home overlooking the spectacular Big Sur coastline in a private concert scheduled months earlier. He then visited Mr. Adams at Monterey's Community Hospital, where the photographer had been confined since Friday, and gave his friend a tape of his latest recording of Brahms.

Mr. Adams spent the day reading newspapers and a mystery book, dictating his thoughts on photography and conservation into his tape recorder and listening to Ashkenazy's tape on his Walk-Man, said Mary Alinder, Mr. Adams' chief assistant and editor of his autobiography.

"He was Ansel right to the end," Alinder said.

Survivors include his wife of 56 years, the former Virginia Best, of Carmel; a daughter, Anne Helms, and a son, Dr. Michael Adams.●

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of this special order on Ansel Adams.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

□ 1810

UNDERMINING OF U.S. FOREIGN POLICY BY THE CONGRESS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. GINGRICH, is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I want to talk this afternoon about the recent letter to Commandante Daniel Ortega signed by 10 Members of this House and its relationship to the Logan Act, and act which was passed in 1799 by the Congress of the United States. I am going to use as a source for that both the original letter signed by Congressman WRIGHT of Texas and nine other Members of the House; a recent editorial in the Atlanta Journal; an analysis of the Logan Act by Michael Seitzinger, legislative attorney, American Law Division; and the actual debates and proceedings of the Congress of the United States in 1799.

Let me start by saying that the recent disclosure that there was a letter from American Congressmen to a foreign government stating explicitly, and I quote: "We have been and remain opposed to U.S. support for military action directed against the people or Government of Nicaragua," has aroused a certain amount of interest.

First of all, the Atlanta Journal, in a recent editorial on April 26 entitled "'Crime' and Punishment" says, and I quote:

U.S. Representative Newt Gingrich plans to introduce a "resolution of disapproval" against 10 Congressmen who wrote a sort of "get well" letter to Nicaragua's Marxist leader.

The editorial goes on:

* * * his "resolution of disapproval" is a step toward penalizing Congressmen who want to set their own foreign policies.

But it's not enough. The letter presents a dangerous trend toward self-negotiation by U.S. officials, a trend that undermines the adopted policies of the U.S. Government and further fragments American leadership.

So Gingrich's "resolution of disapproval" hardly fits the offense. The Nation needs new, stringent laws to prevent Congressmen from molding their own foreign policies. It needs to reaffirm the principle that only the executive branch has the power to negotiate with foreign governments. And it needs laws that make it a crime to intentionally undercut a policy that has been democratically adopted by the administration and the Congress.

Certainly, Gingrich's measure is better than no punishment at all. But it won't stop other Congressmen from doing it again.

I might make mention of the fact that the Atlanta Journal is normally regarded as a moderate Democratic publication and is certainly not considered a voice of rightwing concern.

The fact that it would consider the letter from Congressman WRIGHT and nine other Members of the Commandante Ortega, the Marxist dictatorship of Nicaragua, is something worthy of being called "a crime," and that is the Atlanta Journal's term, I think is something that people need to look at.

More recently in the Washington Times on April 30 there was a letter from a Col. Otis McCormick, U.S. Army, retired, entitled "Ortega's Congressional Pen-Pals." I would like to read part:

Pat Buchanan's April 20 column, "Mash note to a thug," discusses a letter that, in the case of a declared war, would border on treason. Ten members of Congress, including the Majority Leader Jim Wright and Reps. Michael Barnes and Stephen Solarz, sent a letter to Daniel Ortega, head of the Nicaraguan government controlled by communists and viciously anti-American Sandinistas. Mr. Buchanan details how this letter opposed U.S. action and policy towards Nicaragua. How can this nation survive if so many people will not help our president, who in fact, actively oppose him? Why can we not close ranks behind our president and give him full support in this desperate struggle for survival against those enemy hordes that are getting ever closer?

It is completely ridiculous, and is also inimical to the safety of our country, that so many members of Congress and the media are so prone to promptly and heavily criticize their own country while complimenting or sympathizing with our enemies for some fancied wrong the U.S. may have done to them.

We have been at war with communism since its inception. No, we didn't declare war. We only tried to protect ourselves. They declared war on the United States and the rest of the civilized world many years ago.

Of course, their primary objective now is the United States, the most powerful member of the free world. They have never lost sight of their objective but many members of the free world have been asleep, have been fooled by their propaganda. It is too bad that so many people can only see evil in their own government.

A verse in the Nicaraguan national anthem condemns the United States. Every American should know that.

That is the letter from Otis McCormick, U.S. Army, retired.

Third, I received a very informative letter from a man who has had considerable experience in U.S. foreign policy, Carl Lichtenstein, senior fellow at the Heritage Foundation and former U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations, a man who has seen American foreign policy undercut by the Congress, and a man who has personally witnessed the kind of problems we must deal with. He says in a letter dated April 23:

THE HERITAGE FOUNDATION,
April 23, 1984.

Hon. NEWT GINGRICH,
U.S. House of Representatives, Longworth House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR NEWT: Whenever my capacity for outrage begins to exhaust itself, some new provocation seems always to emerge—and that is exactly what has happened regarding the letter of the Majority Leader and his House Democratic colleagues to Commandante Daniel Ortega of the Sandinist junta, the letter of March 20.

I want you to know how much I admire and support what you are attempting to do, in running up urgent warning flags, and how imperative it is for our country—indeed, for freedom in our hemisphere—that you succeed.

"Outrage" is too bland a word. It does not begin to fit the deed. I join in your judgment that this invasion of executive prerogative, this intrusion into the making (and unmaking) of U.S. foreign policy reflects (1) profound unconstitutionality, (2) almost certain illegality, and (3) a depth of ignorance and even contemptuous disregard of real world challenges that is quite simply frightening.

On the constitutional issue, there seems to me no room for doubt. This effort, particularly on the part of ten legislative leaders who have been unsuccessful in working their will through the regular processes of decision-making, is an impermissible intrusion into the exclusive power of the President to conduct U.S. foreign policy. Whatever these ten may think of its wisdom, or its efficacy, or even its morality, the policy of the United States in Central America has been repeatedly articulated by the President—as early as February 1982 in his address to a Joint Session of the Congress—and by his responsible deputies in the executive branch, and in effect reaffirmed by the Bipartisan Commission in its balanced, authoritative, unanimous conclusions issued last fall. As I have always understood the U.S. constitutional system, that is the way in which U.S. foreign policy is and ought to be laid down—not by a self-styled one-party leadership elite in one house of the Congress. These ten in particular know full well how the legislative role in the broad oversight of U.S. foreign policy is appropriately exercised.

I am not a lawyer. But I have no hesitation in suggesting, moreover, that the transmission of this letter to the leader of a foreign government with which our country maintains formal diplomatic ties is a flagrant violation of the Logan Act which, as you pointed out in your statement in the House, since 1798 has barred "personal" and "private" diplomacy. I cannot help but recall the firestorm of criticism that greeted the efforts of Senator Joseph McCarthy of Wisconsin in 1953 to negotiate with Greek shipowners concerning the use of their vessels in trade with Mainland or Communist China. President Eisenhower denounced this intrusion into executive prerogative, and Secretary of State John Foster Dulles demanded an apology, in effect, and a promise to sin no more—which in fact he got from the senator in a public statement.

What makes this analogy even more pointed, it seems to me, is that (1) the senator's critics in the Congress were the partisan and ideological forefathers of the ten who now sign the letter to Commandante Ortega, (2) that Senator McCarthy never even presumed to deal directly with the leadership of a sovereign government, and (3) that the present case involves a matter of immediate strategic interest to the United States, as the earlier case did not, and an explicit commitment by the U.S. government and the American people. I refer of course to our commitment, in which the Congress has joined, to the Nicaraguan freedom fighters who are laying their lives on the line in opposition to the Cuban- and Soviet-supported Sandinist junta which is both "exporting revolution" throughout Central America and eradicating the freedoms of the Nicaraguan people, in violation of its own pledges of 1979.

This last point gets to the heart of the present controversy over U.S. assistance to non-Communist and anti-Communist governments and indigenous forces in Central America—U.S. support for those who are fighting to preserve or to secure their freedom and independence from totalitarianism, and to defend their countries against externally-inspired and supported Marxist-Leninist aggression. On either score, it reveals astonishing naivete (or ignorance) on the part of the House Democratic ten to address to the Sandinist junta an appeal for "serious negotiations for broad political participation in El Salvador" in the face of all that we have so painfully learned since 1945 about the predictable results of "power-sharing" with militant Communists. This naivete (or ignorance) is compounded when the ten dare to "commend" the Commandante for "taking steps to open up the political process in your country" (concerning which seeing will be believing) "in the midst of ongoing military hostilities on the borders of Nicaragua".

Even aside from constitutional and legal considerations, in other words, this backdoor diplomacy by the House Democratic ten reflects a policy orientation that threatens to deal away the Central American republics' last hopes for resistance to externally-supported aggression and puts at grave risk the strategic interests of the United States in the immediate neighborhood of our hemisphere. As you also point out, the letter to the Commandante invites him to disregard the official policy of the United States, to appeal over the President's head to some apparently "higher" U.S. constituency, and to look to this self-styled House Democratic "state department" as a negotiating partner. The sheer hubris, the presumption of these ten is as awesome as it it frightening.

The message, is critically important to our country. I will do whatever I can to support and supplement your effort and stand ready, always, to assist you in every possible way.

Sincerely,

CHARLES M. LICHENSTEIN,
Senior Fellow.

As I said, that is a letter from a man who served for 3 years as the Deputy U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations and who has lived through a process of watching this Congress undercut foreign policy.

Now, in that setting, I have reviewed the Logan Act, and I think that it is very important to look carefully at the Logan Act in this context.

As I mentioned earlier, Durward McAllister, the editor of the Atlanta Journal, in a column by him on April 24 had raised also the issue and had said: "United States foreign policy is in peril."

I think that it is important that we look at this whole question.

Let me start by quoting the summary from Mr. Michael Seitzinger of the American Law Division on the Logan Act:

Although the Logan Act was intended to cover relations between private citizens of the United States and foreign governments, there appear to have been no prosecutions under the act. However, the act has not been forgotten and remains as a sanction against anyone who, without authority, interferes in the foreign relations of the United States.

The question seems to me very simple: First, when the term "private citizen" is used, does that mean somebody who is not in elected office, or does that mean everyone except the executive branch? Second, were there in fact any interferences in the foreign relations of the United States and if there were, was there any authority for those interferences? Third, what did the framers of the Logan Act intend when they passed the original act in 1799?

Let me first focus on the analysis of the act. The act was passed in 1799. I think the setting has to be understood here. The United States was involved in very difficult negotiations with revolutionary France. Many people in that period saw revolutionary France as a universal radicalizing power, much along the tradition of the Communist Soviet Union today.

There were Jacobean clubs and efforts to relate to revolutionary France in this period, much as in the modern era there are various subversive activities involving the Soviet Union.

In 1779, President Adams sent John Marshall, Charles Pinckney, and Elbridge Gerry as special envoys to France to negotiate and settle claims and causes of differences which existed between the French Directory and the U.S. This mission resulted in the XYZ letters controversy. And its failures led to such strong anti-France feelings in the United States that preparations for war were begun by the Congress.

After the unsuccessful envoys returned from France, Dr. George Logan, a Philadelphia Quaker, a doctor and a representative, decided to attempt on his own to settle the controversies. Bearing a private certificate of citizenship from his friend Thomas Jefferson, who at the time was Vice President, Logan sailed for France on June 12, 1798.

In France, he was hailed by the newspapers as the envoy of peace and was received by Talleyrand. The French Directory having concluded that it was politically wise to relax tensions with the United States, issued a decree raising the embargo on American ships and freed ships and seamen.

Logan, however, received a less friendly response from the United States after he returned. Secretary of State Pickering told him that the French decree was illusory. George Washington expressed his disapproval of Logan's actions. President Adams recommended Congress take action to stop the "temerity and impertinence of individuals effecting to interfere in public affairs between France and the United States."

"Representative Roger Griswold of Connecticut introduced a resolution in Congress to prevent action similar to Logan's," resolved that a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of amending the Act entitled: "An Act in addition to the Act for the Punishment of Certain Crimes against the U.S." so far as to extend the penalties if need be to all persons, citizens of the United States who shall usurp the Executive authority of this government by commencing or carrying on any correspondence with the governments of any foreign princes or state, relating to controversies or disputes which do or shall exist between such princes or state and the United States.

Let me stop for a moment to make three points about the initial resolution introduced by Roger Griswold of Connecticut.

First it says, "All persons citizens of the United States"; second, it focuses on usurping the Executive authority. It does not say the government, the constitutionally elected, it says Executive authority.

Third, it distinctly mentions correspondence "by commencing or carrying on any correspondence" and so forth.

Finally, it refers to controversies or disputes, not war; controversies or disputes. So as it relates to the Dear Commandante letter of the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WRIGHT) and nine other Members of this House the question is first of all are they persons; second, are they in the executive branch, third, did they commence or carry on any correspondence, and fourth, was it relating to controversies or disputes?

Now this of course is Mr. Griswold's initial resolution. Let us continue with what happened.

The resolution was passed and the committee was appointed. On January 7, 1779, Griswold introduced in the House a bill based on the resolution.

Going back again, the bill was passed on January 17, 1799, in the House; on January 25, 1799, in the Senate and it was signed and became a law on January 30, 1799.

Now, I think at this point it is very important to look at the judicial references. Is the Logan Act in fact in its current form an irrelevancy or is it still a real law? After all, it has been a long time since 1799, it is not something which we have looked at for a long time.

So let us look at it again. There are references to the Long Act. No one has ever been prosecuted under it, but there are a number of occasions in which there have been references made. In 1863, Judge Sprague of the Circuit Court for the District of Massachusetts mentioned the Logan Act in saying:

We have seen it stated in such form as to a reasonable attention that unauthorized individuals have entered into communication with members of Parliament and foreign ministers and officers in order to influence their conduct in controversies with the United States or to defeat the measures of our government. It ought to be known that such acts have long been prohibited by law.

Notice here that Judge Sprague refers to communications in order to influence the conduct of foreign governments. In other words, to communicate with a foreign government during a controversy in order to change that government's behavior according to Judge Sprague back in 1863 is a question which has to be looked at and which has to be, and again I quote:

"It ought to be known that such acts have long been prohibited by law," a reference to the Logan Act.

In 1909, in American Banana Co. versus United Fruit Co., there is a reference to the Logan Act.

In 1951, in the United States versus the Peace Information Center, and I quote:

The court at 261 mentioned similarities between the Logan Act and the Foreign Agents Registration Act and the language used appeared to indicate that the Logan Act, like the Foreign Agents Registration Act, is constitutional.

Citizens of the United States are forbidden to carry on correspondence or intercourse with any foreign government with an intent to influence its measure or conduct in relation to disputes or controversies with the United States.

Let me reread this because I think it is very important to look at. And I want to continue with the second paragraph. But notice who it says. It does not say unelected citizens; it does not say those citizens who do not serve in the Congress. It says:

Citizens of the United States are forbidden to carry on correspondence or intercourse with any foreign government with an intent to influence its measures or conduct in relation to any disputes or controversies with the United States.

The act under scrutiny in this case represents the converse of the last mentioned statute. The former deals with citizens of the United States who attempt to conduct correspondence with foreign governments.

In 1955, in Marvin against Young:

The court stated that the conduct described in the specification violated at least three criminal statutes under which the petitioner could be tried in a civil court, one of which was the Logan Act and granted a petition.

The court in Briehl against Dulles, 1957, "upheld certain Department of State regulations which provided that no passport should be issued to members of the Communist Party."

At 587 of the opinion the court referred to other valid Federal statutes which restrict persons in the area of foreign relations.

We have statutes dealing with persons who act as agents of a foreign government or those who have correspondence with a foreign government with intent to influence its measures in relation to disputes or controversies with our government or to defeat the measures of the United States.

Finally, in Waldron against British Petroleum Company, 1964, the court "unequivocally asserted policy measures of the United States instead of merely statements of opinion attitude, and belief of government officials."

The court went on to argue in footnote 30 at 89,

The court indicates that although Congress should perhaps eliminate the vagueness of the Logan Act, the act remains valid despite the lack of prosecutions under it."

The court finds no merit in plaintiffs argument that the Logan Act has been abrogated by desuetude. From the absence of reported cases one may deduce that the statute has not been called into play because no factual situation requiring its invocation has been presented to the courts.

Citing Shakespeare measure for measure, act II, scene 2, "The law hath not been dead thou it has slept."

United States against Elliott, 1967, appears to be the latest judicial reference to the Logan Act, "At 326 it reaffirms the statute as it is discussed in Waldren."

Pertinent, too, is Waldron against British Petroleum Company wherein this court held vital a previously unenforced section of the Logan Act promulgated in 1799.

In other words, as recently as 1967, the Supreme Court has held that the Logan Act is valid, it has not been repealed, it is the law of the United States.

Let us look for a minute at the executive branch. We have one example where two Senators were dealing with Fidel Castro and another example where Richard Nixon was going to China as a private citizen, having left the Presidency. There are fascinating aspects. These are opinions by the State Department and therefore are not as powerful as opinions by the U.S. Supreme Court. But they are worth noticing.

I want to quote from the opinion of the State Department first on the cases of Senators John Sparkman and George McGovern who went to Cuba.

The clear intent of this provision—the Logan Act—is to prohibit unauthorized persons from intervening in disputes between the United States and foreign governments. Nothing in Section 953, however, would appear to restrict Members of the Congress from engaging in discussions with foreign officials in pursuance of their legislative duties under the Constitution.

In the case of Senators McGovern and Sparkman, the Executive Branch, although it did not in any way encourage the Senators to go to Cuba, was fully informed of the nature and purpose of their visit and had validated their passports for travel to that country.

Senator McGovern's report of his discussions with Cuban officials states: "I made it clear that I had no authority to negotiate on behalf of the United States—that I had come to listen and learn."

Senator Sparkman's contacts with Cuban officials were conducted on a similar basis. The specific issues raised by the Senators, the Southern Airways case, Luis Tiant's desire to have his parents visit the United States, would in any event, appear to fall within the second paragraph of section 953.

Accordingly, the Department does not consider the activities of Senators Sparkman and McGovern to be inconsistent with the stiplulations of section 953.

Let me make a point here. First of all, the State Department in its interpretation clearly implies that the Logan Act would include Congressmen. It is clear from the whole nature of this analysis, after all, they could have simply said the Logan Act does not apply to elected officials, one paragraph. Instead, they systemically walked through the Logan Act and said: One, they told us they were going; two, they told us why they were going; three, we gave them a passport to go; four, they specifically said we are not negotiating we are "listen and learn" from McGovern; and five, in Senator Sparkman's case, he was directly talking about cases that involve individuals and if you read the legislative history of the Logan Act it is quite clear that they intended that individuals should be allowed to prosecute private cases not involving U.S. Government policy with foreign governments.

I would suggest that the entire context of the Department of State opinion in the Sparkman and McGovern cases would imply that the Logan Act is alive, valid, and relates to Congressman WRIGHT of Texas' letter to Dear Commandante. And furthermore I would suggest that in order to be convincing that that letter does not violate the Logan Act, the Members who signed it would have to prove first that they told the State Department; second, they were clear the State Department knew what they were doing; and third, that they specifically were not in any way trying to influence the policies of the Government of Nicaragua.

I think it is impossible for them to argue those three cases.

The second example where the State Department was involved was an opinion in 1976 concerning former President Nixon's visit to the People's Republic of China.

It goes on to say and I quote:

It is the responsibility of the Department of Justice to make determinations of whether criminal statutes of this sort have been transgressed and whether individuals should be prosecuted under them. However, the Department of State is unaware of any basis for believing that Mr. Nixon acted with the intent prohibited by the Logan Act. In this connection, it should be noted that no one has ever been prosecuted under the Logan Act * * *.

Interestingly enough an ideological colleague of the Members who signed the Dear Commandante letter wanted to eliminate the Logan Act. Let me read the conclusion because it states the case for itself.

Although it appears that there has never been a prosecution under the Logan Act, there have been several judicial references to it, indicating that the Act has not been forgotten and that it is at least a political weapon against anyone who without authority interferes in the foreign relations of the United States. However, there have been efforts to repeal the Act. For example, Senator EDWARD KENNEDY (D.-Mass.) wished to delete the Logan Act from the bill to amend the United States criminal code, S. 1437, 95th Cong., 2d Sess. (1978). Senator James Allen (D.-Ala.) insisted on reenacting the Act in exchange for promising not to prolong debate over the bill, and Senator KENNEDY agreed to this. Since the House was unable to consider the criminal reform bill in the 95th Congress, the possibility of deleting the Act in a conference committee was eliminated. Yet, it is possible that the issue of whether the Logan Act should remain in the United States Code will be considered by a later Congress.

Notice now. First, that there are people who wish the Logan Act did not exist and Senator KENNEDY is one of them. And that his ideological allies signed the letter to Dear Commandante, which, if the act did not exist, would, in fact, probably not have any question about whether or not it was illegal.

Second, that the act has not been repealed and it specifically was not repealed, even on the Senate side because the conservative, Senator Allen of Alabama, insisted on keeping it.

Third, again let me quote from the conclusion:

There have been several judicial references to it indicating that the Act has not been forgotten and that it is at least a political weapon against anyone who without authority interferes in the foreign relations of the United States.

One of the issues this House will have to decide this spring and summer is where the 10 Members who wrote to the dictator of Nicaragua authorized to do so? Did they have authority? And, second, did that letter interfere with the relations of the United States?

If one can argue successfully that there was no interference, that the letter in no way assisted the Nicaraguan-Marxist dictatorship, that it was not of value to them, then probably there will be no question about the letter.

Or if one could prove that in fact they were authorized to send the letter, there would be no problem about the letter.

Now, having given the American Law Division's opinion, having outlined the problems that are involved, let us turn to the debates and proceedings of the Congress of the United States, and the debate on the Logan Act in the House in January 1799. And let me say that it is a fascinating debate.

In the first place, to set the stage, one must recognize that for the Founding Fathers, the French Revolution was both a good and a bad event. On the one hand, as people who believed in freedom, they liked the idea that there was a revolution in France drifting toward freedom. But then as the French Revolution became more and more radical, more and more bloody, increasingly there was concern about the nature of the French Revolution. And as the French Revolution itself became more and more vicious in its foreign policy, it began to prey upon American shipping, engaged in a war with virtually every power in Europe. There was a sense on the part of many Americans that France was a threat to freedom.

And it is literally possible to take sections of this debate, and if you replace revolutionary France with the Soviet Union, if you replace the Jacobins with the Communist Party, you could have this debate on the floor of the House today and not a word would be changed. The same fears, the same concerns about global tyranny, the same sense of a universal state reaching out through subversive agents and reaching out with ideological allies to try to conquer the world.

Let me walk through some key points.

Mr. Pinkney stated at one point:

All power with respect to negotiations with foreign Governments, is placed in the hands of the Executive by the Constitution, and no act of Congress can alter the Constitution.

And this comes down to a key point about whether or not you have to be at war, technically:

Mr. Otis said, it appeared to him, that it would be necessary to introduce an amendment into the bill, after the words "foreign Government," viz: "being at peace with the United States," because if the correspondence was with a nation with whom we are at war, the offence might amount to treason, by adhering to the enemies of the United States.

In other words, if we were at war with a country, you would not need an act like the Logan Act, and it is specifically designed to regulate negotiations and communications with countries that we are at peace with, but engaged in difficulties.

We got into a fascinating dialog.

Mr. Nicholas said that he—believed the gentleman from Massachusetts was for extending this law too far, for the purposes intended. The endeavors of an individual to procure peace for a nation, could surely never be construed into treason.

In other words, if you meant well, then the acts could not apply to you. After all, if you were trying to do something good for the country, such as develop peace, there could not be a problem.

Listen, though, to what Mr. Gordon thought:

. . . it was the intention of this bill to restrict improper correspondence at all times, both of peace and of war.

Mr. Bayard went on to say:

The object of this law is to prevent these private interferences altogether since the Constitution has placed the power of negotiation in the hands of the Executive only. An individual may do good, but he may also do evil; and it cannot be supposed that any private person has more wisdom, or a greater desire to serve his country than the Executive of the United States.

Let me carry you back through the last part, because it relates directly to the most powerful defense of the signers of the "Dear Commandante" letter. "An individual may do good, but he may also do evil; and it cannot be supposed that any private person has more wisdom or a greater desire to serve his country than the Executive of the United States."

Now, Mr. Dayton came in and said—

. . . there may be instances of persons carrying on a correspondence with a foreign Government, without saying anything relative to any dispute which may exist between the two Governments, and yet influence the conduct of the foreign Government toward us. He might report, for instance, that the people of the United States are divided among themselves; that they are disarmed or disorganized.

Furthermore, Mr. Claiborne:

. . . In every country, the laws of which breathe humanity and justice, the intention of an act almost always constitutes its criminality or its innocence. Our foreign relations ought doubtless to be managed by the Executive department, and if any other character attempts to interfere in this business . . .

Now, the question becomes what in fact were the Congressmen in that period attempting to do in the bill which is today?

Mr. Bayard went on:

In order to establish a crime by this bill, what is to be proved? First, that there are disputes subsisting between the United States and the foreign nation with whom the correspondence is said to have taken place; that this intercourse has really existed; and that it was carried on with a view to influence the measures or conduct of the foreign Government in relation to any disputes or controversies with the United States; and, unless all these facts are proved, the crime is not made out.

Let me walk through those just a minute. In describing the intent of the act, one, is there a dispute between the United States and Nicaragua? Very clearly, we have legally approved covert actions. We are taking all sorts of steps to put pressure on Nicaragua. Clearly we fit Mr. Bayard's first requirement.

Second, has the intercourse existed? That is, did they in fact send the letter? Very clearly they did.

Third, was the letter carried on with a view to influence the measures or conduct of the foreign government? Quite obviously.

Therefore, Mr. Bayard says:

. . . unless all these facts are proved, the crime is not made out.

One would think the burden begins to be on the part of those who signed the letter to prove that they do not fit Mr. Bayard's definition.

Mr. Pinckney:

Can it be proper, said Mr. P., when any gentleman of this country may conceive himself better informed, better instructed, or better delegated, than the President of the United States, for him to league himself with others to oppose the measures of the Government of the United States, and by this means usurp, in some degree, the powers of the Government?

Again Mr. Pinckney:

Whenever a person transgresses the laws of his country, he certainly does a criminal act. He would agree with gentlemen, that to procure peace for a country is generally a laudable thing; but to procure even peace, by taking the power of negotiating out of the hands of the Executive, is an usurpation of power, and therefore criminal. And when a law is passed to prevent this kind of interference, it becomes doubly criminal. He mentioned this circumstance, because the gentleman from Virginia had charged the authors of this bill with creating a new crime. It does not create a crime, but provides for the punishment of one.

In other words, Pinckney's argument is precisely that the Constitution makes it clearly illegal for anyone but the President to negotiate with a foreign government. All the Logan Act does is to provide a punishment for violating the Constitution and that even if it was the most noble of causes, to bring peace, that it would be illegal for a private citizen of the United States to negotiate directly with a foreign government because it would undercut the capacity of the Executive to run the foreign policy of the United States.

Why is it important that we have an act to regulate our relationships when we are not at war? Many of our colleagues would say, "Well, we are not really at war with Nicaragua. Oh, there is some covert actions, there is a little violence going on, but we are not really at war, we have not declared war."

Let us go back to this very same period and let us listen to some of the problems that we have to look at. This is Mr. Gallatin, who opposed the bill but who described the situation in a way which fits our own day:

He allowed our situation with France was different from our relative situation with any other country. It is something less than war, and something more than two countries having a controversy with each other. On this account, though they have reported a bill of a general nature, they have always had France in view. It is certain that, if we were at war with France, for an individual to correspond in a certain manner with the French Government would be criminal, would be treason by the Constitution; and though a correspondence of the identical kind which would be treason when we are at war, would not be so now; yet he was not surprised that gentlemen wish to make such acts misdemeanors at the present time.

In other words, the relationship that the United States had with revolutionary France in 1799 was remarkably like our relationship with the Soviet Union today. They were an aggressive, constantly expanding power, a national which constantly tread on the rights of other nations and which constantly sought to subvert another mind, other countries, just as the Soviet Union is today.

Let me go on. Mr. Edmond said:

. . . it will be wise and prudent, at this time, to frame a law to prevent individuals from interfering with the Executive authority, in a manner injurious to the community.

Mr. Edmond goes on to say:

. . . before the crime intended to be punished by this Act can take place, a controversy must have existed between the government of the United States and a foreign government, and an individual must have carried on a correspondence with an "intent to influence the measures with respect to the controversy." The bill goes no further.

I would suggest again that by Mr. Edmond's standard it is clear that the "Dear Commandante" letter usurps the power of the Executive, and it is precisely what the Logan Act was written about.

Mr. Bayard said:

The offense proposed to be punished by this law is separated only by a shade from treason. Yet such is the act which the gentleman from Virginia in his place has avowed that he should not be ashamed to do. This act is that of an individual taking upon himself to settle dispute with a foreign government after the proper authority in his own government has vainly attempted to do it. But it is said by the gentleman from Virginia that this act is so far from being dishonorable that it is a virtuous and a laudable thing to accommodate national differences.

If we are to admit that the sole object of such person was to settle these differences, we might accede to the sentiment in the abstract, but in a political point of view it cannot be justified. For though he may do good in some instances, who he would do evil in others, by making disgraceful stipulations. He acknowledged peace to be a desirable thing but the honor and the independence of a country are still more desirable.

In other words, even if the best of intentions under this act, by the people who wrote the act, it would be wrong legally to deal with a foreign government.

Mr. Bayard went on to say:

Is it possible that the gentleman from Virginia can seriously avow a belief that an individual has a right to assume this power to negotiate? For what purpose have we an executive, and foreign ministers? If any unauthorized individual may assume the power placed in them? As to this object of negotiation for peace, as he had already stated, it might be purchased at too great a price. With respect to the individual alluded to, we are in a state of darkness. Whether his object was honorable or not, we cannot tell. How far he was connected with other persons is uncertain. The House had heard indeed disavowals on this floor which he was willing should go out to a credulous community. As to his own opinion, it was a matter of faith which he was not obliged to disclose. It must be clear to every reasonable man that a law of this kind is necessary as a barrier to guard against an arrogation of power and public factions.

Is the offense proposed to be punished by this bill of crime or not? If it is, it is in the intention of Congress to define it better than it stands upon common law principles. If it is not a crime, it is the intention of Congress to make it one, since the most deplorable consequences may be prevented by it.

Let me go back again to one specific point Mr. Bayard made:

A law of this kind is necessary as a barrier to guard against an arrogation of power in public factions.

What better definition of the 10 signatories of the "Dear Commandante" letter than precisely what the Founding Fathers would have thought of as a faction?

Mr. Bayard goes on to explain, and this is again a key point:

For anyone else to negotiate for the United States starts with an assumption that the President of the United States has failed.

One of the things that most angered the Members of the Congress in 1799 was the notion that Mr. Logan thought that where the U.S. Government was failing he would succeed.

Let me quote from Mr. Bayard:

There could be no doubt that these ministers possessed a sincere desire to settle the existing disputes between the two countries if it could be done with honor. This was found impossible. And yet, after all this, a single individual, not appointed by the administration, thinks he can accomplish what the whole government could not do and goes to France under this idea. Can it be right that an individual should go and offer terms of peace which could have no other effect than to incite that clamor at home, which the gentleman from Virginia has been pleased to say is the object of this bill, by making it appear that there is an unwillingness in the government to make peace?

But suppose a treaty of peace was negotiate by an individual thus situated, and government should not approve of it? It would be thrown out to the people as a bone of contention, the consequences of which would be that one party in the United States would say that the terms ought to be accepted, and the other, that they ought not. So that a rash step of this kind might involve the country in a civil war.

In other words, precisely the danger the Founding Fathers were worried about, was that one group of Congressmen might write off and say to a dictator, "Hi, we would like to negotiate, the U.S. Government has failed, the President has failed, we have this new idea. Why do you not do what we suggest?" One could almost pick up the Dear Commandante letter and say, for example, if you would do certain things "the prospects for peace and stability throughout Central America would be dramatically enhanced."

Those responsible for supporting violence against your Government and for obstructing serious negotiations for broad political participation in El Salvador would have far greater difficulty winning support for their policies than they do today.

Or you might even say, again from the Dear Commandante letter:

A decision on your part to provide these reasonable assurances and conduct truly free and open elections would significantly improve the prospect of better relations between our two countries and significantly strengthen the hands of those in our country who desire better relations based upon true equality, self-determination and mutual good will.

This letter, the Dear Commandante letter by Mr. WRIGHT of Texas and the other nine Members, almost reads as though someone had sat down and read the debate in 1799 and decided to write a 20th century version of exactly the kind of communication that the Founding Fathers were arguing about in 1799.

It significantly suggests how Nicaragua could change its behavior, something which they are clearly against; it specifically suggests how Nicaragua could strengthen the faction in America which wrote the letter, something which the Logan Act is clearly against, and it is a remarkable document in fitting into this entire debate.

I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. SILJANDER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I have been listening to the gentleman for the last, give or take, 40 minutes, and I am rather fascinated, I serve on the Foreign Affairs Committee, and as I hear you speak and relate to history, the gentleman from Georgia brings up some incredible points that I think the American people and certainly the Members of this Congress need to know and need to hear about. Historical references.

Why it is dangerous; why it is so deeply dangerous for the U.S. Congress or a delegation a self-appointed delegation of the Members of Congress to assist to negotiate foreign policy, especially foreign policy clearly, blatantly contrary to the administration and to the Congress now in power.

Especially those of credible leadership positions in Congress. If the gentleman's historical reference really in a true sense makes my stomach turn, because the implication of what you have been saying, if I have been hearing the gentleman correctly over the last so many odd minutes, the implications of what the gentleman is saying I think are very, very deep in terms of the future foreign policy statements of this body that Congress ought to make.

I have no opposition to resolutions in Congress deploring the President for doing one thing or another or patting him on the back, for that matter, telling him a particular position on foreign policy was, in fact, a good idea. I guess what concerns me is that a group of leaders deciding amongst themselves in a little clique in Congress, that let us write a letter to a government that is in opposition to most everything we believe in terms of democracy and freedom; let us write a letter to them and try to encourage them to carry on policies that are again, I repeat, are clearly, unequivocably contrary and conflicting to the policy statements that have been made by this Government; by the United States of America.

If I were someone back in Michigan, where I represent or in Georgia, where the gentleman whose eloquent statements, where he comes from, his State, and I just want to tell the gentleman I appreciate what he is going tonight.

If I were a citizen listening to your presentation, I would be upset, to put it mildly.

I would wonder who do we think we are, as a small little group of Members, to decide behind the scenes on their own accord, based on their limited knowledge, they do not have access to Department of Defense daily intelligence briefings or CIA daily intelligence briefings, or they do not have the time, as the President would have, to pool the information of all the intelligence agencies together, some very, very classified and others not, and be able to make a very qualified decision as a group on what our foreign policy statements ought to be as a nation, especially considering this is a Marxist country, Nicaragua; especially considering what this country could do with the information in terms of incredible propaganda.

So I would just like to tell the gentleman that I thank him for yielding and I thank him for the comments he is making, because it seems clear that the American people, if they really knew what the implications of this letter meant, and as the gentleman is well defining these implications, I believe that the American people will certainly be standing up and taking note of any future activity. I hope this type of letter will never, never happen again in the history of this country.

Mr. GINGRICH. I appreciate very much the gentleman's comments.

Mr. Speaker, let me say that I think this letter, the Dear Commandante letter, has to be seen in context, and I will take up again another evening the issue of the Logan Act because we are only about a third of the way through the debate on the Logan Act in the House.

But let me again put in frame the Dear Commandante letter by Mr. WRIGHT of Texas and nine other Members. It is a prelude, since that was the foriegn policy establishment of the Democratic Party in the House, to the Fascell-Moakley unilateral disarmament amendment which will be coming to the floor next week, an amendment which literally guts any capacity by the United States to do anything in Central America, an amendment so mindlessly weak and so irrationally anti to the interests of the United States that it is hard to believe that serious, competent men could offer it. Let me put it in context.

At a time when leading Democrats in this House feel free to write the dictator of Nicaragua, the pastoral letter on reconciliation from the Nicaraguan bishops, the Easter celebration letter signed and released on April 22, Easter Sunday, in Nicaragua, says this:

Our country, too, is plagued by a belligerent situation pitting Nicaraguan against Nicaraguan and the consequences of this situation could not be sadder. Many Nicaraguan youths and men are dying on the battlefields. Many others look toward the future with the fear of seeing their own lives prematurely ended. A materialistic and atheistic educational system is undermining the consciences of our children. Many families are divided by political differences.

The suffering of mothers who have lost their children, which should merit our great respect, is instead exploited to incite hatred and feed the desire for vengeance. Farmworkers and Indians, for whom the church reserves a special love, are suffering, living in constant anxiety, and many of them are forced to abandon their homes in search of a peace and tranquility that they do not find. Some of the mass media, using the language of hate, encourage a spirit of violence.

In other words, the bishops in Nicaragua do not see Dear Commandante as a reformer, as a man who has improved things. One month after 10 Democrats in this House signed the letter to the head of the Communist dictatorship in Nicaragua, it is the bishops who are crying out.

Or let us look at a Joint Declaration of the Foreign Ministers of Costa Rica, El Salvador and Honduras. I realize this is April 25, it is a statement by three countries that are pro-American and, therefore, some people automatically assume that they are puppets or people we cannot listen to, but let me just give you two quotes from the Ministers of Honduras, El Salvador, and Costa Rica, meeting together.

They ask the Government of Nicaragua to set aside its obstructionist attitude toward the labors of the working commissions established within the Contadora framework.

Nicaragua has repeated this behavior today in the meetings of the working commissions taking place in Panama by rejecting the regional objective of military equilibrium and security in Central America, maintaining that it will continue arming itself and will not accept measures that would limit that government in that respect; it argues that its problems are with the United States and not with its neighbors and that, for this reason, it must prepare to defend itself against a world power. Likewise, Nicaragua totally rejected the document of principles and obligations of the Central American states in the political area, thereby frustrating one of the principal political objectives, that of democratization, contained in the Document of Objectives approved by the five countries on September 9, 1983.

This negative attitude of Nicaragua, pointed out in the statements of the Ministers of the Contadora Group in its information bulletin of this past April 8, to the effect that in the working commissions "there remain obstacles resulting at times from attitudes that are not always flexible and effectively oriented toward negotiation."

Now, what are they saying? Costa Rica is a little democracy with no army. Honduras has a relatively weak army. El Salvador is already engaged in a guerrilla war financed and supported by the Communists in Nicaragua, aided by Cuba and Russia.

And what is Nicaragua's answer when they say why do we not have a balance of power? Nicaragua is going to be strong enough to fight the United States. Now, if they are going to be strong enough to fight the United States, all of it with Soviet equipment and Cuban training, that means they are going to be so powerful they will be the dominant military force in the Western Hemisphere south of the United States, except for Cuba. And Cuba and Nicaragua, if that is their intention, will be able to defeat Mexico and every country in Central America militarily.

That is what the Ministers of Costa Rica, El Salvador, and Honduras are reporting 1 month after the Dear Commandante letter. So here we have the Foreign Ministers of three countries in Central America, here we have the pastoral letter from the Nicaraguan Bishops, neither of which relates to the realities of the Dear Commandante letter.

But let me go a stage further, because this is part of a worldwide scene. Remember, in the Logan Act our Founding Fathers were terrified of revolutionary France, which they saw as a universal power. Let me quote from the May 1, 1984, Chicago Sun Times, a column by Morton Kondracke, normally considered a liberal, entitled "Time to Examine Soviet Actions."

Anyone who thinks the Soviet leadership is aged, stody, passive, defensive and reactive, in other words, not expansionist or aggressive, needs to cast an eye at recent events in the Mideast and South Asia.

He goes on to talk about Afghanistan, where there are 14,000 Soviet troops, 250 tanks, 80 helicopter gunships and, for the first time, high-altitude carpet bombing; in India, where there is a delegation headed by the Defense Minister, and 66 senior generals and admirals; in the Middle East, where there is $2.5 billion worth of Soviet arms being sold to Iraq; and in Syria, where the Soviets have sent between 6,000 and 7,000 troops to help rebuild the Syrian military.

He goes on to say:

Around the world there are other signs of Soviet assertiveness as well: large-scale maneuvers in the Baltic Sea, an increased naval presence in the Caribbean, tightening of Western air corridors into West Berlin, a Soviet aircraft's reconnaissance flight over a secret French naval base, two "accidents" involving U.S. and Soviet ships, and the firing at a U.S. helicopter that strayed across the Czech border.

All these incidents and developments could be unrelated and coincidental. It seems unlikely each one was carefully planned and executed, but they do all seem to be part of a pattern of aggressiveness and provocative behavior.

If patterned behavior is involved, what explains it? Even U.S. intelligence officials confess this country lacks the assets, the spies and electronic penetration, to know for sure what the Kremlin leadership is up to.

Administration speculation includes the possibility the Soviets are attempting to influence the U.S. elections by creating the impression that Ronald Reagan has made this an unsafe world. Another interpretation is that Reagan really has scared the Soviets by installing Pershing missiles in Europe and threatening to build a "Star Wars" missile defense and that they are reacting truculently.

Officials also mention the possibility of trouble inside the Kremlin, with permission to the military to be more aggressive as a chip in some bargain between the Generals and civilian authorities.

Speculation as to Soviet capabilities aside, the hard reality about Soviet behavior is on display in Afghanistan. It is a reality of utter ruthlessness. The American news media rarely report the evidence, including videotape smuggled out of Afghanistan and seen fairly frequently on European television, but Soviet anti-guerrilla tactics differ markedly from those employed by the United States in Vietnam.

In the winter issue of the quarterly Foreign Affairs, French physician Claude Malhuret wrote that the American tactic was to establish strategic hamlets where the local population could be gathered, protected from guerrillas and won over to the government cause.

By contrast, Malhuret wrote, the Soviet tactic in Afghanistan is "massive reprisals against the population, sometimes including the extermination of a large part of that population."

This includes purposeful and systematic destruction of villages, towns, food supplies and innocent civilians as a means of destroying guerrilla resistence.

Malhuret wrote that the Soviet tactic also includes "dropping mines and booby-trapped toys, in most cases plastic pens or small red trucks, that are choice terror weapons. Their main targets are children whose hands and arms are blown off." Their purpose seems to be to spread terror and despair in the population.

After working with the Afghan resistance, Malhuret concluded that the Soviets will probably win unless "there is profound change in the international balance of power and in the reactions of Westerns to Soviet totalitarianism."

"The first step is for all of us to look closely at what the Soviets are doing in the world," and I complete my quotation of Morton Kondracke, a liberal.

Let me say this in closing. The Soviets are nothing more nor less than leftwing Nazis. The KGB is simply the Gestapo of the left. They are a deliberate, ruthless, brutal tyranny. They have established one colony in the Western world called Cuba. They have established a second colony called Grenada, which we have liberated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

TAX FREEDOM DAY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. SILJANDER) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. SILJANDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. GINGRICH).

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I know the gentleman is going to have an extremely important special order on the tax program, but let me just conclude, and I appreciate the gentleman yielding, by saying that I want to drive home certain very key points, and I will be taking shortly another special order further about the Logan Act.

The Founding Fathers faced with a ruthless revolutionary tyranny in France reacted properly. They knew that this country could not survive if every American who thought they could do better than the President were allowed to go off and negotiate.

I think it is very clear from the Bishops' statement, from the statement of the Foreign Ministers of Costa Rica,

El Salvador, and Honduras, from every evidence we have, from Morton Kondracke's column, that the letter to the Nicaraguan Communist dictatorship was unwise, improper and just plain wrong.

I would look forward to the distinguished majority leader and his nine cosigners issuing a statement to that effect.

I would think that it is important that they recognize that this issue is not going away, that we are going to establish a precedent one way or the other, that it is wrong for Members of this Congress to deal with Marxist governments against the policies of the United States and to communicate with them at a time when the United States is engaged in a controversy.

I thank the gentleman very much.

Mr. SILJANDER. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the gentleman's comments. I also want to say again that I appreciate the special order that the gentleman from Georgia took and the very important facts he has brought forth before the U.S. Congress.

I just want to say to my colleagues, congratulations. Today is a very important day in the lives of many, many millions of people. Those of us who pay taxes, those of us that have been working and striving to pay our bills, today is the first day that we are all able to pay our own bills.

Today is Tax Freedom Day. Today is the day that a taxpayers' group has calculated that finally we are done working for the Government and for government taxation.

Today is the day that we can begin, as I said earlier, paying our own bills, rather than paying Uncle Sam's bills, the State and local governments' bills, of taxes of all types and of all sizes and of all denominations.

Between January 1 and May 1, every single penny the taxpayer earned has gone to tax collectors. Every year economists of the Washington-based Tax Foundation figure out just how much of our money goes toward Federal, State, and local taxes. They try to translate that into so many days of the year and May 1 is Tax Freedom Day.

Looking at it another way, the watchdog economists found that this year we work the first 2 hours and 40 minutes of each and every 8-hour day for Uncle Sam and his local counterparts. Uncle Sam took the first hour and 43 minutes and State and local governments usurped the rest.

There are a couple ways we can look at this and assess it. We can say, well, that is the way it goes and count our blessings, just assume that finally we are free from all the tax burden.

We can say we paid for our schools, our police, our firefighters, our Army, our Navy, our Air Force, social services, the first 4 months of the year.

We can celebrate and lie back with the knowledge that everything is freedom from May 2 through the end of the year, December 31.

We could, but it would not be very realistic in the minds of most Americans, nor would it change the fact that one-third of our lives is spent shoveling our silver into the tax collector's sack.

The other response could be righteous outrage, and let me tell you, every time I have been home back in the 4th District of Michigan, I have heard the righteous outrage and indignation of many, many taxpayers.

What are they upset about? They are upset that they have to wait 4 months, working 8 and 10 hours a day, just to break even with the tax collector. They are sick and tired of it. The American people are fed up with the complicated, confusing, present tax system that faces us all each and every year during our Federal income tax season.

We do not have to look too far for the answers. So many people have said, "Well, MARK SILJANDER, there are just too many complications in the tax system."

There are 10,000 pages of rules and regulations by the IRS. There are another 2,000 pages of alternatives by the IRS. Pages upon pages are added each and every year by new laws. Just this year, for example, we passed in 1984, at least through the House and now in the House-Senate committee is a document 1,023 pages of a tax bill and 810 pages of explanations. That is all new complications to the tax reforms and tax rules.

What it all comes down to is that this average taxpayer is frustrated. After all, I am frustrated as well. We are all frustrated with a system that is too overbearing, that is much too confusing, that is elitist in nature.

And why is it elitist in nature? Well, this box is a box that says "Return to Sender." It is to Mr. Fat Cat, Mr. Free Ride, U.S.A. This is a box full of loopholes, a box of 10,000 pages with another 1,023 up and coming in the new tax bill. These are the loopholes—symbolically, of course—that only the elite that can afford a lawyer, that can afford a famous or well-educated tax lawyer to figure out each and every loophole.

This is symbolic of those loopholes that most of us, the vast majority of us, cannot afford someone to find all these loopholes.

Most Americans might have a CPA or an accountant. Many Americans toil at night near the end of the year trying to figure out all the deductions and all the loopholes they can and usually come out very short.

So what is the answer to this complication? What is the answer to the incredible confusion that seems to be permeating the country and the minds especially here in this Congress, because it seems as though every time we are in trouble economically, we think of thousands more pages to add more complications and more addendums and changes and more rules and more regulations, as though more will make things better.

The idea is very simple. I do not want to startle my colleagues by something too simplistic. We do not need 10,000 pages of IRS rules and regulations, nor do we need a new tax bill of 1,023 pages more. What we need is one single page. Take the box of loopholes and throw it out. All we need is one page, one page for every American, be that person making $1 million a year or $10,000 a year, that working American could fill out his income taxes in 10 minutes on one single page and that would be through a simple, fair, flat rate income tax.

I have asked my constituents, "Do you think you are overtaxed?"

And the answer is inevitably in the vast majority of cases, "Yes."

I ask, "Do you think government spends too much money?" And they say in the same percentage, high percentages, "Yes, indeed."

I ask them, "Do you think the present system is fair and simple?" They say, "Absolutely, it is not."

That is why, my friends and colleagues in Congress, I have introduced a House resolution. I call it the countdown bill. It is bill 5432. That is the number of the bill. It is a simple number. It is a simple 10 percent flat tax bill. This is why I bring the issue up today, because today, as I alluded to earlier, is Tax Freedom Day. After all, what better forum could we use to tell the American people and to tell my colleagues in Congress that there is an alternative to the maze of rules and regulations, to the maze of confusion, there is an alternative, a 10-percent flat tax bill, a simple 10 percent, a fair 10 percent flat tax bill.

If one made $1 million a year or more he or she could not avoid taxes by the box of loopholes behind me but, rather, he or she would pay their fair tithe or 10 percent of his or her income, a fair rate.

If you make $10,000 or $20,000 a year you pay 10 percent, a fair rate.

My bill takes a more pragmatic approach. We could not certainly allow the poor to pay a 10-percent flat rate income tax. No, we would hear many choruses of voices and duly so that it would be unbearable for the poor.

So what we have done is a couple of things. No. 1, it is a 10-percent flat rate on net income minus $2,000 per person in each family deduction, indexed for inflation. For an example, say you have a family of five, times each individual by $2,000. And this gives you a total of $10,000 in exemptions from any taxation. So a poor family of five would be exempt for the first $10,000 and they would not have to pay a penny of tax. So it is not imposing on the poor, absolutely not.

To those of us that are homeowners and believe in the American dream of owning a home, interest payments and payments on property taxes are deductible.

For those of us that believe in giving to our favorite charity or church, that would be deductible.

And an IRA savings account for the future, savings and an incentive to save would be deductible.

But ladies and gentlemen, that is it, that is it, five simple deductions in total, 10 minutes of your time once a year on one single page to fill out your income tax forms.

The only problem is we would have to find somewhere to retire all of these copies of the 10,000 pages each group of books of the Tax Code. We would have to dump all of these loopholes and the boxes of loopholes. And certainly H&R Block might not be the greatest fan of this particular proposal. But I can tell you, 9 out of 10 Americans would support the proposal, for according to the Republican Study Committee, 90.4 percent of all gross taxable income are those that earn under $35,000; 75 percent of all the gross taxable income, according, again to the Republican Study Committee, it suggests that 75 percent of all of the gross taxable income is under $20,000. That is not the rich that are paying. It is the middle-income Americans for the bulk and the majority of the tax burden in this country. It is the middle-income Americans that this bill is addressing today. It is the middle-income Americans that are frustrated and furious that they have to work until today for all of the taxes they have to pay.

So what we ought to do as a Congress is do something to help the frustrated American who breaks his back and works to pay the home heating bill, the property taxes, the high interest rates that are finally, thank God, coming down from the 21.5 percent prime rate of a couple of years ago.

The middle-income American is concerned. And I would say in a philosophical sense, and I mean this with all due respect to the middle-income Americans, they are ready to revolt. And I do not mean by taking up arms or shedding blood. I think they are willing to start shedding votes for Members of this body who refuse to engage themselves in a new form of simplicity for the tax system, they refuse to listen to the cries and shouts of Americans all over the country saying that the time has come for a fair and simple Tax Code, a fair and simple tax system. Americans are calling for it every day. There are news columns. Somewhere in the country likely today there would be an editorial saying it is time we simplified the Tax Code.

Is this such a new idea? It is not a new idea at all. This is why it is time in this forum of tax freedom today that we are expressing these concerns.

There have been many flat tax bills. JACK KEMP has one. PHIL CRANE has one. Congressman JIM QUILLEN has a flat tax bill. Many of them are very good alternatives. MARK SILJANDER has one.

But they sit and they collect dust in the committees of Congress without even a fair hearing. It is time that Americans changed the course of tax and budget history.

The reason I say it is time for Americans to do so, my colleagues, is because they are the only ones that will force the change. I bring your minds back to the time when we passed the Tax Equity Act and included withholding of dividends and interest. The majority of the Members of Congress voted for that bill and it went through.

Lo and behold, the American taxpayer said "Wait a minute, who is the Congress to tell me that they are going to withhold on savings interest and dividends?" Who are we to do that? Millions of letters poured into the Congress, corporately, to House and Senate offices. I had 14,000 alone and I voted against it in the beginning.

Is it not coincidental that the Congress, with the influence of millions of pieces of letters, decided to change their mind and repeal what they passed less than a year prior.

So when the American people are frustrated enough and ready to take action, even if it is with the pen threatening the lives and livelihood of those that serve in this body, action does in fact take place. Action does take place.

So today is the time. Now is the time for a very simple and basic flat rate tax system.

There are a couple of questions I would like to respond to that have been asked in the course of developing this particular bill on the flat rate income tax. The first question I think is quite relative. Will my social security be taxed and it will not be taxed under House Resolution 5432, the 10-percent flat tax.

What deductions will be allowed? I think this is important to repeat. There will be a limited amount of deductions. There will be $2,000 per person indexed to inflation, property taxes, interest, charitable contributions and IRA and Keough, private, individual retirement savings plans. Those are the deductions, fair, simple, and still we could fit it all on one sheet of paper.

Another question is would not the 10-percent flat tax really benefit the wealthy. I repeat again what has benefited the wealthy is this box of loopholes. That is what has benefited the wealthy. We would now be throwing those loopholes out.

The other question is what about the underground economy. After all, the IRS has conservatively estimated of the half a trillion dollars in the underground economy, of that half trillon dollars nearly $100 billion of that would be legal moneys that should be reported. This is not drug moneys or prostitution dollars earned from those types of illegal, illicit activities. Almost $100 billion would be legal moneys that ought to be coming to the coffers of the U.S. Treasury. So we have addressed that in House Resolution 5432, the 10-percent fair and simple flat tax. We have said that we will allow anyone who has not reported their income taxes amnesty. We will allow you amnesty. If you have never paid taxes or have cheated or have not reported fully in your tax reports, here is an opportunity to come clean, to repent, if you will, and come clean without any fear of adjudication by the IRS or anyone else.

Will it work? Massachusetts tried. Massachusetts tried and they estimated about a $7 million net benefit of revenue. Less than half a year into their system and, mind you, they did not change the tax laws, they just offered amnesty with the same State tax laws and the same provisions, almost 10 times or almost $60 million has since come in, 10 times the amount they estimated originally.

We are telling Members here is their opportunity, here is a government's opportunity to salvage another $100 billion in new revenues.

What forced many of those who have avoided paying taxes? It was those in the 40- to 50-percent tax bracket that reverted to not participating in the present tax system. It was their large tax bracket that forced them underground. With the incentive of a 10-percent flat tax most people believe that we could accumulate the vast majority of that estimated nearly $100 billion and that could be very, very low as an estimate in itself.

You see House bill 5432 does not take effect immediately, assuming it passed this austere body and the other body and the President signed the bill into law. It takes effect 3 years later.

But in that 3 years, the amnesty provisions will take effect immediately and every penny that comes in of new revenue from the amnesty, those that come forward and come clean, will go into a special trust fund which will accumulate during those 3 years as Congress considers ways of adjusting their habitual spending habits to adjust for 10-percent inflation.

Then after the 3-year period the flat tax will take effect; 10 percent, with a deduction that we mentioned and that cumulative amount of the amnesty grace provision will then be used to help offset any lost revenues.

And coming to my last question: "Well, wait a minute, Mark, won't this 10 percent flat tax lose an incredible amount of revenue?" Who knows? I have some figures that may indicate, and we will present this on another evening, but they may indicate that 10 percent could bring in the same amount of revenues even with some of the deductions we have offered, incredible as it may seem.

Here is the reason: in 1962, they all laughed at President Kennedy, who said: "You can't cut taxes and if you do, it will deplete our Treasury of revenues."

What followed was an economic stimulus. More people worked, contributing to the system, less people drawing out of the system; 1982 was no different.

Many of the same critics said, "Reagan's tax cut won't work; it will deplete revenues from the Treasury." But fortunately for the American people the opposite happened, the same as in 1962, people began going back to work, unemployment dropped, inflation dropped, interest rates have dropped, the economy is in an upswing. No one denies that. Even the great doomsayers who predicted a downswing and a catastroph now are saying we are in a recovery.

So it proves that incentive; when you begin putting money back in the pockets of Americans, let them spend their money the way they see fit, rather than the addicts here in Congress who are addicted to spending the way we see fit, which is usually promiscuous spending, we find an economic stimulus.

But you, being those in the American population, you spend money the way you see fit.

Now, a 10-percent flat tax would undoubtedly be an incredible stimulant to our economy. What new revenue would that produce? It is hard to decipher. But the Congress would have 3 years to break that down. In the meantime, there will be, in my projections a balanced budget amendment.

The reason I say that, amazingly enough, is simply because if two more States pass the resolution for a balanced budget amendment, the Congress would be forced to pass one or face a constitutional convention for the balanced budget amendment.

So by the time the flat tax would take effect, even if it passed this year, I would predict, and quite safely, that Congress would have some sort of a balanced budget amendment eventually, and the 10-percent flat tax could be just the added incentive and catalyst to force us to do the job we know we need to do, but we just do not have the courage to stand up and do.

A 3-year budget freeze in those 3 years before the tax takes effect, even at today's rates, if we froze the budgets at 1984 levels, we would have a balanced budget in 3 years with probably a slight surplus.

Is that so complicated? A 10-percent flat tax with amnesty; a 3-year budget freeze, included with the constitutional amendment to balance the budget and simply implement some of the Grace Commission reports and, my friends in Congress, we would not be in fiscal catastrophy, but rather we would have a fair and simple tax system, and economic prosperity, an economy that is even more stimulated. We then would have a Congress that is finally responding in the fiscal manner that they ought to.

One last point regarding the potential impact of a 10-percent flat tax on the economy: I read recently in an article in the news media suggesting that the American people, understand this, the American people, pay $60 billion a year, yes; B for billion dollars, a year, in tax preparation. Think what a simple and flat 10-percent tax would mean.

That money could be pumped into IRA savings accounts, buying new homes, new automobiles, helping stimulate the economy. That is another $60 billion that could be pumped or redirected in the economy in a much more productive manner.

All in all, we have a proposal that I believe is very basic, in terms of what human need emotionally that I hear is, out in the grassroots; to satisfy the concern of the complexity and the elite nature of the present Tax Code and tax system.

So I am proud to introduce House bill 5432. I invite my colleagues to cosign the bill with me. Today is the day we all need to take heart to the cries of the American people; that is, "Tax Freedom Day." And maybe if Congress could be so bold, could be so courageous to pass a fair and simple flat tax, maybe next year, just maybe, we could announce to the American people that, "Tax Freedom Day" is a month earlier, and the economy is doing well, and that Congress is living within its means. Would not that be amazing?

Sounds like Utopia, but with a simple system, I believe in my heart, in my mind and through all our research, that this could truly, truly happen.

I yield back the balance of my time.

POLISH AMERICAN CONGRESS AND POLISH CONSTITUTION DAY 40TH ANNIVERSARY OBSERVANCE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, May 3, 1791, marks a very special day in the hsitory of democratic nations, for it was on this day 193 years ago that the first democratic Constitution of Poland was adopted. It was the first liberal constitution in Europe, and following the American pattern, it established three independent branches of government and emphasized humanitarianism, tolerance, and liberty for all.

In observance of this special anniversary, as well as the 40th anniversary of the founding of the Polish American Congress, the South Bend, Ind., chapter of the Polish American Congress sponsored a banquet and program on April 29 at the St. Adalbert Heritage Center in South Bend.

My good friend of many years, Dr. Edward C. Rozanski, who is national vice president of the Polish American Congress and a resident of my 11th Congressional District of Illinois, was the principal speaker at this event, during which the South Bend chapter of PAC presented a $5,000 check to him to be used to help those less fortunate in Poland.

Additionally, two certificates of merit were presented by the national office of the Polish American Congress—one to Cas and Irene Dzikowski, and the other to Irene Czyzewski, both for their many, many years of faithful service to the South Bend community.

Congressman JOHN HILER of the Third District of Indiana extended his greetings, as did Fire Chief Timothy Braell, who represented South Bend's Mayor Roger Parent.

Dr. Rozanski gave a stirring address, and in speaking of the Polish soldiers who courageously fought and died in the Italian campaigns of World War II, he quoted the inscription on a monument at the cemetery in Monte Cassino, Italy, dedicated to the Polish war dead: "We Polish soldiers for our freedom and yours, have given ourselves to God, our bodies to the soil of Italy, and our hearts to Poland." I, too, have visited the cemetery at Monte Cassino on several occasions, and I share Dr. Rozanski's feeling of heartfelt gratitude for the ultimate sacrifice these brave soldiers made on the altar of justice, honor, and freedom.

The full text of Dr. Rozanski's remarks follow along with the program for the April 29 observance, the text of the two certificates of merit, and a letter addressed to Mr. Aloysius Mazewski, the distinguished national president of the Polish American Congress, the headquarters of which are located in my own 11th Congressional District of Illinois at 6100 North Cicero Avenue, Chicago:

ADDRESS BY E. C. ROZANSKI

It is with pride and pleasure to be with you my dear Friends, to participate in a celebration marking the 40th anniversary of the Polish American Congress.

This is a historical year, for also it is the 40th anniversary of Victory over Monte Cassino in Italy . . . This was the most fierce battle fought during World War 2.

The mountain site with St. Benedict Monastery overlooking the Valley of the Lira river, was a fortified German stronghold protecting the way to Rome.

This is the story in a capsule form: In January of 1944, the American Fifth Army was the first to engage the Germans, which was continued by the Free French, Indian, New Zealanders, and British troops of the Eighth Army.

In May, the task to "take" Monte Cassino was entrusted to the troops of the Second Polish Corps.

Finally on May 18, 1944, after heavy losses the victory was attained by the Polish forces and the road to Rome was opened again.

It is a touching site, Monte Cassino—I have visited the cemetery on three occasions and I have this eerie feeling that the Polish soldiers are asleep, and at a command, will rise again and march into a free Poland.

There are so many crosses, white crosses, the Star of David, the Eastern Rite crosses.

They all loved God and Country and for Country sacrificed their lives on the altar of justice, honor and freedom.

Nothing but nothing says this better then the inscription on the marble spire which stands on the hilltop above the Monte Cassino cemetery: "We Polish soldiers, for our freedom and yours, have given our souls to God, our bodies to the soil of Italy and our hearts to Poland."

Please let us rise and with a moment of silence pay tribute to gallant heroes of Monte Cassino (Thank you.)

Next week Chicago will host the National Council of Directors of PAC and PAC Charitable Foundation taking place at Conrad Hilton Hotel. Mr. Mazewski invites you all to partake in the four day commemoration and meetings of Polonia's leaders.

The commemoration will begin on Thursday, May 3rd, with a wreath laying ceremony at Kosciuszko monument.

On Saturday, May 5, a parade in down town Chicago will take place. Flags, bands, drum and bugle corps, 50 floats, uniformed marching units of veterans and organizations will parade on Dearborn street.

After the parade a civic program will be conducted at Daley Center Plaza.

We will hear from President Mazewski, U.S. Senator Percy, Congressman Annunzio and Jan Nowak, former director of Radio Free Europe.

In the evening, at Hilton Hotel, a gala 40th anniversary banquet. We will have a prominent speaker from Washington, D.C.

Finally, the commemoration will conclude on Sunday May 6 with the offering of Mass at Holy Trinity Church.

Let us regress for a moment. What does the 3rd of May 1791 Constitution mean to us?

To the Poles and their descendants May 3 is a national holiday—for it bestows upon the Poles a priceless heritage of humanitarianism, tolerance and a democratic precept when Europe lived under the existence of unconditional power and tyranny exemplified by Prussia and Russia.

Poland's parliamentary system actually began at the turn of the 15th Century, but a series of defensive wars, internal stresses, outside influences, widespread permissiveness and excessive concern for the right to dissent brought Poland to the brink of disaster and anarchy in the 19th Century.

The May 3rd Constitution was the first liberal constitution in Europe and the second in the world, after the Constitution of the United States. Following the American pattern it established three independent branches of government—executive, legislative and judiciary. Throughout the Constitution runs a philosophy of humanitarianism and tolerance, such as liberty to all people—rule by majority—secret ballot at all elections—religious freedom and liberty.

In terms of democratic precept, the 3rd of May Constitution is a landmark event in history of Central and Eastern Europe. This is one part of our celebration.

Today we honor the 40 years of untiring efforts and service to Polonia by the PAC.

The preamble of PAC lasted 40 years. It is as fresh in concept for today:

"In the name of God Almighty! We, the representatives of united Polonia in America, gathered at Congress in Buffalo, N.Y., May 1944, conscious of our responsibilities as citizens of the United States pledge our love, attachment, absolute service and active participation in the American life as Americans, in whose veins flows the Polish blood.

We solemnly affirm to bring far reaching help to the Polish people and in order to express our feelings and wishes in a real sense. Therefore, we establish the Polish American Congress. . ."

Today PAC is the representative body of over 12 million Americans of Polish ancestry and therefore occupies a unique position in the history of American ethnic groups.

It was the first large body of Americans that opposed many of the unjustified concessions that the Western powers granted the Soviet Union during World War 2 and its aftermath.

These unconditional concessions that gave Russia unwarranted domination over Poland and East Central Europe were the primary motivation for the constitutional assembly of PAC on May 30, 1944, in Buffalo, N.Y. where 5,000 delegates representing all Polish organizations agreed on a unified action in behalf of a free and independent Poland and for the betterment of Americans of Polish ancestry.

Today we have 33 state divisions, fundamental units of PAC being the activists of Polonia.

Our objectives and goals are, to give complete support to the government of the United States in its efforts to maintain a durable peace, based on principles of democracy and the universal application of individual human rights.

To combat derogatory misinformation about Poles and particularly about the Polish Americans, and to promote the positive image of Polonia by projecting the proud heritage of the Polish people and their world-wide contribution in all fields—be it science, industry, arts, civics and religion.

We are proud of our contribution as religious people * * * we are proud of our kinsman Pope John Paul II.

We must together with the Polish American Congress as an umbrella organization foster our commitment and objectives.

The political parties in Washington must understand our well justified demand for proper recognition and appointments or nominations to higher positions of trust and responsibilities.

We can learn very much from the Black Latino Americans. They don't wait. They act. Why can't we.

We must support and encourage our youth. We must support and encourage our intellectuals, artists, men and women of science, writers, educators, business and industry, banking, leaders in the Church for better service to Polonia needs.

Let's not forget the news media, radio and TV * * * We must convince them all that we are here to stay * * * we must press for the right to objective reporting of our contributions in the mainstream of American life.

Recently with pride and pleasure as an American I have viewed the General Motors TV presentation of "George Washington" on CBS, until we realized that the history we were taught in grade school on the War of Independence of 1776 was abridged.

There was an omission of two great generals serving under Washington in this war, namely Thaddeus Kosciuszko and Kazimierz Pulaski. Pulaski gave his life for American Independence.

If GM, CBS and the producers of this presentation saw fit to bring into this story Generals William von Stueben of Prussia and the Marquis de Lafayette of France, then in the name of justice why omit Kosciuszko and Pulaski, who left their native Poland to fight for American Independence?

We all can help the Congress—we all can write letters of protest—we can vote for our friends; combat misinformation promptly. This my Friends, is what the Polish American Congress is all about.

We shall continue our struggle for a truly free and independent Poland within the framework of America's world leadership and security. We are with the SOLIDARITY movement.

Our lives are based on the traditions of Christianity, social progress and justice.

As Abraham Lincoln once said at the conclusion of his address honoring the dead soldiers at Gettysburg on November 19, 1863: ". . . that this Nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom—and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth".

In this I believe—as the sun rises each morning, I am proud to be an American of Polish heritage—I pray to GOD! God bless America!

APRIL 29, 1984.

The South Bend Chapter of the Polish American Congress acknowledges with gratitude the 23 years of faithful service rendered to the South Bend community by Cas and Irene Dzikowski. For the wide variety of Polish music and for the gracious support of Polish activities with publicity on the Polish American Hour every Sunday noon on Radio Station WAMJ, for their part in assisting the Polish community to organize for aid to Poland in need, the PAC is proud to present Mr. and Mrs. Cas Dzikowski with a Certificate of Merit by the National Office of Polish American Congress.

APRIL 29, 1984.

The South Bend Chapter of the Polish American Congress acknowledges with gratitude the many years of service rendered to the South Bend community by Irene Czyzewski. For the delightful Polish music and for the gracious support of Polish activities with her publicity on the Polish Hour every Sunday morning on Radio Station WSBT, for her part in helping the Polish community to aid our friends in need in Poland, the PAC is proud to present Irene Czyzewski with a Certificate of Merit by the National Office of Polish American Congress.

APRIL 29, 1984.

MR. ALOYSIUS MAZEWSKI,
President, Polish American Congress, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR MR. MAZEWSKI: In a spirit of love and generosity, the "Poland In Need" Committee of South Bend, Indiana is happy to present a check in the amount of $5,000.00 to the Polish American Congress to help our less fortunate brothers and sisters in Poland.

This donation represents the results of our latest fundraising activity. We are fully aware of the great need that continues to exist in Poland and are glad for the opportunity to share our many blessings with the needy in Poland.

You have our best wishes for continued success in your program of assistance to Poland in view of the existing circumstances.

Sincerely,

HELEN V. WILCZEWSKI,
Treasurer,
"Poland In Need" Committee.

Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to extend my congratulations to PAC National President Aloysius Mazewski, PAC National Vice President Edward C. Rozanski, and to the scores of others who have worked with dedication and devotion over the years in behalf of the Polish American community. Defending the principles of democracy and the furtherance of individual human rights are uppermost in the objectives of the Polish American Congress, and I extend my best wishes for continuing success in the years ahead as the officers and members of the Polish American Congress continue their outstanding work in behalf of the just cause of Polonia.●

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO REQUIRE CARIBBEAN BASIN INITIATIVE COUNTRIES TO SHARE TAX INFORMATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. STARK) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, there is an old saying to the effect that "to know what you know and to know what you don't know is to know." When Congress enacted the Caribbean Basin Initiative (CBI) in August 1983, what we did not know at that time was the degree of our success in negotiating exchange of information agreements with prospective beneficiary countries. We believed that the attraction of offering regional trade preferences for the first time as well as qualifying such beneficiary countries for North American area convention status would create an appropriate climate to stimulate these negotiations.

What we now know is that our optimism was excessive and has not been matched by results. At the present time, we have made real progress toward negotiating an agreement only with the Dominican Republic.

The March-April 1984 issue of Price Waterhouse's "International Tax Review," analyses the status of the CBI program designed to obtain information on tax evasion, drug money, and the flow of organized crime loot. To quote from the article:

> The main result to date of the exchange of information provision has been to give the Caribbean tax havens (and aspiring tax havens) a highly visible forum in which to assure the world that Yankee money cannot unseal their lips.

Treasury has reported that there are serious tax haven problems in five countries: the Bahamas, Bermuda, the Caymans, the Netherlands Antilles, and Panama. It was not expected that these countries would be interested in tax information exchange agreements: Their role as tax havens is more important than any possible gains they can get from being designated as convention centers. But other area countries are also thumbing their noses at us: St. Vincent and the Grenadines have rejected an agreement, as have Barbados and Montserrat. The Prime Minister of St. Vincent and the Grenadines has reportedly said, the United States wants "top secret information on offshore banking operations" but "we are not going to make disclosure on accounts that come within the area of confidentiality and on people who do business with us."

These tax havens are a refugee for blood money; for the proceeds of drug trafficking, for organized crime loot, for unpatriotic citizens cheating on their taxes.

Therefore, I am today introducing legislation to amend the CBI Act to require that a country may not be designated as a beneficiary unless it enters into an agreement with the United States to provide for the exchange of tax information.

Mr. Speaker, this condition is a reasonable one to impose upon a process designed to invigorate the economy of the Caribbean community. I strongly urge the prompt consideration of this bill, so as to correct a glaring defect in the act as originally passed. It will send a clear signal that acceptance of preferences by a country must be matched by its willingness to assume complementary responsibilities which will foster compliance with our tax laws. In a partnership such as is envisioned by the CBI, we should not accept less.●

THE INACCURATE CONGRESSIONAL RECORD

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, even the title of this document "the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD" sounds important. Most people assume that it is what it says it is; an accurate record of the proceedings of Congress. Yet the modern-day CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is significantly altered before printing; distorted in its content and quite often inaccurate.

The alterations and distortions grow out of a privilege granted to Members of Congress to revise and extend their remarks. The privilege may have made sense at one point in our legislative history for it does provide an opportunity to make grammatical changes or add pertinent material not actually spoken because of time constraints on debate.

Whatever the limited purpose, the practice was to have served, revising and extending has become a large loophole which permits Representatives and Senators to substantially alter their own remarks. Therefore, the RECORD which was intended and is thought of as a verbatim account of congressional proceedings has become something altogether different.

It is full of speeches never delivered; speeches made are quite often drastically changed before the RECORD is printed or in some cases deleted entirely. Explanations about the purpose of legislation under consideration are regularly manufactured and inserted into the RECORD after the deliberations have been completed.

And this whole process of alteration and distortion takes place under a cover of secrecy since no one is permitted access to legislative transcripts before the RECORD is printed.

The result is disastrous. The public often is provided deception rather than truth about congressional proceedings. Those institutions of our society which must rely on the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to interpret our laws, including our courts and our regulatory agencies, are left relying on a mixture of fact and fiction.

Let us consider a minute how revise and extend was supposed to work. As is the practice here in the House, a practice right now being engaged in, reporters are here taking down what is said.

Within about a half an hour of the speech being made on the floor, the transcripts are made available to the Members of Congress who delivered the remarks. We are supposed to take a look at those transcripts, look for grammatical errors, and other assorted problems and then make nonsubstantive changes, if necessary, on those transcripts. The transcripts then go back to the reporters who submit those transcripts then for printing as corrected in what is the RECORD for the next day.

The problem is that this practice has developed into what James Nathan Miller, writing in the February 1983 Reader's Digest, has called, Congress' License to Lie.

He writes in that article, and I quote:

> According to Congressional rules and custom what a Member actually does to his manuscript is a matter between him and his conscience. Nobody checks up on him. And so revising and extending has often been used as a license to lie.

He continues:

> They just don't wipe out words they wished they hadn't uttered, they also glue in whole speeches they wished they had delivered. And they alter words to reverse positions they wished they had taken. As a result, the RECORD is probably the government's most untrustworthy official publication. Up to 70 percent of what is in it is never spoken on the floor and 10 to 15 percent of what was spoken doesn't get in it.

The newspaper columnist and TV commentator, Jack Anderson, looked at the evidence given him by his staff investigators who took an indepth look at a 2-day period during which they looked at transcripts and then compared them to the document and after reviewing that information, Jack Anderson called the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, "A fraud, a travesty, a monumental sham."

The specific abuses range from minor to major, but many, I must say, defy the imagination.

The late Representative from Wisconsin, William Steiger, took a real interest in this issue and a real interest in trying to bring about CONGRESSIONAL RECORD reforms. He discovered, as a part of his investigation, for example, that a day in 1977, when Congress was not even in session, Congress managed to produce a 131-page edition of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Imagine that, we produced 131 pages of speeches that could not have possibly been delivered on that day on the House floor because the Congress was not even in session.

In 1972, Representative Hale Boggs delivered an address to the House, despite the fact that he had been reported missing 2 days earlier in a small plane disaster in Alaska and in that accident disappeared forever. And yet 2 days after that, he had delivered a speech in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, duly printed.

Such abuses and others like them convinced Congress that some controls were needed in the late seventies. In 1978, a Steiger resolution was passed which required bullets to be placed before and after any speech in the RECORD that was not actually delivered on the House floor. Clearly that reform, though well intentioned, has not worked.

We are supposed to produce a "substantially verbatim report of House proceedings." That has been required by House rules since 1895.

By virtually all accounts, that mandate has been severely weakened and even abused to the point where one Member of Congress has labeled it "meaningless."

The consequences of that erosion are crucial to the integrity not only of the institution as a whole, but to the rights and responsibilities that Members of Congress have to insure that their constituents' views are accurately represented.

Just a few examples will more adequately illustrate how far we have allowed the standard to slip. We had an incident during the summer of 1983 in which one Member of the House held his floor statement, which included some of my remarks, as well as those of a number of other Members, beyond the deadline for submission in the evening.

As a result, my comments and the comments of others were completely omitted from that day's proceedings, despite the fact that we had indeed taken part in a lengthy and somewhat heated debate. The RECORD for that day therefore ends up being a distorted RECORD.

In December 1981, the House passed what seemed to be a relatively noncontroversial bill dealing with black lung sufferers. The bill's benefits for coal miners were adequately explained. Unexplained and unspoken though was an amendment that had been added during the Senate consideration which greatly liberalized allowable living expense deductions for Members of Congress, which had the effect of providing a substantial pay increase, if you want to look at it in that way.

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for that day includes two paragraphs beginning with the words, "In the first continuing resolution," and ending with, "Members may deduct without substantiation for away-from-home business expenses."

But those words were never spoken, nor were there any bullets indicating that it is a statement that was not even given on the House floor.

Indicative of the magnitude of the problem is the passage of the $98 billion tax increase bill in August 1982. According to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for that day seven pages of comments were made, roughly 10,000 words in a 10-minute period. In reality, the vast majority of those words were never spoken on the floor of the House, nor could they have been humanly spoken in the short period of time that was allocated. Neither were they even inserted into the RECORD before the actual vote was recorded. And again, none of the remarks were even identified by bullets to indicate that they were not spoken on the House floor.

In another case, a recent case, the debate over school prayer produced a statement on the House floor by a Member who got up and said first:

> There is no procedure within the House whereby we can bring up a school prayer amendment through some method which has anything to do with these 1-minute speeches. That is not within the procedures of the House.

That is what he said. That is what he said when you go back and take a look at the actual video tapes of the House that day.

Well, he was called on that. Some of us got up and in 1-minute speeches which followed that said that indeed there was a procedure by which it could be done. A procedure that the Chair was not particularly in favor of, but nevertheless it was a procedure that certainly could be used.

When the RECORD came out, he had changed his original speech to say first, "There is no accepted procedure within the House." He qualified his remarks.

Later on he said, "It is not within the understood procedures of the House," further qualifying his remarks, thereby making the remarks that were made later on look ridiculous in contrast, even though those remarks were not changed. A change of the RECORD, a distortion of the RECORD, purposely, knowingly done and something which I think reflects adversely on the body.

In another instance, during the ERA discussion last year, during the 1-minute speeches which preceded that discussion, one Member of Congress got up and made the statement that the Constitution begins with the words, "All men are created equal," and then went on and made a whole speech about how the Constitution ought to be made sex neutral with the amendment that we were about to take up.

Well, a few moments later I got up and suggested that that was a totally wrong characterization, that the Constitution did not begin with the words, "All men are created equal," that those words are found in the Declaration of Independence.

Sure enough. When the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD came out the next day, the Member who had made the speech originally changed her words so that it said, "In the Declaration of Independence it says that . ." and changed her speech accordingly, thereby rendering my speech in rebuttal, which was not changed at all, somewhat inaccurate in its appearance, even though it was the accurate presentation of what went on on the floor for that day.

Well, I guess the key question about all of this is whether or not what we do substantially differs from the preparation of other public documents or the practices of other parliamentary bodies.

Let us think, first of all, about our court system. Now, there is a place where they deal with matters of life and death, where what goes on in the court is very, very important.

I cannot imagine that we would put up in our court system with witnesses going back and changing what they said, with attorneys, who asked questions, going back and changing their questions with the judge's statements in the course of the trial being subject to his revision.

That would not take place. It does not take place. It would be regarded as absolutely absurd in a court situation. And yet that is precisely the kind of thing that we allow in the House of Representatives.

The Canadian and British Parliaments both require that all words spoken in their sessions be recorded verbatim in their records. If it works there, the question is: Why could it not work here?

Well, of course, the answer to that question is: It could work here. That is the way that we could proceed if we cared to do it, if we decided that we were going to actually have an accurate record.

We are different, in part, because of a rather interesting history of the publishing of the proceedings of Congress. All the Constitution says about having a record of Congress is in article I, section 5, of clause 3, in which the Constitution says:

"Each House shall keep a Journal of its Proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such Parts as may in their Judgment require Secrecy. . . ."

Under that provision of the Constitution, the Congress has kept a fairly general Journal of its proceedings.

Now, that is not the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The Journal and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD are two different things, because the Journal is only an abbreviated kind of version of what goes on around here and it only reflects the substance of congressional activities without actually talking about the speeches and all of the things that actually went on.

Each day, at the beginning of the day, we approve that Journal, we have the Speaker's approval of the Journal. That is not approving the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as such. That is simply approving that constitutionally mandated keeping of a journal.

For some time, in the early days of Congress, there was no official effort by Congress to keep a CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as such. There were some people out who observed the workings of Congress, who wanted to have some kind of a written record of what was actually spoken, and so partisan newspapers, private services, grew up that came in and, through one way or another, managed to transcribe some of what went on in the Halls of Congress.

Now, because those publications did not always get it too accurate, they did permit the Members to come and take a look at what it was that had been taken down, and they gave them the privilege of what we now call revising and extending, of changing the remarks to more accurately reflect what was actually said. And it must be said that most Members of Congress during that time, during those early days, took that privilege quite seriously and exercised it quite a good deal.

However, as Congress became more and more involved in national affairs and as the ability to take notes improved, the process became quite cumbersome, and long delays in the coverage of what was said in Congress were not unusual. And so finally Congress was moved to act in a way that would have us do our own system of reporting. On March 4, 1873, the Government Printing Office began publication of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

In a paper prepared by the Mountain States Legal Foundation for submission in a Federal court action, the following statement gives us a little bit of perspective of what happened after that:

> Yet it was not until January 12, 1895, that Congress passed any legislation as to the form the Congressional Record was to take. This statute, codified as 44 U.S.C. 901 (1980), has remained unchanged and states: "The Joint Committee on Printing shall control the arrangement and style of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and while providing that it shall be substantially a verbatim report of proceedings, shall take all needed action for reduction of unnecessary bulk."

Continuing the quotation from the Mountain States Legal Foundation:

> The language "substantially a verbatim report" and "reduction of unnecessary bulk" does suggest that additions and deletions were contemplated by the statute's draftsman, but certainly not wholesale distortions.

Let us think a little bit about what happens when you have wholesale distortions of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

What are the implications of that to the country?

Well, first of all there are some very major legal implications. Many court decisions and regulatory decisions affecting the lives of millions often hinge on the legislative history of a bill or amendment, and that legislative history is determined by debate on the bill during the consideration here on the floor of the House. To have members' statements willfully and intentionally distorted strikes at the very heart of that process and goes right to the core of our responsibilities as Members of Congress to accurately represent our constituents' opinions.

How can we, if our speeches are altered and our original intentions are open to distortions, say that we have an accurate record in this Congress?

It goes, second, to the integrity of this institution. That integrity has been severely weakened, as it is, over the past several years, and it certainly is not improved when people know that what is printed in the RECORD is not exactly what is spoken on the floor of the House. Who can trust an institution that permits its official record to be a lie and an undermining of the truth?

There is another consideration here and one that we have got to think a little bit about, and that is the fact that we do now have televised proceedings of the House. We now have a dual record, therefore, of House proceedings, one in video and the other printed. The printed record, as I have been describing, is often contrary to the actual proceedings of Congress. Consequently, the video record is the only true, accurate representation of what takes place on the floor of Congress, and it makes for some interesting problems when you compare the video record and the printed record and find the two to be substantially different. That leads to all kinds of questions about what it is Congress really does.

But the video record, the truth, is interestingly destroyed after a few months, leaving the distorted printed record to stand as the official record in terms of posterity.

In my opinion, that can no longer be allowed to occur. We must begin the process of implementing verbatim transcripts of House proceedings so that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD matches reality. Whereas 100 years ago technology precluded that option, today technology and the truth demand that that option be exercised.

The standard for the future should be that voiced by Representative Jefferson Davis on February 18, 1851, and I quote:

I am willing that my own remarks should stand and be published as they are taken by reporters. I am willing that they should go out in the careless and poor language in which they were delivered in order that there may be a fairness in the record, fairness in the representation as it goes out to the country.

What we are talking about is truth. The U.S. House of Representatives hardly can expect to be trusted if it has little regard for the truth and its records have little acquaintance with the truth.

The truth, it has been said, shall make us free. The assumption, therefore, must be that truth is also required to keep us free. That is why the record of how our laws are made, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, should be the truth and nothing but the truth. Anything else brings daily disgrace to our legislative process.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mr. HAWKINS, from the Committee on House Administration, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the House of the following titles, which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H.R. 3376. An act to declare that the United States holds certain lands in trust for the Makah Indian Tribe, Washington; and

H.R. 3555. An act to declare certain lands held by the Seneca Nation of Indians to be part of the Allegany Reservation in the State of New York.

SENATE ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The SPEAKER announced his signature to an enrolled bill of the Senate of the following title:

S. 2597. An act to authorize the awarding of special congressional gold medals to the daughter of Harry S. Truman, to Lady Bird Johnson, and to Elie Wiesel.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. LEHMAN of California. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 8 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, May 2, 1984, at 3 p.m.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII, reports of committees were delivered to the Clerk for printing and reference to the proper calendar, as follows:

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI: Committee on Ways and Means. H.R. 4784. A bill to reform the remedies available to U.S. producers regarding unfair import competition, and for other purposes; with amendments (Rept. No. 98-725). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

Mr. BOLAND: Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence. H.R. 5164. A bill to amend the National Security Act of 1947 to regulate public disclosure of information held by the Central Intelligence Agency, and for other purposes; with an amendment (Rept. No. 98-726, Pt. I). Ordered to be printed.

Mr. WHEAT: Committee on Rules. House Resolution 493. Resolution providing for the consideration of H.R. 3457, a bill to prohibit the payment of certain agriculture incentives to persons who produce certain agricultural commodities on highly erodible land; to allow farmers who plant perennial grasses and legumes as a means of building soil quality, rotating crops, or protecting land from wind and water erosion, to enter a certified voluntary set-aside program; and to allow the Secretary of Agriculture to enter into long-term contracts with farmers to remove certain erosion-prone lands from cultivation (Rept. No. 98-727). Referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan: Committee on Rules. House Resolution 494. Resolution providing for the consideration of H.R. 5167, a bill to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1985 for the Armed Forces for procurement, for research, development, test, and evaluation, for operation and maintenance, and for working capital funds, to prescribe personnel strengths for such fiscal year for the Armed Forces and for civilian employees of the Department of Defense, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 98-728). Referred to the House Calendar.

AMENDMENTS

Under clause 6 of rule XXIII, proposed amendments were submitted as follows:

H.R. 4275

By Mr. BATES:

—On page 18, immediately before line 1, insert the following new subparagraph:

(D) Notwithstanding the provisions of subparagraphs B and C, contracts for capacity and associated energy generated at Hoover Dam as a result of the uprating program shall be offered to public and private power entities not presently served by the Boulder Canyon Project Act as specified in this subparagraph. In allocating the uprated power, preference shall first be given to those entities in the Reclamation States serving large residential loads without regard to whether these entities own their own transmission and distribution facilities. Preference shall also be given to entities serving those areas where the retail electric rate for residential use is higher than the average for the state in which the entity or, its major service area is located. As a condition for receiving the uprated power, the entity shall be required to certify that the power received will be resold, or distributed as the case may be at cost plus distribution costs.

By Mrs. BOXER:

—On page 15, strike out line 19 and all that follows thereafter through page 24, line 9 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 205. The power generated at Hoover Dam that is made available by this Act shall be auctioned off at market rates, with auctions conducted by the Secretary of Energy. The Secretary of Energy is authorized to grant to the highest responsible bidder or bidders by competitive bidding, under regulations promulgated in advance, contracts for such power. Such systems of bid, variables, terms, and conditions which the Secretary determines to be useful to accomplish the purposes and policies of this Act shall be submitted to Congress and published in the Federal Register. Within six months after the end of each fiscal year, the Secretary of Energy, in consultation with the Secretary of the Interior, shall report to the Congress with respect to the recovery from the various bids. The Secretary of Energy shall consider whether to auction winter and summer peaking capacity separately, and firm and non-firm energy separately and develop rules and regulations accordingly.

By Mr. EDGAR:

TITLE III

SEC. 301. (a) Each long-term firm power service contract entered into or amended subsequent to one year from the date of enactment of this Act by the Secretary of Energy acting by and through the Western Area Power Administration (hereinafter "Western"), shall contain an article requiring the development and implementation by the purchaser thereunder of an energy conservation program. A long-term firm power service contract is any contract for the sale by Western of firm capacity, with or without energy, which is to be delivered over a period of more than one year. The term "purchaser" includes parent-type entities and their distribution or user members. If more than one such contract exists with a purchaser, only one program will be required for that purchaser. Each such contract article shall:

(1) contain time schedules for meeting program goals and delineate actions to be taken in the event such schedules are not met, which may include a reduction of the allocation of capacity or energy to such purchaser as would otherwise be provided under such contract; and

(2) provide for review and modification of the energy conservation program at not to exceed five year intervals.

(b) For purposes of this Title, an energy conservation program shall:

(1) apply to all uses of energy and capacity which are provided from any federal project;

(2) contain definite goals;

(3) encourage customer consumption efficiency improvements and demand management practices which ensure that the available supply of hydroelectric power is used in an economically efficient and environmentally sound manner.

SEC. 302. (a) Within one year after the date of enactment of this Act, Western shall amend its existing regulations (46 Fed. Reg. 56140) to reflect—

(1) the elements to be considered in the energy conservation programs required by this Title, and

(2) Western's criteria for evaluating and approving such programs.

Such amended regulations shall be promulgated only after public notice and opportunity to comment in accordance with the Administrative Procedure Act (5 U.S.C. §§ 551-706).

(b) The following elements shall be considered by Western in evaluating energy conservation programs:

(1) energy consumption efficiency improvements;

(2) use of renewable energy resources in addition to hydroelectric power;

(3) load management techniques;

(4) cogeneration;

(5) rate design improvements, including:
(i) cost of service pricing;
(ii) elimination of declining block rates;
(iii) time of day rates;
(iv) seasonal rates; and
(v) interruptible rates; and
(6) production efficiency improvements.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

MILITARY APPRECIATION WEEK

HON. CHARLES McC. MATHIAS, JR.

OF MARYLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, during the week beginning May 5, the people of Harford County, Md., will celebrate Military Appreciation Week. This event is sponsored by the Harford County Chamber of Commerce and is designed to celebrate the cooperative relationship the county shares with the U.S. Army at Aberdeen Proving Grounds. The week's events will be highlighted by special exhibitions, commerations and civic activities.

The Aberdeen Proving Ground, located on 80,000 acres of land on the banks of the Susquehanna and Gunpowder Rivers and the Chesapeake Bay, is famous for the contributions it has made to our Nation's defense. It has also had a significant and beneficial impact on Maryland's economy.

The Aberdeen Proving Ground was established in 1917 by a Presidential proclamation that called for acquisition of the land as a weapons testing facility. The first official testing came 2 years later and since then APG has become one of the most diversified military installations in the country. Today, in addition to developing and testing advanced weaponry like the new Abrams M1 main battle tank, it is involved in a number of projects ranging from ballistics development to biomedical research on the safety and health of soldiers. Current testing programs include the testing of tank maintenance, antitank vehicles and the new Divad gun.

Aberdeen Proving Ground plays a key role in the economic life of northeastern Maryland, and is of particular importance to Harford County. It is the major employer in Harford and its neighboring counties with over 8,000 civilian employees and almost 6,000 military personnel.

For the 7th year the growing Harford County Chamber of Commerce continues to recognize the APG's importance to the county during Military Appreciation Week. The week begins with a dinner on May 5 and concludes the following Saturday when an open house and field demonstration will be observed by thousands.

The cooperation that exists among APG, the county chamber, county businesses, and local persons is unique in our country. Military Appreciation Week provides an excellent showcase for this special relationship.●

CHURCH AUDIT PROCEDURES ACT

HON. MICKEY EDWARDS

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. EDWARDS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, as the sponsor of H.R. 2977, the Church Audit Procedures Act, I am pleased to inform my colleagues that a compromise version of this important legislation has been drafted after months of consultation with religious leaders and officials of the Treasury Department. This compromise preserves the integrity of the original bill, by providing needed protection for churches from unnecessary IRS investigations and audits and at the same time, addresses concerns expressed by the Internal Revenue Service and the Treasury Department regarding administrative applications of the act.

The compromise language was attached by unanimous vote in the Senate Finance Committee to the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984 and was subsequently adopted by the full Senate.

The battle to provide churches with adequate protection from the excesses of Government has brought together an impressive coalition of Members of Congress and organizations representing all parts of the political spectrum. I am delighted that we have been able to achieve this important agreement, but regret that the House Ways and Means Committee was not able to address this issue prior to passage of H.R. 4170, the Tax Reform Act. It is my hope that the House-Senate conferees which will meet to reconcile differences between the House and Senate measures will agree to retain the church audit procedures language adopted by the Senate.

So that my House colleagues may be fully informed about the contents of the revised version of the Church Audit Procedures Act, I have inserted below the Senate Finance Committee's report language describing those provisions. I endorse this report language and commend the work of the Senate sponsor, Senator GRASSLEY, the Finance Committee and the Joint Committee on Taxation for their superb work.

Within this otherwise fine report, however, there is one element which lacks sufficient clarity. This was unintentional, but nonetheless requires clarification.

Regarding the scope of the provision, I would like to emphasize that the church audit procedures in this act will become effective at any point at which the tax status of a church, as opposed to that of any individual, becomes the issue in any IRS investigation.

Thus, the IRS would be prohibited from investigating or revoking the tax exempt status of a church or assessing taxes against a church, without following these church audit procedures.

This jurisdictional question may arise in connection with investigations of individuals who may contribute to a church.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that the over 170 House cosponsors of the Church Audit Procedures Act will enthusiastically support the compromise we have achieved and will join me in encouraging the House conferees to agree to retain the language as added in the Senate.

[Church audits (sec. 872 of the bill and Secs. 6501, 7428 and 7605(c) of the Code)]

REASONS FOR CHANGE

The committee's actions concerning church audits were motivated by two competing considerations. First, the committee is aware of the special problems that arise when the Internal Revenue Service (or any governmental agency) examines the records of a church, including problems of separation of church and state and the special relationship of a church to its members. These problems may be compounded by the relative inexperience of churches in dealing with the IRS and the resulting occasional misunderstandings between churches and the IRS. While present law imposes limitations on the examination of church records, these limitations are somewhat vague and rely heavily on internal IRS procedures to protect the rights of a church in the audit process. Additionally, there is some uncertainty regarding the scope of the investigations to which the existing law applies and the nature of the records which are protected by the law.

While desiring to protect churches from undue interference, the committee recognizes that an increasing number of taxpayers have, in recent years, utilized the church form primarily as a tax-avoidance device. The committee believes that the IRS must retain an unhindered ability to pursue individuals who use the church form in this manner.

The bill attempts to resolve these competing considerations by providing a detailed series of rules that the IRS is to follow in investigating churches, both as to their tax-exempt status and as to the existence of unrelated business income. These provisions emphasize the need for a speedy determination of church tax liabilities and, where possible, a determination without unnecessary examination of church books and records. The committee believes that these provisions will protect the rights of legitimate churches without unduly hindering IRS investigations of tax-avoidance schemes posing as religious organizations. Further, the committee believes that the adoption of detailed statutory rules will reduce misunderstandings between churches and the IRS and allow for a more stable and cooperative audit process.

The bill effectively incorporates the present-law examination rules in the new provisions regarding church audits. Thus, there will be no diminution of any rights presently held by a church.

EXPLANATION OF PROVISIONS

Overview

The bill allows the IRS to investigate an organization claiming to be a church only if an IRS regional commissioner reasonably believes, on the basis of facts and circumstances recorded in writing, that the organization is engaged in taxable activities or does not qualify for tax-exemption. The bill also provides expanded notice requirements that must be satisfied before the IRS may examine any church records, including a requirement that church officials have an opportunity to meet with IRS representatives before an examination of such records. Examinations of church records are limited to the extent necessary to determine tax liability. The bill also adds special procedural provisions designed to hasten the determination of church tax liabilities, including a requirement that church audits generally be completed within 2 years after commencement of an investigation.

Restrictions on investigation of churches generally

The bill prohibits the IRS from commencing any investigation or proceeding to determine whether a church (including a convention or association of churches) is engaged in taxable activities, or whether an organization qualifies for tax-exemption as a church under section 501(c)(3) of the Code, unless an IRS regional commissioner reasonably believes, on the basis of facts and circumstances recorded in writing, (1) that the church actually is engaged in taxable activities, or (2) that the organization does not qualify for tax-exemption as a church. The committee intends that this standard will provide a basis for judicial review of the IRS action in commencing the investigation which would not exist if a mere belief standard were applied (Veeders v. Commissioner, 36 F. 2d 343, 345 (7th Cir. 1929)). The committee further intends that the facts and circumstances which form the basis for a reasonable belief must be derived from information lawfully obtained by the IRS. Information obtained from informants used by the IRS for this purpose must not be known to be unreliable.

Before commencing an investigation or proceeding for the purposes described above, the IRS is required to provide written notice to the organization against which the investigation or proceeding is initiated. The notice of commencement of an investigation must include: (1) A list of the Code provisions which authorize the investigation or proceeding, (2) a general explanation of the applicable administrative and Constitutional rights of the organization in connection with the audit (including the right to a pre-examination conference regarding the organization's tax liabilities and the right to request relevant material under the Freedom of Information Act), and (3) an explanation of the concerns which gave rise to the investigation and the general subject matter of the investigation.

The explanation of the church's administrative and Constitutional rights (item (2)) may be of a general nature and need not explain all possible legal and Constitutional aspects of a church audit. However, this statement should include a brief general description of the various stages of the church audit procedures contained in this bill (including the right to a pre-examination conference) and the principle of separation of church and state under the First Amendment.

The explanation of the concerns and general subject matter of the investigation (item (3) above) should be sufficiently specific to allow the church to understand the particular area of church activities or behavior which is being investigated. For example, in an investigation of unrelated business income, the notice should indicate the general activities of the church which may result in unrelated income (e.g. use of a particular property or facility for other than tax-exempt purposes). For an investigation of tax-exempt status, the notice should indicate those general aspects of the church's operations or activities which have given rise to questions regarding its tax-exempt status. The IRS is not to be precluded from expanding its investigation beyond the concerns expressed in the notice as a result of facts and circumstances which subsequently come to its attention (including, where appropriate, an expansion of an unrelated income investigation to include questions of tax-exempt status, or vice-versa).

The notice requirement is not to be interpreted to require the IRS to share particular items of evidence with the church, or to identify its sources of information regarding church activities, where providing such information would be damaging to the investigation or to the sources of IRS information. For example, in an investigation of unrelated business income, the IRS might indicate that its investigation was prompted by a local newspaper advertisement regarding a church-owned business; however, the IRS would not be required to reveal identity of any so-called "informers" within a church (including present or former employees).

The requirement of notice upon commencement of an investigation does not apply to criminal investigations.

Examination of church records and activities—notification of regional counsel

Under the bill, the IRS may examine church records (including books of account and other records) or religious activities to determine tax-exempt status or church tax liability only after the regional commissioner sends a notice of intent to examine church records to the IRS regional counsel. This notice to the regional counsel must be provided at least 15 days after the general commencement of investigation notice (discussed above) is provided to the church. The regional counsel is then allowed 15 days from issuance of the notice to him in which to file an advisory objection to the examination. During this period, the IRS may not begin examination of church records. The committee intends that the regional commissioner will take any objection by the regional counsel into account when determining whether to proceed with the examination of church books and records.

Additional notice and offer of IRS conference

At the same time that the regional counsel is notified of a proposed examination, the regional commissioner is required to send a second notice (in addition to the commencement of investigation notice) to the organization whose records are to be examined. This second notice is required to include (1) a restatement of the information contained in the commencement of investigation notice (discussed above), adjusted for any change in the relevant facts and circumstances during the intervening period, (2) a description of all church records and activities which the IRS seeks to examine, and (3) an offer of an opportunity to request copies of any relevant materials in the possession of the IRS under the Freedom of Information Act. The committee intends that this offer will describe the type of materials available under the Freedom of Information Act in sufficient detail to enable the church to frame a reasonable request for information. Any request for such materials will be subject to the general rules (including rules regarding payment of costs) applicable under the Freedom of Information Act. The types of materials to which an organization is entitled under the Freedom of Information Act is not intended to limit the scope of any IRS investigation (or the scope of church records which may be examined by the IRS).

The regional commissioner is further required, as part of the second notice, to offer the organization an opportunity to meet with an IRS official to discuss the concerns which gave rise to the investigation and the general subject matter of the investigation. The organization will have 15 days after the second notice is sent in which to request such a meeting, during which time the IRS is prohibited from examining church records. This 15-day period runs concurrently with the period during which IRS regional counsel may object to a proposed examination. If an organization requests a meeting, the IRS is required to schedule a meeting and may proceed to examine church records only following the meeting. If an organization makes a properly filed Freedom of Information Act request, the IRS is also prohibited from examining church records until the appeal is granted or a final administrative denial of the appeal is made.

For example, if notice of commencement of an investigation is sent to a church on day 1, notice of a proposed examination may be sent to the church and the IRS regional counsel no earlier than day 15, and no examination of church records may be made prior to day 30. If an organization does not request a meeting or make a Freedom of Information Act request by day 30, the IRS may proceed to examine church records.

The purpose of a meeting between the church and the IRS is to discuss the relevant issues that may arise as part of the investigation, in an effort to resolve the issues of tax-exemption or liability without the necessity of an examination of church books and records. The committee therefore intends that the church and the IRS will make a reasonable effort to resolve outstanding issues at the meeting. To avoid misunderstandings, the committee intends that the IRS will remind the church at the meeting, in general terms, of its rights under the audit process as described above (including the right to make an appropriate request under the Freedom of Information Act). However, the IRS will not be required to reveal information at the meeting of a type properly excludable from a written notice (including information regarding the identity of third-party witnesses or evidence provided by such witnesses).

Definition of church records

Church records include all regularly kept church corporate and financial records, including (but not limited to) corporate minute books, contributor or membership lists, and any materials which qualify as church books of account under present law. The committee further intends that church records will include private correspondence between a church and its members that is in the possession of the church. Church records protected by the bill do not include records previously filed with a public official or, as under present law, newspapers or newsletters distributed generally to the church members.

Records held by third parties (e.g., canceled checks or other records in the possession of a bank) are not considered church records for purposes of the bill. Thus, subject to the general provisions regarding third party summonses, the IRS is permitted access to such records without regard to the requirements of the bill (sec. 7609). As under present law, either the IRS or a third party recordkeeper generally is required, however, to inform a church of any IRS requests for materials.

The bill provides that the IRS may not proceed to revoke a church's tax-exemption or assess any tax for unrelated business income unless the Service follows the church audit procedures as described under the bill. Thus, the IRS may not revoke an exemption or assess tax against a church solely on the basis of third party records, without complying with these procedures. The committee further intends that the IRS will be prohibited from using information obtained from third party bank records in an attempt to avoid the purposes of the bill by harassing individual members of a church. (See, e.g., Powell v. Commissioner, 379 U.S. 48 (1964).)

The notice requirements before examining church records do not apply to criminal investigations.

Scope of examination

The bill provides that church records may be examined only to the extent necessary to determine tax.

The bill retains the present-law rule that the religious activities of any organization claiming to be a church (including a convention or association of churches) may be examined only to the extent necessary to determine whether the organization actually is a church.

Requirement of IRS determination within two years

Under the bill, if any investigation or proceeding is commenced against a church, the IRS will be required to make a determination within two years after notifying the church of the commencement of the investigation. Running of this two-year period is suspended for (1) any period during which any judicial proceeding initiated by the church or its agents challenging the IRS investigation, examination, or proceeding is pending, (2) any period in which the IRS is unable to make a determination because of the refusal of the church or its agents to comply with reasonable and lawful requests for information or materials necessary for the conduct of the investigation, or (3) any period during which any stay of a suit involving access to third-party records is in effect (sec. 7609). Additionally, running of the two-year period is suspended for any period during which the IRS is responding to a properly filed request from the church under the Freedom of Information Act. Running of the two-year period will resume at any point at which the IRS exceeds the statutory time limit for responding to a request (or the appeal of a denial of a request) under the Freedom of Information Act or when any of the suspension periods discussed above expire.

The bill allows the two-year determination period to be extended by mutual agreement of the church and the IRS.

Statute of limitations

The bill requires the IRS to assess any tax against a church (including a convention or association of churches) within three years after the relevant tax return is due. The IRS also is prohibited from bringing a court proceeding for collection without assessment more than three years after the tax was due. These limitations apply regardless of whether the church actually filed a return for the taxable year in question. No limitation applies in cases of fraud or willful tax evasion or in cases of knowing failure to file a return which should have been filed.

Under the bill, running of the three-year limitation period is suspended during any time period when the special two-year limit on IRS determinations of church tax liability is suspended under the rules described above (i.e., the two-year period beginning on commencement of the IRS investigation). This is in addition to the general statutory criteria for suspending the running of the period of limitations for assessment or collection of tax.

The three-year limitation period may be extended by mutual agreement between the church and the IRS.

Declaratory judgments

Under the bill, once the IRS issues a revenue agent's final report ("30-day letter") to a church which proposes to revoke the organization's tax-exempt status as a church, the organization will be deemed to have exhausted its administrative remedies for purposes of the declaratory judgment provision of the Code (sec. 7428). The organization thus will be entitled to bring a declaratory judgment action to preserve its tax-exempt status without awaiting further IRS action.

The bill does not affect the present law rule which generally prohibits injunctions against assessment or collection of tax (sec. 7421).

Further requirements

The bill requires the IRS regional counsel to approve in writing the issuance to a church of any statutory notice of deficiency or adverse determination letter.

To prevent unwarranted repeated audits, the IRS regional commissioner is required to obtain written approval from the Assistant Commissioner (Employee Plans/Exempt Organizations) for any second audit of a church arising from the same activities as were examined previously where a first audit of that church resulted in neither (1) revocation of tax-exemption or a change in tax liability of a church for one or more years, nor (2) a request by the IRS for any significant changes in church operational practices (including the church's method of keeping records).

The bill specifies that failure by the IRS to follow proper audit procedures as provided by the bill (including a failure to make a determination within two years) may be raised as a defense (but not an absolute defense) in a proceeding to gain access to church records. Once this defense is raised in such a proceeding, the IRS has the burden of establishing that correct procedures have been followed. As under present law, the IRS will be permitted to correct any violations of proper administrative procedures before continuing an investigation.

Scope of legislation

The committee intends that the church audit procedures provided by this bill will apply when an investigation relates directly to the tax status or liability of a church itself, as opposed to that of any individual. The church audit procedures are not intended to apply to investigations of any individual who has made a gift or other contribution to a church, or to investigations of any tax-exempt organization other than an organization claiming to be a church. This is true although issues regarding a church's tax status may arise in such proceedings as part of a determination of another individual's or organization's tax liability. The procedures also are not intened to apply to routine IRS inquiries to a church, including inquiries with respect to income tax withholding for church employees, social security taxes, and similar matters. However, repeated failure by a church or its agents to respond to IRS inquiries (including inquiries relating to investigations of other taxpayers or routine inquiries described above) may provide a reasonable basis for commencement of an investigation of the church under the applicable church audit procedures.

EFFECTIVE DATE

This provision is effective for investigations, examinations, and other proceedings commencing after the date of enactment of the bill.

REVENUE EFFECT

This provision has a negligible effect upon revenues.●

WASTE IN GOVERNMENT

HON. ELDON RUDD

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, it has been said, "the people demand big government."

The Grace Commission does not challenge this but I do not think anyone would suggest the people demand and approve of waste in Government. Yet the Grace Commission found much unnecessary waste. I would like to outline some of these examples recently published in a national magazine:

The Minority Business Development Agency did not notice when a management consulting firm used part of its $4 million MBDA grant to rent a townhouse and two cars for its executives, buy unauthorized gifts for its employees, and promote "questionable activities." The firm also neglected to pay some $315,000 in Federal and State taxes, consulting fees, and salaries.

The Government Printing Office sends millions of pamphlets and uses duplicate, incorrect, out-of-date mailing lists. The Grace Commission says this lack of bringing the mail lists up to date costs us, the taxpayers, an estimated $96 million a year.

The Federal Government uses 17,000 computers, operated by 250,000 employees, but they are mostly obsolete. On average they are twice as old as computers in private business.

The Social Security Administration's computers stay 4 to 6 weeks behind in issuing new social security cards and the agency has a 3-year backlog on posting retirement contributions. It is unable to process the 7.5 million new claims each year on time or correctly.

Some 20 percent of all tax returns for 1978—that is right, 1978—have yet to be entered into the IRS computer system, a 20-year-old dinosaur that predates most modern computer technology. Delinquent accounts are therefore at $23.2 billion and growing.

The Urban Mass Transit Administration has been unable to close its accounting books since 1979. This agency gives out $425 billion in grants. The Grace Commission report substantiates the claim that some $20 billion can be saved over a 3-year period by straightening out the computer mess.

The Commission recommends naming a manager to oversee computer operations throughout the Government: Hiring competent professionals; upgrading the obsolete systems; and using common payroll, personnel, property-management, and other such systems throughout the Government.

In 1982 the Justice Department seized $317 million in the form of cash and property, such as dope-smuggling planes. But the captured cash, $79 million of the total, was not put into interest-bearing bank accounts. Instead, the Justice Department just let it sit. Noncash assets were allowed to depreciate to as little as 65 percent of their value before they were sold off.

At the Transportation Department, some $473 million in recent grants was paid to contractors an average of 13 days sooner than necessary, costing the Government $13 million in interest payments.

The Grace Commission says:

If payments were made only when due, and bills collected promptly, the Department could save $144 million per year.

The Grace Commission says the Government could save up to $79 billion if it ran its asset management programs as business does. The Commission reports that:

One Government study determined that word processing operators were not as skilled as regular secretaries, so it cut word processing pay by $3,000 a year. The predictable result was that word processing operators disappeared from the Federal word processing pools, only to turn up as secretaries. Some word processing centers went idle for lack of operators. Productivity fell.

The VA has a hospital construction staff of 800, while the Hospital Corp. of America does the same work with a staff of 50. As a result of overstaffing, it takes the VA 7 years to finish a project, versus 2 years at the HCA. Administrative costs are 8 percent, versus 2 percent in the private sector.

Anyone who pays a Federal income tax has and should have an interest in how our Government operates. And all taxpayers should be outraged at the waste and mismanagement in Government. Here is one more example:

When the Agency for International Development bought 399 cars and trucks for projects in the Middle East, and audit found that five were missing; 93 had been diverted to personal or nonproject use; 84 had been sitting idle in parking lots, some for 2 years, and many of the remaining vehicles had been commandeered by host government officials for their private use.

The American public has long known that Government is wasteful. The Grace Commission documents and validates that fact.

Unless the people make it plain to their Representatives in Congress that they want the recommendations of the Grace Commission implemented, they will be dumped into the dust bin along with the reports of the Hoover Commission.●

HONG KONG: HUMAN RIGHTS

HON. JACK F. KEMP

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, over the past few months I have become increasingly concerned over the fate of the free people of Hong Kong. In the ongoing negotiations between the Governments of Great Britain and the People's Republic of China, the people of Hong Kong have had virtually no representation. The latest word from Her Majesty's government, in a statement by the Foreign Secretary, Sir Geoffrey Howe, is that when the British lease on the new territories expires in 1997, Great Britain will relinquish all claims to the colony and it will become a part of the People's Republic of China.

The issue of these negotiations has been set forward very clearly by Robert Cottrell. In an article for the Financial Times he gave strong arguments for concern over the freedoms which the People's Republic of China claims it will preserve for the already free people of Hong Kong. He wrote of the agreement:

It is not likely to mention in passing that such freedoms are already promised to China's people under China's existing constitution, but go unobserved in what remains a totalitarian State.

[From the Financial Times, Apr. 25, 1984]

HONG KONG'S FUTURE—HOW CHINA GOT ITS WAY

(By Robert Cottrell)

The veil of secrecy covering Hong Kong's future was lifted just enough last week for Sir Geoffery Howe, the Foreign Secretary, to tell the territory that its days of British administration are numbered. In 1997, when Britain's lease over most of Hong Kong expires, British authority will cease, and the colony will become once more a part of China.

"The Chinese government," Sir Geoffery said, "have made it clear publicly that they recognise the special circumstances of Hong Kong, and that they want its social and economic systems and lifestyle—in many ways so different from those of mainland China—to remain unchanged. We share with the Chinese Government the strongest possible common interest in these objectives."

Amid the confidence and enthusiasm marking this final leg of Sino-British negotiations, it would be easy to assume that this is exactly what Britain has been negotiating for ever since Mrs. Margaret Thatcher, the Prime Minister, went to Peking and raised the Hong Kong question in September 1982.

The fact is, however, that the settlement now in the process of being reached contains precisely those elements which produced such fear and volatility in Hong Kong only a few months ago—withdrawal of British administration, and the subjection of the territory to Chinese sovereignty with only a paper agreement to separate the territory's liberal capitalism from China's socialism. What has changed?

To start with, the Hong Kong issue has been an extraordinary public relations triumph for China. Its tactics have been an unsophisticated stratagem of carrot-and-stick, but far in advance of Britain's silent shuffling.

While Britain was observing the confidentiality which it was agreed should surround the Sino-British negotiations China was announcing regularly through quasi-official channels the state of the talks, the good fortune which would be Hong Kong's under Chinese sovereignty, and the perils of supporting a continued British administration.

China had the immense negotiating advantage of a simple declared objective—reunification of the motherland, described as a "sacred duty" in the preamble to the Chinese constitution.

Britain, by contrast, has been negotiating on behalf of a territory which it manages at arms' length, in which it has no direct economic interest, and which has itself no substantial democratic means of expressing an opinion of its own.

With the coming into force of the British Nationality Act, Britain publicly underlined the limits of its commitment to the people of Hong Kong while in the middle of negotiating their future. This, together, with rows over overseas students' fees, and the negotiation of world textile quotas, in which the interests of Britain and Hong Kong were opposed, did nothing to win popular sympathy for Britain in the territory.

Until Mrs. Thatcher's visit 18 months ago to Peking, Chinese leaders had set out two objectives; resumption of sovereignty and maintenance of Hong Kong's prosperity.

It seems unlikely that China would have been willing to negotiate some indefinite form of continued British linkage but Mrs. Thatcher's public defence of the legality of Britain's claim to sovereignty over Hong Kong effectively foreclosed that option. From that point onward, China's two main objectives seemed to become: resumption of sovereignty, and the ousting of British administration.

China appears to have conceded nothing of significance at the negotiating table. In July 1983, when regular rounds of formal diplomatic talks began, Chinese leaders issued a "10-point plan" for Hong Kong to a delegation from the Hong Kong Federation of Students (HKFS) on a visit to Peking. The HKFS document is regarded as containing the basics of the settlement which Britain is likely—a year or so later—to initial.

At first, Britain argued that a continued British-linked administration would be the best guarantee of maintaining Hong Kong's "stability and prosperity."

Even then, Britain probably saw its role in Hong Kong being very gradually phased out. But it wanted this to be done over the long term, without a deadline only 14 years away.

China's public anger at Britain's proposals strained the confidence of Hong Kong's businessmen and investors, culminating in the collapse of the Hong Kong dollar in September 1983, which in turn helped bring down a local bank. Both the dollar and the bank were eventually rescued, but China's evident willingness to jeopardise Hong Kong's social and economic stability persuaded Britain to drop its own plans for continued British administration.

The game was effectively over. China had prevailed.

Britain appears to have nursed some hopes early on that China's promises of autonomy to Hong Kong could be in some way "guaranteed," though quite how is not clear. To judge by Sir Geoffrey's comments on Friday, Britain is now looking for "assurances" rather than "guarantees"—those assurances would amount simply to the publication of China's promises in the form of a detailed agreement between the two countries.

China would prefer a shorter, more general, more abstract document. It regards the "basic law" of post-1997 Hong Kong as something to be drawn up by China in consultation with the people of the territory, not as something to be negotiated by Britain in exchange for a cession of sovereignty.

It is therefore far from certain, that Britain will get as detailed an agreement as it might like on Hong Kong's future. But if this situation seems more "acceptable" to Hong Kong than it did two years ago, it is probably for several related reasons:

China convinced Hong Kong relatively early in the negotiations that a cessation of British sovereignty and administration was inevitable.

China greeted any British opposition to its plans with outbursts of public anger calculated to frighten Hong Kong and destabilise its financial markets.

Hong Kong people are so tired of uncertainty that the prospect of a settlement is welcome if only as something to plan towards.

At least China will not touch Hong Kong until 1997, leaving 13 more years of the status quo.

To some Britain has seemed weak and aloof while China's strength has been clear for all to see.

Britain has no real negotiating cards left to play now—not even withholding its approval of an agreement. China has set its September deadline, not necessarily for reaching an agreement with Britain, but for announcing unilaterally its own plans for Hong Kong's future if agreement has not been reached. If anything, Britain may need an agreement more than China, if it wants a sure and stable basis on which to rest its administration of Hong Kong until 1997.

When an agreement does come, it may be as much what is left unsaid, as what is said, which will determine how well the territory works after 1997. The agreement will no doubt promise Hong Kong people a succession of "freedoms." It is not likely to mention in passing that such freedoms are already promised to China's people under China's existing constitution, but go unobserved in what remains a totalitarian State.

The agreement may promise Hong Kong a "democratic" government—though Sir Geoffrey spoke on Friday of a "representative" government, and ducked a request to distinguish between democracy and representation. If so, it will be worth bearing in mind that Xu Jiatun, Pekin's senior representative in Hong Kong, has said that socialism as practiced by China represents democracy in its widest sense.

The agreement is likely to include words to the effect that China will not send down cadres from Peking to interfere with Hong Kong's autonomous government. But it can hardly speak of other, more subtle, ways of influencing the territory through fear or favour.

What of Peking's already-extensive business presence in Hong Kong? Will such firms, and their respective ministries, be able for example to restrain themselves from using political "clout" in commercial transactions?

By the time any Sino-British agreement on Hong Kong's future comes into force, it will already be 13 years old. Most of the administrators who negotiated or ratified it will have retired. Hong Kong's autonomy will ultimately depend not on negotiations, nor agreements, but on the strength and impartiality of its future administrators, and the extent to which those virtues command respect in Peking.●

H.R. 5081, THE FAIR TRADE IN STEEL ACT OF 1984

HON. ELWOOD HILLIS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Speaker, on April 26 I testified before the Subcommittee on Trade of the House Ways and Means Committee in support of H.R. 5081, the Fair Trade in Steel Act of 1984. This bill is supported by the Congressional Steel Caucus, the United Steelworkers, and the Nation's steel industry. I would like to take this opportunity to enter the following remarks into today's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The remarks follow:

TESTIMONY OF CONGRESSMAN ELWOOD H. HILLIS BEFORE THE HOUSE WAYS AND MEANS SUBCOMMITTEE ON TRADE, H.R. 5081, THE FAIR TRADE IN STEEL ACT

I want to thank the Members of the Ways and Means Subcommittee on Trade for this opportunity to testify in support of H.R. 5081, the Fair Trade in Steel Act of 1984.

I believe that this legislation is vital to the interests of America. Without it our domestic steel industry will continue its precipitous slide, with disastrous implications for our national economy and security.

The American steel industry is in a crisis. During the recent recession industry unemployment reached 45 percent. Even now, during the recovery, it stands as high as 29 percent. Within the last eight years more than 200,000 steelworkers have lost their jobs. Capacity utilization has fallen as low as 47 percent. Clearly this must not be allowed to continue.

The American steelworker is, by nature, not an individual who welcomes government intervention. Those familiar with steel mill operations recognize that steelmaking is a strenuous and even dangerous occupation. Steelworkers have always been, and will continue to be, independent—proudly and stubbornly so. All that they ask for is the right to compete fairly in the domestic and international steel market.

The American steel industry has not been given a chance to compete fairly. It is difficult to see how the American steel industry can compete, much less modernize, in an environment where trading practices are so blatantly unfair.

For example, the unanimous final injury determination of the International Trade Commission found that dumping margins for Brazilian plate imports ranged from a minimum of 50 percent to a maximum of 100 percent. This is not an isolated example of dumping. Many nations have engaged in this practice in an effort to make inroads into the American market.

It is unclear how American steelworkers are to compete against substandard wages paid to steelworkers in developing countries. The Congressional Research Service found that 1982 wages, including fringe benefits, were $22.74 for American steelworkers. In Mexico the comparable wage was $2.37, in Taiwan $1.98, in Korea $1.72. American steelworkers have sacrificed wages and benefits in an attempt to become more competitive. Yet how can such workers compete against wages of $1.72 per hour?

Those opposed to this legislation claim the American steel industry is inefficient. This is refuted by a recent study by World Steel Dynamics, a branch of Paine Webber, which found that the productivity of American integrated steelmakers has surpassed that of Japan, West Germany, France, and the United Kindgom.

It is claimed that steel management is unwilling to make necessary investments in order to modernize. While this was once true it is no longer. American steelmakers recognize that they must modernize their operations to compete in the international market, and they are responding. For example, Bethlehem Steel Corporation, to cite only one example, has announced plans to invest $540 million to install continuous casters in its Burns Harbor, Indiana and Sparrows Point, Maryland plants.

Installation of modern equipment and the renewed efforts of American steelworkers will not, by itself, be enough. For example, Bethlehem installed a modern 110-inch plate mill in its Burns Harbor facility in 1978. Not once in the six years since then has it operated at capacity. At capacity this mill would be employing over 300 workers. Currently it employs 66. Despite their best efforts, it has been impossible for Bethlehem to fairly compete against foreign steel.

Critics of the steel industry say that the industry must continue to modernize. Industry and labor agree, but it is difficult to see where this capital will come from given present conditions. The Office of Technology Assessment found that the industry will need to spend more than $30 billion just to replace obsolete equipment. The American Iron and Steel Institute estimates that over the next decade the industry will need to spend $60 billion (in 1982 dollars) to bring all of its facilities up to world-class standards.

The industry's inability to further finance modernization is evident. Capital expenditures to modernize have fallen during this decade, and will continue to fall this year. The industry must increasingly look towards internally generated funding for its needs. It is difficult to see how this will be possible given the continuing influx of cheap foreign steel.

The consequences of this are evident. I fear that the long-term consequences are even more ominous.

As a Member of the Armed Services Committee, I am alarmed at the prospects of the United States being increasingly dependent on foreign steel for its domestic needs. Steel is our most important industrial material, and is a critical component of our infrastructure. There is not a major American sector which does not depend heavily on steel, be it manufacturing, construction, energy, transportation, mining, or agriculture. In addition, steel is a vital component of military equipment such as tanks and guns.

In the event of a steel shortage the United States would be open to rapid price escalation of its steel imports. This situation occurred in 1973-1974. Because of shortages foreign steel producers were able to command an average premium of $60 per ton, or approximately 25 percent above the domestic price. During this period the United States paid $1.8 billion for the privilege of buying imported steel. This was at a time when foreign steel accounted for 16 percent of the domestic market. In January foreign steel imports were 26 percent.

Once lost, American steel capacity is not easily replaced. Closed plants are not mothballed. They are scrapped and sold for junk. Highly skilled workers move away.

It is not impossible to foresee a time when America would find itself as seriously dependent on foreign steel as it was on foreign oil. The implications that this would have are most serious. This would affect our European and other allies as well. Many of them look toward the United States to provide both direct and indirect strategic support. Our efforts to give them such assistance would be greatly hampered by a long-term steel shortage.

The Fair Trade in Steel Act will not give the American steel industry a free ride. It will give it five years in which to modernize itself while protected from unfair foreign steel trading practices. During this time the industry will be monitored to insure that modernization continues.

I have brought with me today letters that I have received from my constituents asking that the Congress act now to save this industry. I would like to read to you part of a letter which I have recently received:

Dear Congressman HILLIS:

* * * I wanted to write and tell you that I have been working for a steel mill for 10 years, and that out of those 10 years I have been laid-off for 3 years. The latest lay-off lasted 22 months. In the April 17 issue of the Hammond "Times" there was a front-page story saying that my plant is to be closed.

Now so far, since I have been laid-off, I have lost my new car * * * and I am about to lose my house.

Now I'm not crying on your shoulder, but as a steelworker I think something should be done about all of this imported steel.

When I worked in the mill I thought I was making a good life for my family and myself. But now I feel as though my country doesn't want to do anything to help the mills.

We are witnessing the demise of a vital American industry. We must act now if we are to reverse this. Current legislative and regulatory procedures are not working. A comprehensive solution to this problem, as set forth in H.R. 5081, the Fair Trade in Steel Act, is clearly needed.●

ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

OF IOWA

Tuesday, April 24, 1984

● Mr. LEACH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues on this sober occasion in remembering the tragic slaughter of the Armenian people nearly seven decades ago. The historical record of massacres and deportations in 1915 and the years after is bone-chilling and led then-U.S. Ambassador to the Ottoman Empire, Henry Morgenthau, Sr., to warn in a cable to Washington that "* * * it appears that a campaign of race extermination is in progress.* * *"

While the 20th century witnessed its first genocide in the shadows of Mount Ararat, it was not until the conclusion of World War II and the horrors of still another Holocaust in Nazi Germany that the revulsion of civilized humanity against such grievous crimes was translated into specific international remedies. Unfortunately, the Genocide Convention, which sought to provide for the prevention and punishment of such future crimes, has not to date been ratified by the United States.

Today, as we remember the massacres of the Armenians so long ago, it is important that we ask ourselves if remembering is enough. It is a dark blotch on the national reputation of the United States—as the leading democracy and advocate of the rule of law—that we have failed to ratify the Genocide Convention of 1948. Although administrations under both Republican and Democratic Presidents have urged ratification, the United States remains outside the convention. It is time for the United States to reassert its moral leadership in this area. No longer should we content ourselves with days of remembrance alone. If the civilized international community can outlaw hijacking and other crimes, we must insure that a crime so heinous as genocide is also outlawed.

Finally it should be stressed that the vast majority of Members of this body have no intention of increasing tension between the United States and Turkey. The need to protect our commonly shared commitment to the NATO alliance is widely understood. By the recognition of the Armenian tragedy in 1915, no indictment is intended of the present, modern-day Turkish Government.

Concern for terrorism committed by one national group in the past does not justify countervailing terrorism a half century later by descendants of its victims. The past may not be pretty, but its reality does nothing to sanction the senseless acts of terrorism committed by a majority of Armenian extremists against Turkish diplomats and other innocent civilians. There is no justification for such violence even as there is no justification for historical acts of State-sponsored violence or genocide.

By drawing attention once again on this occasion to the tragic deaths of so many Armenians so long ago, the U.S. Congress is once again underscoring the respect for human life and human rights for which this Nation stands. It is also asserting the importance of acknowledging the truth of this awesome genocide. If civilized people do not do so, mankind has little hope of learning from the lessons the past so poignantly provides.●

ARMENIAN MARTYRS' DAY

HON. TONY COELHO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, last week, several Members took part in a special order observing "Armenian Martyrs' Day" and recognizing the destruction caused by the Turkish Government's killing of 1.5 million Armenians from 1915 through 1923. To say that the act was devastating to the Armenian people is an understatement—and yet it is ironic that 69 years later that both the Turkish Government and the Reagan adminstration have failed to acknowledge that this incident ever occurred.

It is very important that we recognize this event and commemorate this day. For although the Turkish Government and the Reagan adminstration would prefer to forget the incident, I feel that it is necessary for us all to be reminded of it—not only to prevent such events from happening in the future, but to pay tribute to those families who were affected by this tragedy. It is sad that the Armenian people have had to live with the fact that the Turkish Government sought to eradicate their people and culture and that they must continue to bear the scar of this incident amid denials of the act by the Turkish Government.

This day has become a day of mourning for the Armenian people, but indeed we should all mourn. It is tragic that such an abhorrent incident can occur in our civilized world, but it is even more tragic that people would choose to ignore it.●

RULES ADOPTED BY THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON HUNGER

HON. MICKEY LELAND

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with rule XI, clause 1(d), I am submitting herewith the rules adopted by the House Select Committee on Hunger on May 1, 1984.

RULES OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON HUNGER

RULE 1.—MEETINGS

The regular meetings of the committee shall be held on the third Tuesday of each month at 9:30 a.m., except when Congress has adjourned. The chairman is authorized to dispense with a regular meeting or to change the date thereof, and to call and convene additional meetings, when circumstances warrant. A special meeting of the committee may be requested by members of the committee in accordance with the provisions of House Rule XI, 2(c)(2). Every member of the committee, unless prevented by unusual circumstances, shall be provided with a memorandum at least three calendar days (excluding Saturdays, Sundays, and legal holidays) prior to each meeting or hearing explaining (1) the purpose of the meeting or hearing; and (2) the names, titles, background and reasons for appearance of any witnesses. The minority staff shall be responsible for providing the same information on witnesses whom the minority may request.

RULE 2.—QUORUMS

A majority of the members of the committee shall constitute a quorum, except that two members shall constitute a quorum for taking testimony and receiving evidence. Proxies shall not be used to establish a quorum. If the chairman is not present at any meeting of the committee, the ranking member of the majority party on the committee who is present shall preside at that meeting.

RULE 3.—COMMITTEE REPORTS

Every committee report shall be approved by a majority vote of the members voting, a quorum being present. Supplemental, minority, or additional views may be filed in accordance with House Rule XI, 2(l)(5). The time allowed for filing such views shall be three calendar days (excluding Saturdays, Sundays, and legal holidays) unless the committee agrees to a different time, but agreement on a shorter time shall require the concurrence of each member seeking to file such views. A proposed report shall not be considered in committee unless the proposed report has been available to the members of the committee for at least three calendar days (excluding Saturdays, Sundays, and legal holidays) prior to the consideration of such proposed report in the committee. If hearings have been held on the matter reported upon, every reasonable effort shall be made to have such hearings available to the members of the committee prior to the consideration of the proposed report in the committee.

RULE 4.—PROXY VOTES

A member may vote by proxy on any measure or matter before the committee and on any amendment or motion pertaining thereto. A proxy shall be in writing and be signed by the member granting the proxy; it shall show the date and time of day it was signed and the date for which it is given and the member to whom the proxy is given. Each proxy authorization shall state that the member is absent on official business or is otherwise unable to be present; shall be limited to the date and specific measure or matter to which it applies; and, unless it states otherwise, shall apply to any amendments or motions pertaining to the measure or matter.

RULE 5.—ROLLCALLS

A rollcall of the members may be had upon the request of any member.

RULE 6.—RECORD OF COMMITTEE ACTIONS

The committee staff shall maintain in the committee offices a complete record of committee actions including a record of the rollcall votes taken at committee business meetings. The original records, or true copies thereof, as appropriate, shall be available for public inspection whenever the committee offices are open for public business. The staff shall assure that such original records are preserved with no unauthorized alteration, additions, or defacement.

RULE 7.—TASK FORCES

The committee may establish such task forces as it deems appropriate. The jurisdiction of such task forces shall be established by the chairman of the committee in consultation with the ranking minority member of the committee. The chairman and ranking minority member of the committee shall serve ex officio on each task force.

RULE 8.—HEARING DATES AND WITNESSES

The chairman of the committee, after consultation with the ranking minority member of the committee, shall announce the date, place, and subject matter of all hearings at least one week prior to the commencement of any hearings, unless he, after consultation with that member, determines that there is good cause to begin such hearings at an earlier date. Witnesses appearing before the committee shall, so far as practicable, submit written statements at least 24 hours in advance of their appearance.

RULE 9.—OPEN MEETINGS

Meetings for the transaction of business and hearings of the committee shall be open to the public or closed in accordance with Rule XI of the House of Representatives.

RULE 10.—FIVE-MINUTE RULE

Insofar as practicable, witnesses shall be permitted to present their oral statements without interruption, questioning by the committee members taking place afterward. After completing his questioning, the chairman shall recognize the ranking majority and then the ranking minority Member, and thereafter in recognizing members present, he may give preference to the members on the basis of their arrival at the hearing, taking into consideration the majority and minority ratio of the members actually present. A member desiring to speak or ask a question shall address the chairman and not the witness in order to insure orderly procedure.

Each member may question the witnesses for 5 minutes, the reply of the witness being included in the 5-minute period. After all members have had an opportunity to ask questions, the round may begin again under the 5-minute rule.

RULE 11.—INVESTIGATIVE HEARINGS; PROCEDURE

Investigative hearings shall be conducted according to the procedures in House Rule XI, 2(k). All questions put to witnesses before the committee shall be relevant to the subject matter before the committee for consideration, and the chairman shall rule on the relevance of any questions put to the witness.

RULE 12.—STENOGRAPHIC RECORD

A stenographic record of all testimony shall be kept of public hearings and shall be made available on such conditions as the chairman may prescribe.

RULE 13.—TV, RADIO, AND PHOTOGRAPHS

When approved by a majority vote, an open meeting or hearing of the committee may be covered, in whole or in part, by television broadcast, radio broadcast, and still photography, by any of such methods of coverage, subject to the provisions of House Rule XI, 3. In order to enforce the provisions of said rule or to maintain an acceptable standard of dignity, propriety, and decorum, the chairman may order such alterations, curtailment or discontinuance of coverage as he determines necessary.

RULE 14.—STAFF

The committee shall have the authority to hire and discharge employees of the professional and clerical staff of the committee. The authorization for the creation of new positions shall be approved by a majority vote of the committee, a quorum being present.

RULE 15.—AUTHORIZATION FOR TRAVEL

Travel to be paid from funds set aside for the full committee for any member or any staff member shall be paid only upon the prior authorization of the chairman. Travel may be authorized by the chairman for any member and any staff member in connection with the attendance of hearings conducted by the committee and meetings, conferences, and investigations which involve activities or subject matter under the general jurisdiction of the committee. Before such authorization is given there shall be submitted to the chairman in writing the following:

(1) The purpose of the travel.

(2) The dates during which travel is to be made and the date or dates of the event for which the travel is being made.

(3) The location of the event for which the travel is to be made.

(4) The names of member and staff seeking authorization.

RULE 16.—ADDITIONAL DUTIES OF CHAIRMAN

The chairman of the committee shall—

(1) make available to other committees the Select Committee's findings and recommendations resulting from the investigations of the committee as appropriate; and

(2) prepare a budget for the committee and present such budget to the committee for its approval.

RULE 17.—AMENDMENT OF RULES

These rules may be modified, amended, or repealed by a majority vote of the committee at a meeting at which a quorum is present, if at least two legislative days' written notice of the proposed change has been provided each member of the committee prior to the meeting date on which such changes are to be discussed and voted upon.●

HON. ELDON RUDD

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, today is "Tax Freedom Day"—the day the average American taxpayer would finish satisfying his or her obligations to Federal, State and local governments if every penny earned went to the tax collectors since the beginning of the year.

According to the Tax Foundation, Inc., "Tax Freedom Day" falls on the same date as last year, but because 1984 is a leap year, taxpayers will have actually had to work 1 extra day to fulfill their tax obligations.

Because of the current drive for further tax increases, rather than responsible spending cuts to bring the deficit under control, I fear "Tax Freedom Day" will come even later in the year in 1985, reversing the progress made in the last 3 years in reducing the tax bite borne by working Americans.

Every dollar's worth of additional tax increase will mean one less dollar in the hands of Americans for savings, investment, or consumer spending; one less dollar to drive the economic recovery and put Americans back to work.

The answer to Federal budget deficits is not higher taxation. It is a tax policy which encourages economic growth, and a responsible spending policy to rein in runaway entitlement spending.●

THE ECONOMY OF CHANGE

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. PHILIP M. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, once again I would like to point out the importance of supporting the Government of South Africa. In a geographic region characterized by brutal dictatorships, terrorism, dramatically failing economies, and mass starvation, the Republic of South Africa stands alone as an example to the contrary.

While political and religious leaders in this country scream about apartheid in South Africa, thousands of blacks are streaming into South Africa to escape the much greater problems that they face in neighboring black-ruled countries. As ironic as it might sound, the Republic of South Africa currently offers greater hope for the future of blacks in southern Africa than Marxist-dominated governments on its borders.

The key to South Africa's success in that region is its economic and political stability. While South Africa is prospering, revolutionary Marxist rhetoric has only succeeded in leading its neighbors down a bloody dead-end road to economic failure. The lessons of history surely must teach us that democracy and freedom can only be achieved in a climate of economic security and not in the midst of poverty.

Attempts to force divestment of U.S. funds from South Africa serve to weaken the only self-sufficient economy in southern Africa. Rather than abandoning South Africa on the grounds that they fail to meet our racial standards, we should encourage peaceful transition to a fully integrated system by supporting those corporations and businesses that follow the Sullivan codes. Positive and productive change is only going to occur in South Africa if we continue to set the example. The United States must remain in support of positive change in South Africa and must not advocate the same types of radical change that are responsible for the tremendous economic and political problems plaguing the rest of southern Africa.

The following article expands upon the notion that change can only occur in a stable atmosphere in southern Africa. I urge my colleagues to look at it closely.

[From the Detroit News, Mar. 30, 1984]

GUNS AND ECONOMICS

The power of South Africa to manhandle its neighbors has been expressed in clear terms in the nonaggression treaty signed with Mozambique. The document is a recognition of the harsh reality that small black African states that seek to topple apartheid in South Africa may be biting off more than they can chew—particularly if they have hitched their wagon to such economically debilitating notions as Marxism.

The two nations pledged to leash the terrorists that operate from the territory of each against the other—the African National Congress in Mozambique and the Mozambique National Resistance in South Africa. Mozambique was getting the worst of the low-grade warfare.

But President Samora M. Machel was forced to his knees as much by his own incompetence as the military strength of the insurgency supported by his South African neighbors. He ran a closed Marxist state that was rapidly running downhill. His economy badly needed some tranquility and a dose of South African expertise. When the Soviet bloc nations cut their support, he negotiated a food-aid package with West Germany.

Black Africans must now see for themselves that history is not going to deliver white South Africa into their hands—that is, as long as neighboring black states are weak. Further, if history is to be their handmaiden it must also be their teacher. The strongest lesson of modern history in that region is that Marxism does not give emerging African nations any sinew.

This is not a time for the Botha government to strut in victory. If wisdom prevails, Mr. Botha and company must realize that they have bought a slice of time. Change is occurring, slowly. The multinational corporations, wise enough to know that disinvestment doesn't contribute to that process, are hanging in and forcing liberalizations in the work place, thereby setting the example. Some statutory rights have been conveyed to the Asians and mixed races and black labor unions are flourishing. South Africa's leaders are well aware of the racial powder keg on which they sit.

The irony of southern Africa has been that despite the hated apartheid, blacks for years have been streaming into South Africa. It is the one economy in the region that works. It creates more jobs and wealth—for white and black—than all the surrounding countries combined.

This gives South Africa tremendous staying power. Moreover, the ruling Afrikaners aren't timid about using that power. They have not only forced Mozambique to the bargaining table, but they appear on the brink of forcing Angola into a somewhat similar agreement.

Careless revolutionary rhetoric has led South Africa's neighbors down a bloody dead end. Perhaps a more tranquil era is dawning in that troubled region. Apartheid will be more threatened by economically viable neighbors than by gangs spouting left-wing rhetoric.●

MARINE RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT BANK ACT

HON. JOHN B. BREAUX

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation, the Marine Resources Development Bank Act, in the hope of establishing a new framework for fisheries development programs. Over the course of the last three decades, the Congress has established, refined, fine-tuned, and otherwise legislated a number of programs in an attempt to provide our fishing industry with the management tools and capital it needs to become a world leader in fisheries production.

Since the early 1970's, we have tended to concentrate our efforts on the construction of a comprehensive management framework that has allowed our fishing industry and managers to address serious problems associated with overfishing by foreign nations and resource cycles that depleted the valuable, renewable fishery resources within 200 miles of our shores. The enactment of the Fishery Conservation and Management Act of 1976, the American Fisheries Promotion Act of 1980, the Fishery Conservation and Management Improvement Act of 1982, as well as the Presidential Proclamation of March 10, 1982, establishing an exclusive economic zone for the United States, have largely fulfilled this goal.

Nonetheless, we still find our fishing industry largely bereft of the financing necessary to transform it from a cottage industry into the world leader it should be. This is not to say that we have not tried to create solutions to this problem. The fisheries loan fund and the title XI obligation guaranty program are testimony to this fact. These programs are also, I believe, testimony to our failure to enact, in one institution, the comprehensive and responsive financial assistance framework that so many who have studied this problem believes is essential.

Last year, the late Congressman Ed Forsythe initiated our efforts to reform the financial services delivery system for the U.S. fishing industry through the introduction of H.R. 3806. That bill was the subject of 2 full days of hearings in our Fisheries and Wildlife Conservation and the Environment Subcommittee. The bill I am introducing today is the result of those hearings and the extensive discussion that ensued.

Under this bill, there would be established a Marine Resources Development Bank with its headquarters located within the metropolitan area of the District of Columbia and with such branch offices throughout the United States as the Board considers necessary or appropriate. The bank would be a Government corporation under the terms of the Government Corporation Control Act. It would have its powers vested in a board of directors consisting of nine voting directors appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and four nonvoting observers, or their respective designees, as follows: First the Secretary of Agriculture; second, the Secretary of Commerce; third the Secretary of the Treasury; and fourth, the U.S. Trade Representative.

The Board would be required to establish and appoint knowledgeable individuals to serve on three private sector advisory committees which would advise the bank regarding its policies and operations in the harvesting, processing, and marketing sectors of the domestic fishing industry. The Board of Directors would establish the offices of the bank, including a chief executive officer who would be responsible for the management of the bank on a full-time basis.

The bank would have the capability to select, employ, and set the salaries of officers and employees as the Board deems necessary, and to organize the bank as it sees fit to fix responsibility and promote efficiency. Upon request of the Board, the head of any Federal agency would be given the authority to detail to the bank, on a reimbursable basis, any of the personnel of that agency to assist the bank in the performance of its functions.

Subject to specified terms and conditions, the bank would have the authority to make loans to citizens of the United States for purposes of assisting them to:

First, finance the cost of purchasing or constructing new U.S. fishing vessels or new fisheries shoreside facilities;

Second, finance the cost of purchasing, reconstructing, or reconditioning used U.S. fishing vessels or used fishery shoreside facilities;

Third, finance the purchase of fishing gear for new or used U.S. fishing vessels;

Fourth, provide working capital necessary to successfully operate a fishing vessel or fisheries shoreside facility for which a loan is made under the above provisions; and Fifth, to refinance any existing obligation for any activity described above.

The Bank would also have the authority to facilitate export transactions involving U.S. fish and fish products, including countertrade, which, in the judgment of the Board, offers sufficient likelihood of repayment to justify the Board's support. Such financial assistance would include loans and insurance to foreign importers of U.S. fish and fish products to improve the capability of importing nations to purchase and use such products and loans to exporters of U.S. fish and fish products to assist such exporters in meeting sales competition from other nations or to make additional export sales. The Bank would also be able, if determined feasible, to make credit financing available for the establishment of facilities in importing nations to handle U.S. fish and fish products, to provide guarantees for loans extended by financial institutions or other public or private creditors to export trading companies, and to provide, subject to reasonable charges, technical support to exporters and importers of U.S. fish and fish products. In carrying out its export responsibilities, the Bank would utilize the services of the U.S. Agricultural Trade Offices, which would be required to carry out these functions to the same extent and in the same manner with respect to fish and fish products as they are now carried out with respect to agricultural commodities.

Primary funding for the Bank would come from the issuance of its own obligations in the private credit market, with the full faith and credit of the United States pledged to the payment of all obligations including both principal and interest. The Bank would be limited, at any one time, to having no more than $1.5 billion in outstanding obligations. As required by current market conditions, the Secretary of the Treasury would be required to purchase obligations of the Bank and use as a public debt transaction the proceeds from the sale of any securities issued.

Initial capital for the Bank would come from: First, all appropriated yet unobligated moneys of the fisheries loan fund that are held by the Secretary of Commerce as of October 1, 1984; second, unappropriated funds on deposit in the fisheries loan fund on that date (which are expected to approximate $89.7 million); and third, subsequent foreign fishing fee receipts. Upon creation of the new bank, NMFS would cease to administer the current fisheries loan fund. In addition, the Secretary of Commerce would not be able to guarantee any obligation under title XI of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936, which aids in the financing or refinancing or the construction, reconstruction, reconditioning, or purchase of a fishing vessel or fishery facility. Instead, the bank would provide the necessary funds and services to replace these programs.

There is no question that the U.S. fishing industry is a diverse industry with a broad variety of perspectives. That does not mean, however, that it cannot work together toward common goals. The Marine Resources Development Bank legislation, in that it is a direct result of close consultation with all affected sectors of the domestic fishing industry, could provide a means for reaching the common goal of maximizing economic benefits from the ocean resources under the jurisdiction of the United States. The Fishery Conservation and Management Act was but a first step toward full development of the U.S. fishing industry. The United States has now further emphasized its commitment to maximizing economic benefits from the oceans through the declaration of an exclusive economic zone. The Marine Resources Development Bank could provide an even stronger foundation for the resurgence of the U.S. fishing industry to a position of world leadership. The bill could be a vehicle which will signal that the industry and the Federal Government recognize the current and potential contribution of the domestic fishing industry to the Nation's economy, and that both are prepared to offer their full support to the realization of that potential.●

TASS INADVERTENTLY SALUTES OUR FRIEND DAVE BRODY

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, one good friend to all of us, who does not need an introduction in this Chamber, is Dave Brody.

Dave has been the chief Washington representative of the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith since 1965. Next month, he will be celebrating his 68th birthday.

As a salute to this happy occasion, my colleagues and I could individually pay tribute to Dave on the floor of the House. But I thought a more dramatic—and meaningful—gesture would be to call to the attention of my colleagues the only nonlaudatory profile of Dave I have ever read.

In January of this year, TASS, the Soviet News Agency, carried an in-depth profile of this hard-working individual. Although the story on Dave's career was certainly not intended to be a credit to him, I thought my colleagues would be interested to read what readers in the U.S.S.R. are being told about Mr. Brody, our governmental system, and the cause of Jewry here in the United States.

Accordingly, I insert this TASS article in the RECORD at this point:

"HABITUÉ OF THE CAPITAL"

(By A. Lazarev)

"Only for Senators"—read the signs over the doors of certain official premises of the Congress of the USA. But this does not trouble David Brody. He is brought in by Senator Charles Grassley (Republican, Iowa). In front of the elevator in the Capital there is the same sign—"Only for Senators." Here too the prohibition is no hindrance in the path of David Brody. He is politely invited into the compartment by Senator Jesse Helms (Republican, North Carolina), who, like Grassley, voted for one of the legislative projects needed by Brody.

If one enters the apartment of Brody, then he may see on the walls photographs of presidents and other "celebrities" of the White House, decorated with the autographs of these political figures. "Dave can get into the office of practically any senator more quickly than any other person whom I ever knew," said former US Vice-President Walter Mondale.

Who is this 67 year old energetic habitué of the Capital? "Dave is an un-elected member of the American Senate," thinks Charles Mathias, legislator of the upper house of the Congress from Maryland. And he is very close to the truth. "Brody," according to the "New York Times," is the Washington representative of the "Anti-Defamation League." Here we must be more precise: the League is one of the most influential branches of the largest Jewish organization in the US, "Bnai Brith," which is completely under the control of Zionist circles.

It is perfectly natural that the "energetic lobbying campaign" being conducted by Brody sets as its aim to get approval in Congress of as many legislative projects beneficial to Israel as possible. At the same time he tries to block the passage of proposals which do not correspond to the interests of the Tel Aviv "hawks." Brody often puts American legislators on the right path: "You will not get the good-will of the Arabs by weakening Israel. If Tel Aviv receives the assistance it needs, then the USA will be in a better position."

Brody's lobbying efforts have not gone unnoticed. "He conducts his campaign around the clock," the "New York Times" wrote in this connection. The Zionist agent advertises "his" senators to their electors, arranges meetings for them with persons who might give them financial assistance during election campaigns, and also with journalists. Meanwhile, he does not care to which party the senator belongs or what his views are—only whether he came out in favor of Israel. Brody often holds parties in the evening in his home, and frequently the Israeli ambassador in the USA is invited. As the former West German ambassador to the US, Rolf Pauls, once declared, having also visited in the home of the lobbyist, he "saw more senators there than at the Capital."

Brody has many companions-in-arms, who represent Zionist and pro-Israel organizations. And their pressure on American legislators affects the concrete acts of the Congress, its decisions, and even the absence thereof. Not so long ago the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee published a report with the title, "The Summer of Silence: The Response of Congress to the Israeli invasion of Lebanon." Many members of the US Congress, it says in this report, openly followed the lead of Israel. They refused to condemn it for this act of armed aggression. The growing military-economic assistance of the USA to the Israeli terrorist-state is also a "service" of the Zionist lobby. In the 1983 financial year the Tel Aviv "hawks," not without the help of their agents in the Capital, managed to get an increase of gratis military assistance alone to Israel up to 850 million dollars. In the following financial year it is planned to increase it by another 400 million dollars. On the whole, as CBS TV network reported, from the time of the creation of the Jewish state until 1982, the USA granted Israel 24 billion dollars. During the visit in Washington not long ago of the Israeli emissaries—Prime Minister Y. Shamir and Minister of Defense M. Arens, the White House took upon itself the obligation to grant Tel Aviv another 1.4 billion dollars in the form of gratis assistance.

One of the main aims of the Zionist lobby in the USA is to support the constant flow of the most modern American weapons to Israel. Thus, during the Lebanese aggression about 100 types of American arms were used, which before this had not been tried out in war-time conditions. The most up-to-date "F-16" fighter-bombers have been given to Tel Aviv, and they are used for barbaric attacks on peaceful Arab towns. In all Israel has received 150 of these "birds of prey." The Zionists also have "their people" in the Pentagon. These include the Assistant Minister of Defense for Policy Questions in the Area of International Security, Richard Perle and Deputy Assistant Minister of Defense for International Economic Trade and Questions of Security, Steven Bryen.

"Israel always had good friends in important places in the American Administration and Congress. But when Reagan came to power an unprecedented change occurred in the system of Israeli-American contacts," according to the English journal "New Statesman."

Precisely for this reason all the doors and loop-holes on Capitol Hill are open for David Brody which he sees in his dreams crowned by the Zionist symbol—the six-pointed Star of David.●

SOVIET ACTIVE MEASURES

HON. ROBERT H. MICHEL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, does the Soviet Union spread false information about the United States? It may seem naive to ask such a question, but from time to time it is good to remind ourselves that we are faced with a wily and persistent superpower which is not too concerned over the means it uses to pursue its ends. How do we fight the disinformation programs of the Soviet Union and its satellites? A recent article in USIA World demonstrates that at last we are beginning to take notice of a counter Soviet active measures.

At this point, I wish to insert in the RECORD "Disinformation: No Longer Thriving in Darkness" by Hugh Burleson, USIA World, April, 1984:

DISINFORMATION: NO LONGER THRIVING IN THE DARKNESS

(By Hugh Burleson)

In an article prepared for the NATO Review last year, Undersecretary Eagleburger wrote of active measures by the USSR and its clients:

"Active measures need to be countered by public exposure. They are infections that thrive in the darkness, and sunlight is the best antiseptic."

As an active participant in the interagency Active Measures Working Group (AMWG), the U.S. Information Agency has a primary role in providing the public exposure—the sunlight of plain, objective facts about the United States and its policies—to counter Soviet active measures, especially disinformation.

Not everyone associated with USIA knows what this new term—"active measures"—signifies. It is a Soviet term, aktivnyye meropriyatiya, only recently brought into use in English to denote the particular combination of deceptive techniques which the USSR and its client states employ routinely to advance their policy aims.

In Soviet parlance, active measures are counterposed to such passive measures as political reporting and intelligence analysis. They include covert manipulation or control of the media, written or oral disinformation (including planted rumors), use of foreign communist organizations and front organizations, clandestine radio broadcasting, and other political influence operations.

The form of active measure which USIA professionals most often come across is disinformation embedded in propaganda of Soviet origin. Less often do they discover in a local magazine or newspaper a text purporting to be an official U.S. or European document but saying some very odd things about the policies or actions of the U.S. and/or its allies. Close investigation often proves these to be forgeries.

Until some three years ago, these Soviet-inspired activities were treated mainly as intelligence matters because they usually are perpetrated covertly by KGB agents and operatives. But, they also are normally intended to affect public opinion, or influence the decision-makers and opinion-molders of a society, and hence should unmistakably be treated as public affairs, USIA's area.

As the newly formed Active Measures Working Group, chaired by a deputy assistant secretary of state, formulated its strategy for meeting the problem, USIA naturally took on the job of exposure—publicizing instances of active measures and providing the facts to refute the distorted message.

USIA's strategy. USIA staffers on the front line of dealing with active measures know that the process of exposure boils down essentially to 1) field reporting of the instance of disinformation, 2) Washington analysis of the case and provision of guidance or refutation, and 3) field publicity centering on the facts or policies brought into question in the first place. This strategy against active measures has, for convenience, been tabbed "R.A.P."—reporting, analysis, and publicity—and seeks to counter the activity directly and share information about it with other interested parties.

On a week-in/week-out basis, this means that field posts advise Washington of cases of active measures, usually disinformation spotted in local publications or heard on the radio. In turn, Washington—specifically the Disinformation Response Staff in the Office of Policy Guidance (P/G), with area office support and assistance—looks at each instance and decides how best to deal with it.

P/G also constantly watches the voluminous output of the Soviet and other Bloc media. We feed it, vastly compressed, to the field in a weekly "Soviet Propaganda Themes" cable, designed as an aid in identifying which of the "passing strange" items about the U.S. in the local media may have sprung from the fertile pens of Soviet or Soviet-proxy propagandist and active measure specialists.

Also, by cable and USINFO message, and sometimes by phone, USIA feeds back to USIA posts the best available facts, policy guidance or other wherewithal for refuting allegations or outright fabrications. This is supplemented by occasional Wireless File features dealing with active measures. The Office of Research produces the bimonthly Soviet Propaganda Alert, which provides a fuller framework for understanding the Soviet and Bloc output.

What is involved. A few cases of active measures can illustrate what is involved.

A "neo-classic" active measures was the early 1983 "Kirkpatrick Balkanization text" which appeared in the pro-Soviet New Delhi Patriot of Jan. 25, 1983. It alleged that the government of India had proof of a U.S. plan for "balkanizing" India.

To old India hands, this brought to mind the charge often recycled in India that U.S. intelligence services, under a top-secret "Project Brahmaputra," had for years fomented separatist insurrection among minority groups in northeast India, to split the cluster of states there away from India and thus "balkanize" and weaken this Asian anchor of the nonaligned nations.

Two days later, a fuller version of the "Kirkpatrick" text showed up in a south Indian paper along with a photograph, no less, of page one of an apparent USICA cable transmitting the text of a speech a year earlier by U.S. Ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick at a forum in Washington, D.C. The full text described a comprehensive and provocative policy for destablizing Third World nations and using a Machiavellian ways such resources as food aid to advance supposed U.S. foreign policy aims.

On Jan. 26, 1983, Ambassador Kirkpatrick's denial that she had ever authored or delivered such a speech was cabled to USIA-New Delhi. Within a few days, USIA, with AMWG support, had established that 1) Ambassador Kirkpatrick had attended the Washington forum, but had not spoken there, and 2) the cable pictured in the south Indian paper had dealt with routine administrative matters, not global U.S. policy. In short, the AMWG established that this was a forgery.

We call this active measure neo-classic because:

The English was nearly flawless—apparently crafted by the best talent in Moscow;

Its appearance seemed carefully timed to produce maximum political and psychological impact at the Non-aligned Ministerial Conference opening in New Delhi a few weeks later; and,

It followed the classic active-measure pattern of being very quickly replayed in such far-off places as Managua and recycled through places like Prague and Moscow to crop up over and over in other Third World media outlets, usually with light camouflaging of the source.

Since deployment of U.S. INF weapons—Pershing II's and ground-launched cruise missiles—to NATO countries began last fall, Soviet propagandists and disinformers have made these missiles their favored hardware bogeymen with which to frighten supposedly naive audiences. Over and over, the Soviet media themselves, or Third World media carrying items with the telltale odor of Soviet sourcing, have claimed that the United States will soon deploy these missiles in such unlikely places as South Africa or Pakistan—almost any country on the Kremlin's blacklist will do. Over and over, either the local U.S. embassy on its own initiative, or with Washington input, has had to puncture these flimsy tales. As this is written, the charge most recently has been made in a forged State airgram. The document surfaced in Peru and claimed the U.S. would sell Pershing II's to Chile!

Gradually signs are appearing that in countries targeted by active measures, the officials and media gatekeepers receiving this stuff are increasingly able and ready to identify it as bunk and either "round-file" it or pass it along to USIA for comment and input before printing it. The coordinated effort has not yet reached the stage, though, where the evidence of effectiveness is negative proof: A declining incidence of these Soviet deceptive operations. But, there are signs that our countering effort is making it more difficult for the opposition to successfully pass forgeries or otherwise disinform various publics around the world.●

AN IMPORTANT SAFETY DEVICE—AUTO RESTRAINT SEATS FOR CHILDREN

HON. DENNIS M. HERTEL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. HERTEL of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join with my distinguished colleagues, Mr. ANDERSON, chairman of the Subcommittee on Surface Transportation, Mr. HOWARD, Mr. BARNES, Mr. GORE, Mr. COELHO, and Mr. GOODLING in sponsoring a very important and sensible piece of legislation requiring all the States to adopt a comprehensive child safety seat program.

Automobile accidents are the major cause of death and disfigurement of children in the United States. This statistic is especially tragic because most of the time these deaths and injuries could have been prevented if the child was properly secured in a car safety seat. Automobile accidents kill 10 times as many children as all the diseases we immunize them against combined. Comparing accidents and health care exemplifies the irony of the situation: We spend a lot of time and money to care for our children's health needs, but almost ignore a device that would insure their safety and welfare.

A recent report by the National Transportation Safety Board indicates that over the last 5 years—1978 to 1982—nearly 3,400 child passengers under 5 years old were killed in traffic accidents and more than 250,000 more were injured. Most of these deaths and injuries are preventable; up to 90 percent of the fatalities and 67 percent of the disabling injuries could have been prevented by the proper use of child safety seats.

Car safety seats are the most effective way of protecting a child while in an automobile. One reason children are so vulnerable to injuries in a car crash is the way they are built. The upper part of the body tends to develop faster than the lower part in children under 5 years old. This means if a child is not restrained properly in a sudden stop or accident the child will plunge forward, head first.

Having an adult hold a child in his arms is not a substitute for child safety seats. Studies show that in an accident the impact of the crashing car pushes the passengers forward causing the child to be crushed between the adult and the interior of the car. In other cases, the unrestrained child exerts such a strong force on impact that even the strongest adult would not be able to hold on to the child.

My own State of Michigan passed a child restraint law in April 1982. It requires all infants under 1 year to be properly secured in a child restraint system. Children ages 1 to 4 have to do likewise, unless they are in the backseat where they had the option of using a seatbelt.

The first year the law went into effect the number of children ages 1 to 3 placed in car safety seats rose 191 percent compared to the previous year. The number of casualties for this same group declined nearly 25 percent compared to the year before. Likewise, the number of infants under 1 year placed in an auto safety seat rose 88 percent, bringing injuries down 42 percent from the year before the safety seat law.

The dramatic increase in the number of people using child safety seats demonstrates that people are very willing to participate in this important and sensible program. Nearly one out of two infants under 1 year were portected from injury compared with statistic 1 year before the law. The amazing success of this program in a very short time is a key indicator that all States would benefit by adopting child restraint programs.

Child safety seats save lives and help prevent disabling injuries. Establishing national guidelines for child restraint systems would help insure that every child is protected from injury while in an automobile and that the programs developed by the States adequately and fairly address the needs of children and families.●

MS. GERRI WOODS-WILLIAMS

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure today to bring to my colleagues' attention an extraordinary young woman, Ms. Gerri Woods-Williams of Elizabeth, N.J., for her continuing contribution to the community.

In the past 5 years alone, Ms. Williams has received over a dozen awards and commendations for her community service and achievement, especially for her work with the Urban League Guilds of Union and Essex Counties. Her commitment and dedication to the work of the National Council of Urban League Guilds is without parallel. Ms. Williams is currently treasurer of the national council, and she was president of the Union County Urban League Guilds for 2 years as well as vice president of the Essex County Urban League for 2 years. In addition to her work as treasurer of the national council, she has attended 13 of the last 15 National Urban League conferences. At those conferences she participated in some of the very important national committees such as constitution and by laws, recommendations, budget and finance, and nominating.

Gerri Woods-Williams is a successful businesswoman in the Union and Essex County area of New Jersey, and in fact, she was president of the Union County chapter of the National Association of Negro Business & Professional Women's Club, Inc. But it is her work in the community and on behalf of blacks, minorities, and other disadvantaged persons that is particularly noteworthy. Her efforts on behalf of the United Negro College Fund's fundraising activities prompted letters such as the following:

UNITED NEGRO COLLEGE FUND, INC.,
NEW JERSEY STATE CORPORATIONS COMMITTEE,
Newark, N.J., February 2, 1981.

Mrs. GERRI WILLIAMS,
Elizabeth, N.J.

DEAR GERRI: We cannot begin to thank you enough for dedicating your time, energy and effort to our Telethon—a first for the United Negro College Fund in New Jersey.

All your help in the pre-planning and preparation was so pertinent to the success of the Telethon, resulting to date in a total of $440,000.

Despite some of the temporary obstacles which sometimes occurred, it was an outstanding achievement and one of which you may well be proud.

We look forward with you to the second UNCF Telethon. We could not have done this one without your sharing and doing.

With gratitude and apprecation,

Sincerely,

(Mrs.) VERDELL L. ROUNDTREE.

Gerri Williams is a doer. In 1981 she was selected as one of the Outstanding Young Women of America. While employed as a management specialist at the Internal Revenue Service, she received a Special Achievement Award for her participation in Black History Month. The contents of her commendation letter gives you an idea of the level of commitment Gerri gives to every endeavor she undertakes:

INTERNAL REVENUE SERVICE, DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY,
March 10, 1981.

Ms. GERALDINE WILLIAMS,
Newark, N.J.

Thru: Chief, Resources Management Division.

DEAR MS. WILLIAMS: Congratulations on receiving this Special Achievement Award of $250.00, and Certificate of Award with Seal. This is a special act award for your participation during the month of February in the observance of Black History.

Your enthusiasm and willingness to bring the February activities to fruition in conjunction with the performance of the duties of your position has exceeded normal expectations.

Your accomplishment is worthy of this special recognition and is in keeping with the highest traditions of the Service.

Sincerely,

CORNELIUS J. COLEMAN,
District Director.

If all this is not enough, Gerri Williams has also been active in the planning and coordination of the Congressional Black Caucus' annual legislative weekends. Her efforts and commitment prompted letters such as the following from our colleague, District of Columbia Delegate WALTER FAUNTROY:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., October 6, 1981.

Ms. GERALDINE (GERRI) WILLIAMS,
Elizabeth, N.J.

DEAR GERRI: This is to express my deep appreciation for your support and hard work which contributed to making the Congressional Black Caucus Weekend a success.

In addition, your willingness to assist in sponsoring the Chairman's Reception in its initiation contributed greatly to its success.

Moreover, your help in addressing the Challenge and beginning the process of implementing the Plan is a source of encouragement to me and my colleagues in the Congressional Black Caucus.

Again, many thanks for your help and support. I shall see you soon in New Jersey.

Sincerely yours,

WALTER E. FAUNTROY,
Member of Congress.

It is indeed an honor to know Gerri Woods-Williams. Her energy and commitment to improve her world and the world of those around her is an inspiration to us all. I wish her the best of luck in the future in all her endeavors.●

DAYS OF REMEMBRANCE OF THE VICTIMS OF THE HOLOCAUST

HON. MEL LEVINE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 30, 1984

● Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, we gather this afternoon to commemorate the "Days of Remembrance of the Victims of the Holocaust." It is a solemn and important occasion.

Some 40 years ago the world was ablaze with the fires of war. Under the Nazi regime, particularly heinous, government-sanctioned crimes against humanity were being carried out. In an attempt to realize Adolf Hitler's dream, the Nazis were systematically rounding up the Jews and shipping them to concentration camps, like animals to the slaughter. There they were tortured, experimented upon, humiliated, and finally, exterminated by bullet, burning, or whatever other unspeakably torturous methods could be devised by human beings gone mad.

We meet today to remember the over 6 million Jews who were the victims of Adolf Hitler's madness. Elie Wiesel, a witness to the Holocaust who has written articulately and powerfully about his experience under the Nazi madness, said, "The problem for all of us is what do we do with our memories? We must deal with them or they will crush us. Those who died in anonymity must be remembered in anonymity. Our collective remembrance must save future generations from anonymity." Mr. Wiesel wants us to remember, to prevent such an inhuman catastrophe from recurring.

And so we meet here to remember, as others throughout the world meet to remember, on these special Days. We meet to pay tribute to the more than 6 million innocent lives that perished. We join in sharing the survival of all those who escaped the death sentence of the Holocaust and the survival of a people the Nazis sought to annihilate.

The lessons of the Holocaust must be taught from generation to generation so that humanity will never forget those dark days of Nazi rule. On this day we help to fulfill our collective responsibility to transmit the lessons of history, and we help to insure that never again will a Holocaust happen to any people.●

WORLD FOOD DAY

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, Mr. SIMON and I have introduced House Joint Resolution 556 which would designate October 16, 1984, as World Food Day. World Food Day has been supported by Congress on prior occasions and has proven to be an effective tool for increasing the public's awareness of the global problems of hunger and malnutrition.

Mr. Speaker, I insert a full description of the goals, objectives, and programs actively being planned for World Food Day 1984, and the main activities undertaken in 1983 by the National Committee for World Food Day at this point in the RECORD.

Mr. Speaker, I also insert the full text of House Joint Resolution 556 at this point in the RECORD:

REPORT ON ACTIVITIES AND PLANS OF THE NATIONAL WFD OFFICE 1983-84

World Food Day proved again in 1983 that it is a unique vehicle for unifying and expanding a U.S. (and world) anti-hunger constituency, an important tool for development education and a laboratory for experimentation, idea development and cross-sectoral collaboration. Past experience has also shown the potential for using a one-day focus to initiate and/or strengthen existing year-around activities at local, national and international levels. In sum, World Food Day works and the more it is used the more useful it becomes.

The year-around potential of the program is of special importance as we plan for 1984 and 1985, and the evidence of it—shown in detail in pages of this report to the national committee—is worth summarizing as an introduction to the many separate elements of our activities:

From the beginning in 1981, the WFD secretariat has been a year-around resource/service center, developing and distributing information, assisting field organizers and working with national committee members.

WFD has assisted local organizers and organizations to broader anti-hunger networks and increase the impact of their regular year-around programs; many ongoing programs—local and national—have been set in motion through WFD initiatives.

The WFD mailing list of local organizers, growing each year, is a proven year-around channel for reaching front-line community activists and groups with new ideas and materials.

The size of the national committee and the public response to WFD have helped to prove to public officials at all levels that a broad constituency exists for national and international hunger action.

WFD is demonstrating new possibilities for joint action by NGOs, government and the UN system, and is building human and institutional contacts and trust through the "tripartite" sponsorship of the event.

The international nature of WFD has helped to develop anti-hunger structures in many nations and avenues for exchange of ideas and materials between nations, with joint programing as a logical next step.

This report seeks to highlight the main activities of the WFD program in the U.S. in 1983 and initiatives foreseen for further development in 1984 at each level of program operation: community action, national committee activities, cooperation with public officials at federal, state and local levels, cooperation with the UN system, other international links, media impact. It is, however, a report of the secretariat to sponsoring organizations and cannot reflect the full range of activities undertaken in the filed or by individual national committee members.

COMMUNITY ACTION

Growth: The WFD community organizer list, which was roughly 3,000 in 1981 and 5,000 in 1982, grew to more than 7,000 in 1983. WFD was marked in every city of more than 50,000 population and hundreds of smaller towns. Observances were characterized by diversity and growing significance.

Examples: Statewide WFD conferences in several states; rapidly growing use of WFD for community fund raising; widespread reprinting of national WFD materials such as "sunburst" folder and basic flyer; multiple, highly publicized observances with official participation in many cities.

Secretariat Activities: Four major mailings during year to entire list and individual contacts throughout the year providing ideas, network information, media aids and observance and study materials.

Emphasis on public policy issues such as urban food planning and pre-election meetings with candidates;

Completion of organizer list in cities of 25-50,000 and expansion of contacts in smaller communities;

New study papers for schools and colleges, community groups (in consultation with FAO and others) on 10-year review of World Food Conference, Women in Agriculture, Basic Foods in Developing Nations, etc.;

Production of "Hunger Primer" on world food situation (basic facts, statistics, maps), special bulletin insert for general use, etc.;

Continued assistance to communities on "needs assessment" studies.

NATIONAL COMMITTEE

Growth: National WFD committee member organizations numbered 178 in 1981, 262 in 1982 and 311 in 1983. Special WFD activities by member organizations have grown steadily over the three years, including increased promotion through organizational publications.

Examples: Very positive response by religious groups to appeal by FAO Director-General; increased participation of Jewish organizations on national committee and nationwide through special promotion letter; expanded support of CARE and Church World Service regional offices; strong response nationwide from 4-H chapters; separate educational materials on world food problems by several committee organizations; WFD highlight at UNA-USA national conference and major mailing to local chapters; promotion of WFD through Bread for the World outreach forum series.

Secretariat Activities: All secretariat mailings include full list of national committee member organizations with encouragement to contact national organizations for WFD ideas and materials. Special small flyers provided by members included in secretariat mailings from the following: Alternatives, American Friends Service Committee, American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, Bread for the World, CARE, CAST, Church World Service, Community Nutrition Institute, Food Marketing Institute, FRAC, Gardens for All, Global Perspectives in Education, Heifer Project, Institute for Food and Development Policy, Interfaith Hunger Appeal, International Development Conference, National Farmers Union, Overseas Development Council, OXFAM-America, Project Concern, Science for the People, SEEDS, Society for Nutrition Education, Soil Conservation Society of America, and World Hunger Education Service. Presentations by the national coordinator to key religious meetings and conferences. The secretariat also worked with several members to provide curricular materials.

Some additions to national committee membership;

Assistance from member organizations to adapt FAO prototype education materials;

Publication of a new national committee directory;

Continuation/expansion of mailings of member promotion flyers;

Development of "think pieces" by committee members for WFD mailings;

Increased financial support from national committee members.

GOVERNMENTAL COOPERATION/FEDERAL

Growth: WFD participation and support by federal departments and agencies increased appreciably, headed by the Department of Agriculture (the official WFD sponsoring organization) and AID, but with inputs from approximately ten other government branches.

Examples: White House ceremony with President Reagan signing the WFD proclamation; increase in development education grant by AID and introduction by AID of annual hunger action awards; USDA activities nationwide (experiment stations, extension service, stamp cancellation, media promotion) and Patio ceremony featuring Secretary John Block; joint congressional resolution; letter from 28 senators to President; letter to religious leaders from Senator Hatfield.

Secretariat Activities: Participation in interdepartmental planning committee headed by USDA; liaison work with Congress on joint resolution; meetings with Secretary Block, White House staff, AID and Department of Education; mailing of flyers from USDA on Agriculture in the Classroom; national coordinator was a speaker at Patio ceremony and a member of Secretary Block's party to FAO conference in Rome in November.

Expected growth of role of interdepartmental committee headed by USDA;

Increased cooperation with AID and Department of Education on development education and links to state/local education networks;

Cooperation with BIFAD, FAO and others on symposium packet for World Food Conference 10-year review;

Promote congressional colloquy on world food problems timed with WFD, and participation of legislators in WFD events;

Cooperation with proposed House Select Committee on Hunger as appropriate.

GOVERNMENTAL COOPERATION/STATE-LOCAL

Growth: WFD contacts with state legislative leaders, state superintendents of eduction and mayors were a special emphasis in 1983.

Examples: WFD school materials were distributed to local systems by superintendents of education in 15 states; WFD proclamations were received from all governors again in '83 but joined this year by resolutions from several state legislatures; several gubernatorial proclamations were signed at public ceremonies involving WFD organizers; important expansion occurred in proclamations and participation in observances by mayors.

Secretariat Activities: Special letters sent to all speakers and presidents pro tem of state legislatures; letters with examples of school lesson plans sent to all state superintendents of education; materials on possible right-to-food legislation sent to several state legislators on request; materials sent to (and follow-up contacts made with) interested mayors on urban food policy planning; introductory WFD letters sent to all mayors of cities with 100,000 or more population; presentation by coordinator to Washington representatives of Governors; participation in ad hoc meeting called by U.S. Conference of Mayors on urban food strategies.

Continue to build contacts with mayors on urban food policies and other WFD participation;

Networking among federal, state and local education organizations, with development and distribution of new materials for k-12 as feasible;

Continue work with state legislatures on right-to-food legislation;

Develop links between county/state officials (through National Association of Counties and National Association of State Departments of Agriculture and others) and local WFD coalitions.

COOPERATION WITH FAO AND INTERNATIONAL LINKS

Growth: Each WFD has seen an expansion in cooperation between the WFD secretariat and officials of FAO, as well as new contacts in other countries and regions. This was highlighted in 1983 by the invitation of the national coordinator to Rome for the biennial FAO Conference. The secretariat has continued its close cooperation with the FAO office in Washington.

Examples: WFD on agenda of the FAO Conference with half-day discussion marked by many favorable interventions by national delegations and a special resolution of the Conference calling for renewed support and cooperation with NGOs; creation of a Canadian WFD association; very positive meetings with Ambassador to FAO Millicent Fenwick; publication by FAO of the first annual World Food Report for WFD study; a special appeal by the FAO Director-General to world religious leaders and a joint FAO/UNESCO appeal to ministers of education.

Secretariat Activities: Consultations with FAO officials on long-range WFD planning; joint meetings with Canadian NGOs and Agriculture Canada; initial meetings with pan-Asian and pan-African NGOs on planning and information exchange; meetings with the Organization of American States on a right-to-food symposium (to be considered in 1984); participation with other NGOs on meeting of World Food Council and subsequent mailing; cooperation with PAHO and health NGOs on links between WFD and World Health Day; reprinting and broader distribution of FAO and FAO/UNESCO appeals to religious and education leaders; visits to the secretariat by NGOs from Israel, France and United Kingdom; mail inquiries from many other countries.

Adaptation of new FAO school materials for U.S. use in consultation with national committee education groups;

Distribution of planned FAO paper on 10th anniversary of the World Food Conference and other FAO materials;

Closer cooperation with Canada and Mexico WFD committees.

MEDIA IMPACT

Growth: Although impossible to measure precisely, it is clear that media penetration was substantially higher in 1983 than 1982, both print and electronic, especially at local and regional levels.

Secretariat Activities: "How-to" media guide sent to community organizers; two press releases (March and October) issued by national office; appeal for support issued through National Association of Editorial Cartoonists; request to author of "Ziggy" cartoon for use in PSAs; mailing of 500 WFD "TV identification slides" and 50 radio PSA messages by Ambassador Fenwick (both of these paid for by the National Agricultural Chemical Association); numerous radio and press interviews by national coordinator (including 5-minute taped interview with AP radio going to 1,500 stations).

Development of a press kit including feature material on World Food Conference review;

Greater use of legislators and experts/consultants for radio/TV interviews;

Exploration of documentary on food/hunger issues for television.

NATIONAL OFFICE VOLUNTEER STAFF AND CONSULTANTS

The national WFD office is staffed entirely by volunteers. The national office is open year-around, and the national coordinator is assisted during the summer by interns and throughout the year by other volunteers as needed.

Amy Manela served again as a volunteer public relations consultant. Brooks Robinson had primary responsibility for a new edition of the WFD Directory, Sarah Youd began outreach to towns of 25-50,000 and others assisted with the general work of the office and in assembling special mailings.

In addition to this invaluable and much appreciated assistance, the FAO staff continued to provide back-up services in maintaining print inventories and mail processing.

Further, the secretariat was greatly assisted in 1983 by special donations of art—Tom Wilson, creator of the "Ziggy" cartoon used in our PSA and Dick Ehst as PSA art designer; a work from the estate of the artist DeGrazia used in our post-WFD mailing to organizers, a poster drawing by artist Ted Egri, used in our church bulletin cover series and adopted by the Canadian WFD committee for use in all of their materials, and a woodcut entitled "Harvest the Wheat" by artist Mary Azarian and also used in our church bulletin cover series. Several new songs for use in the WFD songbook were donated by Avery and Marsh, Jules Rotella, Ray Repp, Mary Lou Walker and the Community of New Zoin.

SPECIAL '84 PROGRAM OPPORTUNITIES

10th Anniversary of World Food Conference: The secretariat, which in 1983 distributed a special paper for colleges and universities on "town-grown" cooperation, plans a major effort this year in cooperation with FAO and interested U.S. government and non-governmental groups to encourage university and community symposia to review the goals of the 1974 World Food Conference and what more needs to be done to attain them. WFD observances were held in '83 on more than 1,000 college campuses, and it is hoped that this support can be increased and focused on the World Food Conference review through preparation of special study papers.

Election Year Political Forum: Since WFD began members of congress have received a great many invitations to speak at observances. It is to be expected that there will be an expansion of this public debate and political interplay in the election year to come, especially with the timeliness of WFD on October 16. Secretariat materials will encourage both sides—urging community groups to extend invitations and develop appropriate forums to discuss food-farm-trade issues, while also urging elected officials and candidates to participate. The secretariat will also work with national committee members to publicize and promote election-year activities surrounding national and world food issues.

Mayors and Urban Food Policy: In a program that gathered momentum in '83, the secretariat will continue to build its contacts with mayors and WFD coalitions to develop urban food policies and local-global connections. It will cooperate with the U.S. Conference of Mayors in the development of that organization's proposed design for six urban food policy models and will also work with individual mayors and consultants along these same lines. The secretariat has a packet of materials and is working to acquire further ideas and materials in this area.

K-21 School Materials: The secretariat will continue to expand contacts with state and local school authorities for introduction of world food and hunger curricular materials, building on the enormous increase in receptivity of materials in 1983. New materials will be developed for distribution to school systems and individual teachers, working with FAO and national committee members in the education field. We also hope to begin international exchange of curricular materials.

SOME FINAL THOUGHTS FOR SPONSORING ORGANIZATIONS

The more WFD is used the more useful it becomes is not only true for local communities; it is even more true for national committee members. The WFD core mailing list of community contacts provides direct access to hunger activists across our country—individuals and groups that are eager for new resources for their efforts to end hunger, for information about organizations working on the problems, for contacts with experts in various disciplines. The WFD promotion flyers which we mail for members are one way for you to introduce yourself and your wares to this most receptive audience. One of our member groups sent out a flyer on a new print resource and received requests and inquiries from 31 states.

But there are other no-cost or low-cost ways for you to use WFD and to help the national campaign at the same time.

Staff Awareness: Everyone on your staff from the person who answers the telephone or opens the mail to your officers and board should know that you are a member of the WFD national committee and believe in its goals. Hold a staff meeting or send a staff memo about your involvement.

Member Awareness: Your membership wants to know that your name on the letterhead signifies programmatic involvement. Do a special mailing or put an article or editorial in your next newsletter or magazine explaining why your organization supports WFD.

Public Awareness: Persons other than your own direct constituents want to know what your name on the letterhead means—want to know more about you—would be interested in being introduced to your resources. Consider a flyer for one of our mailings or talk to us about a special print resource that our office can use for targeted mailings.

National Office Support: We need your help in at least three ways.

First—advice and counsel—a chance to talk to you about the way WFD works and can work for you.

Second—complete information in this office about you—samples of your materials, inclusion on your mailing list so we know regularly what you are doing and can share this information and so we can build a reference library for use by the committee, the public and researchers in the field.

Third—financial support—no matter how little—as evidence to foundations and other funding sources that our members believe in WFD—and because the work we do for you and your members costs money.

One final note: the FAO office is moving in March, and we will be moving with it. The new address will be 1001 22nd Street NW., Washington, D.C. 20437. We will announce this to our general mailing list in our first mailing in 1984, but it will be a great help if you would "spread the word" as well.

Whereas hunger and chronic malnutrition remain daily facts of life for hundreds of millions of people throughout the world;

Whereas the children of the world suffer the most serious effects of hunger and malnutrition, with millions of children dying each year from hunger-related illness and disease, and many others suffering permanent physical or mental impairment, including blindness, because of vitamin and protein deficiencies;

Whereas Congress is particularly concerned by the rise of hunger, recurring natural catastrophes, and inadequate food production now affecting a large number of African countries and the need for an appropriate United States response to emergency and long-term food needs of that continent;

Whereas although progress has been made in reducing the incidence of hunger and malnutrition in the United States, certain groups, notably Native Americans, migrant workers, the elderly, and children, remain vulnerable to malnutrition and related diseases;

Whereas the danger posed by malnutrition and related diseases to these groups and to other people is intensified by unemployment and slow rates of economic growth;

Whereas national policies concerning food, farmland, and nutrition require continuing evaluation and should consider and strive for the well-being and protection of all residents of the United States and particularly those most at health risk;

Whereas there is widespread concern that the use and conservation of land and water resources required for food production throughout the United States ensure care for the national patrimony we bequeath to future generations;

Whereas the United States has always supported the principle that the health of a nation depends on a strong agriculture based on private enterprise and the primacy of the independent family farm;

Whereas the United States, as the world's largest producer and trader of food, has a key role to play in efforts to assist nations and people to improve their ability to feed themselves;

Whereas the United States has a long tradition of demonstrating its humanitarian concern for helping the hungry and malnourished;

Whereas efforts to resolve the world hunger problem are critical to the security of the United States and the international community;

Whereas Congress is acutely aware of the paradox of immense farm surpluses and rising farm foreclosures in the United States despite the desperate need for food by hundreds of millions of people around the world;

Whereas a key recommendation of the 1980 report of the Presidential Commission on World Hunger was that efforts be undertaken to increase public awareness of the world hunger problem;

Whereas the member nations of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations designated October 16 of each year as World Food Day because of the need to alert the public to the increasingly dangerous world food situation;

Whereas past observances of World Food Day have been supported by proclamations of the fifty States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and the territories and possessions of the United States, by resolutions of Congress, by Presidential proclamations, by programs of the United States Department of Agriculture and other Government departments and agencies, and by the governments and peoples of many other nations; and

Whereas more than three hundred private and voluntary organizations and many thousands of community leaders are participating in the planning of World Food Day observances this year. Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That October 16, 1984, is hereby proclaimed "World Food Day". The President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling on the people of the United States to observe that day with appropriate activities to explore ways in which our Nation can further contribute to the elimination of hunger in the world.●

CONDEMNING THE USE OF CHEMICAL WEAPONS BY IRAQ—HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 292

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, 69 years ago this week, French soldiers manning the soggy trenches in a Belgian field struggled for life as they were immersed in a slow-moving yellowish cloud rolling forward from German territory. Confusion gave way to terror as unsuspecting soldiers in the Flanders field became victims of the first documented use of chemical warfare agents on the battlefield. Before World War I was over, more than 1.3 million soldiers were poisoned by chlorine and mustard gas, and almost 100,000 died as a result of their exposure.

The terror and suffering produced by chemical weapons during the First World War prompted the drafting of the Geneva Protocol of 1925. Claiming that use of toxic gases and poisoning agents ran counter to international law and human decency, the protocol sought to create an alliance of nations dedicated to elimination of these weapons through renouncing the first use of chemical agents.

The subsequent 59 years of the protocol have not been without violations of the treaty. However, the Geneva Protocol on chemical weapons has contributed to a worldwide spirit of revulsion over the prospects of any nation using poison gas or nerve agents to achieve its ends on the battlefield. More than 100 nations have adhered to the principles of the Protocol and refused to use chemical agents in combat, regardless of the military situation.

Now Iraq, a signatory to the Geneva Protocol for over 50 years, is openly and blatantly violating the international covenant. A team of U.N. investigators has demonstrated, far beyond any reasonable doubt, that mustard gas and nerve agents have been used against Iranian forces in the continuing war between Iran and Iraq. The U.N. diagnosis has been confirmed by medical experts who have examined and treated fallen Iranian soldiers. While lamely protesting the charges leveled by an outraged world community, Iraq simultaneously vows to use any means at its disposal to resist attacks against its borders.

The violation of the treaty banning the use of chemical weapons goes far beyond the pain and suffering inflicted in the deserts of the Middle East. It strikes at the very heart of international law and conscience, undermining the rational attempts of nations to maintain a semblance of decency and integrity in international negotiations. When treaties are adhered to only when it is deemed convenient, then the safety and security of the world is imperiled to a degree seldom witnessed by mankind. Once a treaty based on mutual respect and trust is violated, the door swings open for repeated violations by those nations eager to exploit the weaknesses of pacts centered on the human conscience, rather than military might.

Our Government has already taken steps to interrupt the flow of base materials to Iraq that might be utilized in the production of chemical warfare agents. Negotiations are now underway to produce a substantive ban on chemical weapons through the Conference on Disarmament in Geneva. As we pursue these actions designed to produce positive developments in the near future, however, it is vitally important for our Nation to raise its voice against the present transgressions committed by the Government of Iraq.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join in cosponsoring House Concurrent Resolution 292, which condemns the Iraqi use of chemical weapons as a contravention of international law and the practices of civilized nations. This resolution also condemns the Iranian utilization of "human waves" of young soldiers as sacrificial cannon fodder in the Iran-Iraq war. I urge my colleagues to send a firm message of condemnation to those nations of the world that would gladly embrace barbaric acts, rather than negotiate a peaceful resolution of their problems.●

HON. WALTER E. FAUNTROY

OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Speaker, I want to call to the attention of my colleagues the excellent publication of the Council on Hemispheric Affairs—COHA—Human Rights in Latin America 1983. My staff and I have utilized this most useful document in evaluating events in the Caribbean and Central and South America. It has been most beneficial and I would urge my colleagues to study this document when consideration is given to events in the Western Hemisphere.

As chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus Task Force on Haitian Refugees, I have been most interested in the section that concerns itself with Haiti. I enclose that section as an example of the fine work of COHA as evidenced in the publication Human Rights in Latin America 1983.

HAITI

Despite nominal movement toward democracy in 1983, Haiti remained the fiefdom of the Duvalier family and its cronies, with little evidence of any improvement in the country's bleak human rights record or prospects for future change.

Responding to international pressure, President-for-Life Jean Claude Duvalier conducted the first municipal elections in Haiti in over 25 years between April and August of 1983. Despite this modest move—riddled with irregularities—Duvalier dissolved the legislative assembly in late August and introduced a new constitution that confirms his life-tenure and right to appoint a successor.

Both internal and external forces pressed Duvalier to improve the human rights situation and to stage a true democratic opening—with little success. The Haitian Christian Democratic Party, a number of religious bodies, the U.S. Congress and Pope John Paul II (who visited the island in March), all sharply criticized the harsh practices of the Duvalier regime. But this criticism appeared to have little impact, despite Reagan administration claims to the contrary. The U.S., in fact, increased the level of its foreign assistance to Haiti in 1983, seeming to offer a "carrot" without the much-needed "stick."

The results of the series of municipal elections held across Haiti were mixed. In Cap Haitien, the country's second largest city, and in the southern regional center of Les Cayes, non-government candidates won by significant margins. Mr. Wilson Borgella, a popular hotel owner of Cap Haitien, which has a long history of political independence from the capital, defeated the incumbent mayor. However, in other municipalities, including Jacmel and Port-de-Paix, elections were marred by ballot-stuffing and other serious irregularities.

In the year's most crucial contest, held in the capital, Port-au-Prince, the election was virtually nullified by government intervention. Three members of the banned Haitian Christian Democratic Party and a lawyer from the private Haitian Human Rights League, Mr. Jean Claude Baptiste, were rounded up and detained. The move complemented actions against the Christian Democrats earlier in the year, many of whom were forced into exile after spending months either in hiding or under house arrest. As a result, the Duvalier palace's favorite, Mr. Frank Romain, who earned his tough guy image as a brutal thug under Francois "Papa Doc" Duvalier, was returned to office as mayor with 90 percent of the vote. Christian Democrat Sylvio Claude was re-arrested two months after the August elections, and then released again on December 28.

In neighboring Petionville, the very popular incumbent mayor declined to run once the local "Tonton Macoute", or secret police, chief announced his candidacy.

Voter interest and participation varied widely, with the highest percentage turnout in Cap Haitien. In Port-au-Prince, the electorate seemed indifferent to the election, as most perceived the result to be predetermined and inevitable.

Across the country, local officials responsible for administering the elections were hampered by their inexperience in voter registration and procedures. Voters often used open, color-coded ballots to cast votes, a practice that Haitian officials claimed was needed due to Haiti's high illiteracy rate. There were few reports of overt intimidation of voters or outbreaks of violence at the polls. Most fundamentally, however, the municipal elections boiled down to little more than popularity contests between different "cartels" of candidates. The Duvalier government squelched any efforts to organize political parties, and no criticism of the palace and its policies was heard.

The Pope's visit on March 9 was a landmark event in the nation's recent history. The Pontiff spoke out forcefully against the "misery, hunger and fear" so pervasive in Haiti. (With an annual per capita income of $260 a year, Haiti is the poorest nation in the Western Hemisphere.) Pope John Paul II also declared that "the Church has a prophetic mission in this field inseparable from its religious mission, and it demands the right to carry it out."

To a broad spectrum of Haitians, Catholic, Protestant and Evangelist alike, the Pope's words struck a chord and made clear the Church's commitment to seek improvements in human rights and socio-economic conditions. The papal discourse was also viewed as reinforcing the efforts of the Haitian clergy in its vigorous support of social justice.

Earlier in 1983, the clergy successfully flexed its political muscle to secure the freedom of Mr. Gerard Duclerville, a Catholic lay worker who hosted a popular religious radio program. Arrested in December 1982, Duclerville was held incommunicado and without charges for several weeks, during which time he was severely beaten. Only when six of Haiti's bishops and representatives of religious orders aired a statement denouncing Duclerville's imprisonment was the church activist freed on February 7, 1983. The unprecedented letter, which was read in most of Haiti's Catholic churches in late January, warned that "Today it is Gerard and all those whose names we don't know; tomorrow it is us, it is you, it is me, it is another. Where a man is debased and tortured, all of humanity is debased and tortured." Duclerville's release presumably came about because the Duvalier regime did not want to risk putting the Pope's upcoming visit in jeopardy, a visit which it hoped would bolster the President-for-Life's stature both domestically and abroad.

Expectations of a major political struggle between church and state were raised briefly following the Pope's visit, when Mr. Ernest Bennett, the powerful father-in-law of President Duvalier, published a series of harshly worded broadsides in the official government paper, denouncing some Haitian clerics as communist agitators intent on fomenting a Central American-style revolution in Haiti. However, the confrontation never materialized, and the Church's voice was somewhat more subdued through the rest of the year.

The Reagan administration has taken a considerably more upbeat approach toward the Duvalier government than did the Vatican. In January, former Assistant Secretary of State Thomas Enders issued a statement during his visit to Port-au-Prince hailing the Haitian government's "positive steps" towards democratic rule, including its decision to hold municipal elections and the formation of a government-sponsored human rights commission. U.S. aid to Haiti reached its highest level ever in FY 1983, topping the $45 million mark, in addition to $10 million in supplemental CBI funds. Despite the U.S. administration's enthusiasm over what it portrayed as significant progress toward democratization in Haiti, congressional critics see the Duvalier regime's actions as more shadow than substance. A continuing resolution in November authorized $34 million in economic assistance to Haiti, but made it conditional on progress towards greater democracy and observance of human rights. Next March, President Reagan will be called upon to certify Haiti's observance of these conditions.

The Duvalier government's November 1983 announcement of legislative assembly elections in February 1984 seemed calculated in part to assuage congressional critics of Haiti's domestic policies. In all likelihood, the upcoming vote will not alter the overriding political realities of Haiti under Jean Claude Duvalier: the prohibition of organized political activity and the formation of parties; bullying of the largely impotent Haitian media; and arbitrary arrests, beatings, and, occasionally, torture. If the 1983 elections are any indication, Duvalier's authoritarian rule seems secure.●

IN REMEMBRANCE OF VICTIMS OF THE HOLOCAUST

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to give my full support to this week's observances of the Holocaust, and especially to acknowledge yesterday's groundbreaking of the new Holocaust Memorial.

This year marks the 41st anniversary of the Warsaw ghetto uprising, when a handful of Jewish men, women, and children fought Hitler's SS to a standstill. There are few examples in the history of mankind that we can look back to and feel such a mixture of inspiration, hope and courage. The uprising had all of these. Sadly, it was also an act of desperation when all expectations of deliverance from the Nazi genocide had faded.

Mr. Speaker, the Holocaust was a time when the most advanced technology of the time was used to murder millions of people. Six million Jews, and an estimated 6 to 10 million Slavs, Gypsies, Christian Democrats, Socialists, and others were systematically killed by the Nazis. We decry the use of gas in the Iran-Iraq war, as though this is the first instance of its use since World War I. And yet, gas warfare was waged against helpless civilians during World War II.

Let us not deceive ourselves. History has shown that we tend to use the technology at hand, an unsettling prospect when we consider that the means to construct nuclear weapons is now spreading to the Third World.

We must never forget the Holocaust, Mr. Speaker. And we must understand that genocide can and will happen again if we allow it to happen. We are entrusted with treating humanity humanely, and cannot turn our backs as we did in 1933.●

AMERICKE LISTY

HON. BERNARD J. DWYER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. DWYER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, every Member of the House of Representatives has, at one time or another, taken to this floor to talk about a group of people in his or her district who exemplify much good about America—people who make an extra effort to help improve the status of their fellow man, either in this country or abroad.

We in the Sixth District of New Jersey are proud to have many such people resident there. But, today, I would like to call to your attention to the efforts made on behalf of the Czechoslovak people and of a great and historic event which is coming up.

"Americke' Listy," which is translated to mean "American Letters" is published in Perth Amboy, N.J. This fine tabloid newspaper brings to Czechoslovak-Americans news of the latest events happening in Czechoslovakia.

It details the activities of Czechoslovakian activists and dissidents—persons who have continued to resist the domination of this great and good people by a Communist dictatorship which refuses to acknowledge their culture, their traditions and, perhaps saddest of all, their hopes and dreams.

On October 24 of this year, "Americke' Listy" will celebrate its 110th anniversary of publication. Begun in 1874, it was originally known as "New Yorske' Listy," a fledgling publication designed for the then-small number of persons from Czechoslovakia who had sought a home in our great country.

Over the years, "Americke' Listy" has grown as the Czechoslovakian population in this country has grown. In 1960, they moved from their previous home in New York to their present location in Perth Amboy.

Today, this fine publication is widely read in the Czechoslovak-American community but, more than that, it is carried to Prague in diplomatic pouches where it is available in the U.S. Embassy Library, representing one of the few visions of light to people in an otherwise darkened environment.

Mr. Speaker, I am certainly privileged to have such a fine publication produced in my district. But I would be remiss if I did not say a few words about Frank Svehla, the publisher of "Americke' Listy."

Frank Svehla has given unselfishly of his heart and his mind to the commendable effort of exposing the situation in Czechoslovakia. He is a tireless worker, dedicated to the truth and dedicated to freedom. It wounds him deeply to see his native Czechoslovakia in the repressed state which it is today.

But unlike many people, Frank Svehla is determined to do something about it. Day in and day out, he makes his contribution through the only weapon he has—the pen. He is a credit to Czechoslovakia and a credit to America.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me say that each of us is dedicated to the many ideals which make America what it is today. But, as we approach the 110th anniversary of "Americke' Listy," it would do each of us well to reflect on the struggle of the Czechoslovakian people—and the care and concern of Czechoslovak-Americans like Frank Svehla—and be grateful for all that we have, while rededicating our commitment to support freedom and democracy anywhere in the world that it is denied.●

AMERICAN INDUSTRY PULLING AHEAD

HON. TIMOTHY E. WIRTH

OF COLORADO

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Speaker, in the ongoing debate over the future course of American industry, there has been a tendency to dwell on our weaknesses—adversarial relations between labor and management, a failure to foresee technical change or emerging foreign competition, and a seeming inability to bring coherence to a hodgepodge of governmental programs and incentives. But in the battle for the industrial future, America's pioneering spirit continues to be a major asset.

In a recent article, "In this New Age of Entrepreneurs, We're Number One Again," Joel Kotkin details the continuing strength of the Silicon Valleys that have grown up in many parts of the country. Mr. Kotkin suggests that the United States will gain ground relative to both Japan and Europe in the growing market for complex memory chips and customized chips of all kinds—what may be a $100 billion market by the end of the decade.

While a number of American analysts still point to Japan's MITI as the model for an American approach to industrial policy, MITI has shifted its own gaze to the American entrepreneur. The Japanese have a proven talent for targeting well-known technologies and achieving high quality, low-cost mass production of even such complex products as random access memory chips. That will not, however, assure them of success in the rapidly changing technologies of the future. In fact, both the Europeans and the Japanese are attempting to emulate the entrepreneurial successes of the United States in everything from the creation of new over-the-counter stock markets to actually luring American venture capitalists overseas.

The lessons of Silicon Valley should not be misread. They do not suggest that the government has no role to play. Government at all levels has an enormous impact on whether or not capital is available for investment at reasonable interest rates, the quantity and quality of research that is carried out, and the type of work force that enters the job market. It does suggest, however, that it is not time to move toward a centralized MITI-like structure just as the Japanese are being forced to move in the opposite direction.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert the Kotkin article at this point in the RECORD and commend it to my colleagues.

[From the Washington Post, Apr. 29, 1984]

IN THIS NEW AGE OF ENTREPRENEURS, WE'RE NUMBER ONE AGAIN

(By Joel Kotkin)

At the very time that "industrial policy" has become the rage among many of our professors and policy makers searching for ways to salvage America's place in the world economy, their role models abroad are looking enviously at what the Japanese call "the Silicon Valley way."

On this side of the ocean, the chorus of industrial-policy advocates argue that America should take its cue from Japan, where government plays an active role in deciding which industries to nurture and promote with financing, subsidies, retraining and protection from foreign competition.

Yet European and Asian business and government leaders, increasingly impressed by the vitality of a U.S. economy that has enjoyed higher growth rates over the past 18 months than any other major industrial nation, are looking towards America's dynamic, if somewhat chaotic, entrepreneurial economy as their role model for the future.

"Coordination is all right if you're building a steel and car industry on the model of other people. But now we're in an era of rapid change, of integrated circuits and microprocessors," observes Jiro Tokuyama, dean of Tokyo's Nomura School of Advanced Management and a longtime confidant of Prime Minister Yasuhiro Nakasone. "I don't think our large organizations can move quickly enough to make the changes. We must find our model among the entrepreneurs like (those) in your Silicon Valley."

Of course, innovating in the field of high technology and managing the decline of old, smokestack industries are not the same. But where the growth industries of the future are concerned, U.S. entrepreneurism is the world's model.

Enthusiasm for "the Silicon Valley way" is based largely on the remarkable performance of the young, entrepreneurial U.S. companies, particularly in such burgeoning industries as microelectronics, telecommunications and biotechnology. Due in part to the innovate and competitive spark provided by these upstart firms, America between 1977 and 1981 doubled its trade surplus in these technology-based industries.

To meet the challenge posed by America's entrepreneurs, Tokuyama and other influential foreigners are urging their governments to move away from the industrial policy which served them well in the past. Even the elite bureaucrats at Japan's Ministry of International Trade and Industry (MITI)—often cited by American enthusiasts of industrial policy as the ultimate model for a planning agency—now advocate wide-scale deregulation of the economy and devote considerable resources to promoting small start-up companies known in Japan as "venture businesses."

In addition, the Ministry of Finance, long a bastion of bureaucratic controls, recently fostered the opening up of Japan's traditionally conservative equity markets, including the development of a special, small-issues market consciously modeled on the U.S. "over-the-counter" stock exchange which has played such a key role in the financing of such American entrepreneurial companies as Apple Computers, Federal Express and Tandem.

"Nothing happens in Japan unless there's a crisis and we feel there's a crisis now in our industries," remarks Hiroshi Kato, a 29-year veteran of MITI who is now an adviser to Yamaichi Securities, one of Japan's leading investment banks. "Our talent is queued up in the big bureaucracies of the giant companies.

"Their talents are being wasted. They must be forced to become more independent. Being an entrepreneur in Japan must become more respected, like it is in America, if we wish to compete in the future."

Computer chips—"the crude oil of the '80s," as one American industrialist describes them—aptly reflect the Japanese dilemma. Beginning in the late 1970s, Japan became a formidable competitor in this area, reducing the American share of the world market to 53 percent last year.

There was talk that the small, entrepreneurial U.S. companies which had provided many of the early breakthroughs in silicon computer chip technology (and which gave the Silicon Valley its name) were in serious jeopardy.

But now U.S. firms have staked out commanding leads in new chip technologies which promise to constitute the key growth sectors of the future.

For instance, they hold an almost complete monopoly on the future generation of large, complex memory devices known as EPROMs and EEPROMs, which are used to store the programs for microcomputers. The advantages of these devices is that they are erasable, and therefore allow the programs recorded on them to be modified. This feature, for example, allows a user to easily change the function of a robot on an assembly line. The market for these chips is expected to nearly double annually in coming years—a growth rate five times the industry average.

Another U.S.-dominated growth area is in customized or semicustomized computer chips, the specialized devices that serve as the brains, or controls, in thousands of pieces of equipment, from the most advanced scientific instruments to systems that control the energy consumption and fire detection for an entire building complex. In this market, American firms now hold a commanding 2-to-1 lead over the Japanese. As little as 5 percent of the world computer chip market in 1981, these chips could account for most of the projected $100 billion chip market (up from $25 billion today) by decade's end.

Although the Japanese can be expected to challenge the American hegemony in custom chips, as they did earlier in RAMs (random-access memories), their prospects for success seem sharply less promising.

In producing RAMs, Japan could exploit its advantages: its skills at mass producing a single, high-volume product while holding down price and achieving high quality.

But custom or semicustomized chips allow U.S. companies to exploit their advantages: marketing and management flexibility and superior technology. These highly complex devices, which have to be specially tailored to the job they perform, are frequently sold in small batches to makers of expensive and complex products. Success in custom chips has far less to do with price and much more with technology and design—traditional American strengths.

Bolstered by a series of alliances with larger (and less technologically dynamic) European and American companies, and backed by the now $3 billion American venture-capital industry, over 30 new computer chip firms have started operation since the late 1970s. In the new and fast-paced chip markets of the 1980s, these "start-ups" enjoy clear advantages over their larger competitors both at home and in Japan.

Concentrating only on particular market niches, usually in new and rapidly expanding fields, these firms are not slowed down by the bureaucratic inertia of giant, diversified corporations. Also, facing big risks but also the hope of huge profits, they are driven by a sense of "existential challenge" rarely found in the corridors of giant companies.

Thus the changes sweeping the chip world have lured back some who once conceded the industry to the Japanese. In the late 1970s, L. J. Sevin looked on with horror as his Dallas-based Mostek computer chip firm was almost annihilated by the Japanese RAM blitzkrieg. But today, "the game has changed suddenly," claims Sevin, who now chairs Cypress Semiconductor, a Silicon Valley-based chip firm. "The technologies are exploding and driving the markets here. When it was a question of selling chips by the bagful, it was playing to their [Japan's] strength. Now that there are so many new niches, it's becoming a marketing game and that gives the smaller U.S. firms the advantage."

These changes are also likely to work against the targeting strategies which played a major role in Japan's previous industrial triumphs, observes Michael Borrus of the University of California's highly regarded Berkeley Roundtable on the International Economy. Borrus states it succinctly: "You can't target a moving target."

Under current circumstances, it is unlikely that Japan will produce anything like the explosion of start-ups now revitalizing the American computer-chip industry. Takeshi Ogata, manager of the industrial electronics division of the giant C. Itoh trading company, and Dr. Atsuyoshi Ouchi, senior executive vice president of NEC Corp, believe the big-business bias of Japan's large financial institutions will prevent start-ups from garnering the $20 to $50 million needed to start a new chip firm.

Equally important, the much ballyhood Japanese "corporate culture," with its ethos of lifetime loyalty to the company and its worship of bigness, makes it virtually impossible for a start-up to attract the necessary talented technicians and managers.

"It would be very difficult even for me to start a [semiconductor] firm here," Ouchi, one of Japan's preeminent electonics industry figures, admits. "Now, if I were young and spoke better English maybe I would go to California and try it."

As long as Japan's computer chip industry remains the exclusive province of the giants, observers such as Ogata fear Japan will continue to lag behind more competition-minded American companies in the development of new technologies. Despite all the hysteria associated with such projects as the "fifth-generation" computer, many Japanese fear that the technological gap between the two nations has been widening in recent years. Indeed, a 1980 survey of 200 top Japanese managers involved in technical innovation at major companies found 73 percent convinced that their nation lagged behind the U.S. in revolutionary new technologies.

"I am sorry to say that in the leading-edge technologies, there is a continuing advantage for the States," say Ogata. "Our social environment, the personality and character of our people and institutions is to constantly improve on a process, say from the 16K RAM to 64K RAM to 256K RAM. But to develop a whole new technology, to get on the leading edge, you have to look to the American firms. It's a cultural thing."

Eager to break down these "cultural" constraints, many younger Japanese are adopting "the Silicon Valley way" as their own business creed. To them, the idea of young Americans in their 20s, such as Apple Computer's Steve Jobs and Microsoft's Bill Gates, building giant companies based on their technological vision contrasts favorably with the situation in Japan, where a seniority-oriented system relegates most executives to relatively minor positions well into their 40s.

During the 1970s, for instance, the number of male college graduates wanting to change companies during their careers—almost unthinkable in traditional Japan—doubled to nearly 20 percent. Those interested in going out on their own jumped to nearly one-third.

To many of this generation, "the Silicon Valley way" expresses more than a path to success: it reflects a new, free-wheeling, democratic approach to capitalism, expressed by such things as the widespread ownership of equity by workers and a relative dearth of hierarchical corporate structure.

"When I first came to America, I was shocked to see a company president wearing jeans and having his feet on the desk," recalls Shigenobu Nagamori, the 39-year-old founder of Nippon Densan, a fast-growing Kyoto-based firm which last year sold $35 million worth of small motors used in such products as high-speed cassette recorders and computer disc drives. "To have workers call you by your first name would be unthinkable in Kyoto. But I liked it very much."

Today, companies like Nagamori's one-third of which is owned by its employees, are injecting this new democratic spirit into a hierarchical business culture where owners are frequently viewed as quasi-deities with unchallenged rights to the sweat and intelligence of their workers. The American model is also captivating the new entrepreneurs in other Asian nations such as Korea, Taiwan and Singapore.

"Asian societies are at a turning point," observes Yasunobu Nagura, an Osaka-based small-business consultant to over 500 companies both in Japan and Taiwan. "There is a new spirit, a willingness to try new things. We are becoming Americanized."

Like their Asian counterparts, Europeans are also undergoing Americanization. Aware that their economies have actually lost jobs over the past decade—while the United States created a remarkable 20 million new jobs, mostly in small- and mid-sized companies—European leaders are beginning to question the efficacy of "industrial policy" over the free-wheeling U.S. system.

Nowhere is this more evident than in the United Kingdom, birthplace of the first industrial revolution. Under the government of Margaret Thatcher, tax incentives for investment in small, entrepreneurial companies have lured such American-based venture capitalists as Jean Deleage, Peter Brooke and Brian Haslett into what has long been considered the stodgiest of industrial cultures.

"I learned the trade in the United States—a way of doing business that was quite different than traditional in Britain," observes Haslett, who now shuttles between London and Boston serving as a consultant to venture capitalists on both sides of the Atlantic. "There's not been very close contact between the City of London [the financial district] and the dirty-fingernail guys. They didn't talk to each other. What I learned in America was that a venture capitalist can have a positive professional relationship with the entrepreneurs where the class thing—the void—doesn't get in the way."

Due in part to the efforts of Haslett and other venture capitalists, Britain is slowly emerging from its established role as the proverbial sick man of the European Community. Indeed, with the emergence of such entrepreneurial firms as Sinclair Research, a leading maker of computers as cheap as $30, and Kleentech International, an engineering services firm, Britain astoundingly is now even regarded by other Europeans as "something of a role model," according to Bank of Paris analyst Phillipe Sahut D'Izarn.

Fundamentally, D'Izarn's comment represents something more of an indictment of the continent's sloth than a reflection of the grandeur of Britain's still-modest resurgence. Although American "industrial policy" advocate Robert Riech praises the "sophisticated tools for industrial policy-making" used in France and West Germany, all the elite planning institutions and "targeted" investment to promising new industries have succeeded in doing so far is to turn those nations into technological backwaters.

Indeed, with the exception of Nixdorf Computers, Germany seems to have slept through the entire microelectronics revolution, despite millions spent on government aid to research. Nor has France, despite its well-deserved reputation for superb engineering, done much better. IBM continues to dominate Europe's computer industry, dwarfing its nearest European competitor by nearly 4 to 1. Untroubled by local Apple-style upstarts, Big Blue faces no sizeable European competition in such growth fields as personal computers.

Searching for the reasons behind their disappointing perfomance and prospects, a growing number of Europeans point to the very sort of corporate-government partnership which so excites the imaginations of American advocates of "industrial policy."

"Even before [French President Francois] Mitterrand, our government was 'helping' private industry far too much," says D'Izarn, who served in the powerful Ministry of Industry during the conservative regime of Valery Giscard d'Estaing. "We missed the mini, then the micro, in part because our government wanted to have mainframes like IBM. Our policies directed huge amounts of money to our large electronics firms which didn't have the innovative spark we needed."

So pervasive has this analysis become that even France's socialist government has placed greater emphasis on entrepreneurism—as evidenced by Mitterrand's recent pilgrimage to Silicon Valley—than its more conservative predecessors. At first determined to turn France into "the Japan of the West," the Mitterrand regime now seems to be following a play book composed in San Jose rather than Tokyo.

Over the past year, the socialist regime has developed major encouragements for young entrepreneurial firms, including an over-the-counter stock market and a three-year tax holiday for start-up firms. Prodded by the government, venture capital investments have doubled to $37.5 million during the last three years.

"We know perfectly well that the growth we want depends on the entrepreneurial spirit," concedes Bernard Attali, a leading socialist intellectual, government official and adviser to President Mitterrand. "Only entrepreneurs create jobs and new opportunities. The world is changing and we are all entering an era of profound decentralization and the entrepreneur. We are now interested in helping people go out there and help themselves."

"We are seeing a new mentality among the people 30 to 35," observes Jean Fonteneau of Soffinova, the French government's venture-capital fund. "They realize that the job situation is no good, that the bureaucracy at companies like Thomson [an electronics giant nationalized in 1981] or the government isn't the safe haven it used to be. People are getting more into building their own companies and making profits like in the States."

Yet despite these changes, the French and Japanese, as well as other foreigners, will no doubt face a tough time in trying to emulate "the Silicon Valley way." Despite the rhetoric, America's recent entrepreneurial explosion was not detonated by Ronald Reagan's speeches or supply-side policies. The path leading from the robber barons and Andrew Carnegie to Steve Jobs and Steve Wozniak founding Apple Computers in a California garage represents the continuity of a unique history, people and culture.

Constantly replenished by both foreign immigrants and the development of new regions, America's entrepreneurial spirit remains the one irreducible competitive edge that this nation possesses over all others. It should not be squandered at the altar of an ill-considered "industrial policy."

"It's incredible that some Americans are going to heavy state planning when I'm being asked to go to Europe to help them disband theirs," remarks Boston venture capitalist Peter Brooke, who has also been summoned to Japan to spark entrepreneurial growth. "We shouldn't follow their mistakes. Hell, we're the ones with the answers."●

CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO THE HONORABLE EDWIN R. EVERITT OF CLIFTON, N.J., OUTSTANDING CITIZEN, COMMUNITY LEADER, AND GREAT AMERICAN

HON. ROBERT A. ROE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, May 15, residents of the county of Passaic, my congressional district and State of New Jersey will join together in testimony to an outstanding citizen, community leader and good friend, the Honorable Edwin R. Everitt of Clifton, N.J.—whose 40 years of exemplary service with the Passaic County Surrogate's Court in Paterson, N.J., will provide an opportunity for his colleagues and many, many friends to express tribute to his lifetime of good works. I know that you and our colleagues here in the Congress will want to join with me in extending our warmest greeetings and felicitations to him and share great pride in the success of his achievements with his good wife Dorothy, and their children, Pam Bradley and Marjorie Everitt, on this joyous occasion in recognition of his professional expertise in his career pursuits, the warmth of his friendship, and his standards of excellence in our American way of life.

Mr. Speaker, the pleasure of great personal dedication and always working to the peak of one's ability with sincerity of purpose and determination is the success of the opportunity of America. Ed Everitt is an outstanding individual who throughout his lifetime has earned the respect and esteem of all of us who have had the good fortune to know him. As each one of us stands up in tribute to Special Deputy Surrogate Edwin R. Everitt and his four decades with the Law Enforcement and Judiciary Branch of the County of Passaic for the administration of justice in a court of law having jurisdiction over the probate of wills and the settlement of estates, we are indeed proud to have had him on the team. He has played an important role in the achievement of Government in his chosen field of endeavor.

Ed joined the surrogate's office May 13, 1944 and has served as chief clerk in the surrogate's court since July 1963.

Mr. Speaker, professionals like Ed Everitt serve as the bulwark of strength in the day-by-day challenges of government in meeting the needs of our people. For a job well done, there is no doubt that he has truly enriched our community, State, and Nation. He also served our people and our country with distinction on active duty with the United States Army during the Korean conflict, November 1950 to November 1952.

Over the years he has been a staunch supporter and active participant in many civic and community-improvement programs. He was also an officer with the Passaic County Employees Credit Union for approximately a quarter of a century.

Mr. Speaker, it is indeed appropriate that we reflect on the deeds and achievements of our people who have contributed to the quality of our way of life here in America and I am pleased to call your attention to Ed Everitt's lifetime of outstanding public service. As we gather together on May 15 in tribute to the quality of his leadership and sincerity of purpose dedicated to service-to-people, we do indeed salute a distinguished citizen, outstanding community leader and great American—the Honorable Edwin R. Everitt of Clifton, N.J.●

REV. JERRY FALWELL TESTIFIES FOR MOVING THE U.S. EMBASSY IN ISRAEL TO JERUSALEM

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, this morning the Europe and Middle East Subcommittee and the International Operations Subcommittee of the Foreign Affairs Committee held historic joint hearings on the bill to move the U.S. Embassy in Israel from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem, which I introduced with my distinguished Republican colleague from New York, Mr. GILMAN.

The lead witness at this hearing was Dr. Jerry Falwell, the pastor of Thomas Road Baptist Church in Lynchburg, Va., and the chancellor of Liberty Baptist College.

Dr. Falwell emphasized to the joint hearing the right of a sovereign nation to designate its own capital and cited the double standard inherent in the U.S. policy to place our Embassy in Tel Aviv rather than the designated capital of Israel—Jerusalem. Jerusalem is the ancient and historic capital of Israel. Dr. Falwell also cited the excellent record of Israel in permitting and insuring access to the holy sites of the three great religions, for whom Jerusalem is a religious center.

For the benefit of my colleagues in the House, who were unable to participate in these hearings, I place in the RECORD the statement of Dr. Falwell.

The statement follows:

TESTIMONY BY DR. JERRY FALWELL BEFORE A JOINT HEARING OF THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON EUROPE AND THE MIDDLE EAST AND THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON INTERNATIONAL OPERATIONS OF THE U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES TUESDAY, MAY 1, 1984

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. My name is Reverend Jerry Falwell. I am the pastor of Thomas Road Baptist Church in Lynchburg, Virginia, the Chancellor of Liberty Baptist College and, as a part-time extra curricular activity, I sometimes participate in the Moral Majority.

One of the issues we have addressed from the outset of Moral Majority in 1979 and from the beginning of my ministry nearly twenty-eight years ago is support for the nation of Israel, born in our lifetimes, and for the Jewish people everywhere who deserve a homeland where they may forever be free of the scourge that nearly eliminated them from the face of the earth during World War II.

The question before this joint hearing today, however, is not the support of Israel (though it is in a sense), but rather whether a sovereign nation has the right to declare its capital where it wishes and have that capital recognized by other sovereign nations. As all of you are aware, the United States recently granted full diplomatic recognition to The Vatican, a religious entity that, despite this recognition, still does not recognize Israel as a nation, much less Jerusalem as its capital. The political identification of The Vatican flows from its religious status. Jerusalem, on the other hand, is revered not by one religion, but by three and even by those who hold to a secular faith. It has always been and is the historic capital of Israel.

Even in our dispute with the British, the English government did not deny us the right to place our capital in Philadelphia or New York or Washington or anywhere else we wished. This has been the historic right of all nations whatever their political status, religious belief or concept of freedom to establish its capital where it wishes.

The argument might be advanced, as it often is, that Jerusalem is a controversial city and that some accommodation should be made for the dissension that so often surrounds it. What about the land held by the Soviet Union in violation of signed treaties at the end of World War II? Has the Soviet Union's violation of these and other treaties been sufficient for us to tell the Russians we will withdraw diplomatic recognition from you? Of course it has not. Have these treaty violations been enough for any President or our State Department to suggest we should punish the Soviets by moving our embassy to Novosibirsk or Siberia instead of Moscow? They have not.

This is a double standard, Mr. Chairman, which no other nation, save Israel, is expected to endure.

We treat no other nation the way we treat Israel. President Reagan has just finished a trip to the People's Republic of China, a nation that is officially atheistic and hostile to everything we stand for and believe in. Yet, our embassy is in their capital of Beijing.

Nicaragua recently had a revolution and we are hardly favorable toward the regime that holds power by force and denies the elections they promised, yet our embassy is in Managua.

Israel has treated Jerusalem and particularly access to the holy places of the three religions better than any other has or would. As a pastor, I am particularly appreciative of how the Israeli government and particularly the city administration of Jerusalem Mayor Teddy Kolleck have meticulously maintained access for Jews, Christians and Moslems. Even Israel's harshest critics cannot criticize her on this issue.

Compare Israel's treatment of the holy places to Jordan's when that nation maintained control of East Jerusalem. Jordan razed all Jewish synagogues in East Jerusalem. Jordan used tombstones from Jewish cemeteries for roads and for latrines in its Army camps. Jordan signed an agreement with Israel that it would let any Jew visit the Western Wall. It never lived up to that agreement.

Jordan forbade any church to build a steeple higher than the Islamic minaret.

Compare this with Israel's record, not only in Jerusalem but also its open bridges policy over the Jordan River which allows Moslems and anyone else to cross into Israel and visit the holy places in Jerusalem even if the country from which the person comes is at war with Israel. Israel is not obligated under international law, Mr. Chairman, to provide access to citizens of countries at war with Israel, though she does. Even the Vatican recognizes this policy.

Listen to what Israel's Declaration of Independence states: "The State of Israel will be based on the principles of liberty, justice and peace as conceived by the Prophets of Israel; will uphold the full social and political equality of all its citizens, without distinction of religion, race or sex; will guarantee freedom of religion, conscience, education and culture; and will safeguard the holy places of all religions." Is there any other nation in the Middle East which has made such a pledge or has carried it out so faithfully as Israel? I think not.

Jerusalem is not only the capital of the nation of Israel, it is also the capital of the three great religions. Jerusalem is holy to Christians because of what Christ did there. Why did Jesus come to Jerusalem? Because he recognized it as the capital of His country.

It is the same with Islam. Mohammed lived and worked all his life in Arabia, but Moslems believe that when he went to Heaven he came first to Jerusalem because he recognized Jerusalem as the center of Judaism and Christianity and saw the validity of the claims of their prophets. Of course, to the Jew, Jerusalem is the capital because it was declared so thousands of years before Jesus and Mohammed by God, Himself.

What, then, is the main stumbling block keeping the United States from doing what is morally right, religiously justified and politically correct? It seems to be the fear of what might happen, given the threats of some who have an interest in keeping Israel de-stabilized and her borders unfixed.

Should we really be fearful of such threats? I think not. President Harry Truman was advised by the State Department in 1948 not to recognize the newly independent nation. He was told that Arab nations would riot, American Embassies would be attacked and forced to close and that America would be boycotted by the Arab states. Mr. Truman ignored the advice and did what was right. He recognized Israel and the threats failed to produce the dire consequences that were predicted.

I might mention that the United States, which does not recognize Berlin as the capital of East Germany, still maintains its embassy in Berlin. We sometimes treat our adversaries better than our friends.

Israel is the only nation on earth which is denied the right to place its capital where it wishes. It is not right. It is not fair.

Tel Aviv is no more the capital of Israel than Alexandria is the capital of Egypt.

Tel Aviv is a modern creation. Jerusalem is an ancient heritage.

Tel Aviv is the brainchild of man. Jerusalem is the heart throb of God.

Moving our embassy from exile in Tel Aviv to its rightful home in Jerusalem would tell the world that our commitment to this single democracy in the Middle East is irrevocable; that, regardless of economic or political conditions, we stand behind Israel's right to exist, free from outside predators and that no surplus or shortage of oil or any other reason will allow us to sacrifice our friend on the altar of expediency.

Do we think that we can promote reasonable behavior among those who have sworn to wipe Israel from the map by allowing threats to determine American policy, even the location of our embassy?

From whom should we expect reasonable behavior? From Libya? From Syria? From Iraq or Iran, the latter of which, we are told, is responsible for the killings of our Marines in Lebanon? From the reasonable and rational PLO, who massacre innocent women and children and civilians of all types, and who certainly are not going to kill fewer Israelis because we have kept our embassy in Tel Aviv?

Israel is not asking for a favor, Mr. Chairman. It is exerting a right—the right to be treated as other nations; the right to have its capital recognized by all nations.

Certainly Israel has a greater claim to national identity and to its own capital of Jerusalem than, let us say, the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, which was created by government decree. Israel's heritage and history are much older.

There are hundreds of references to Jerusalem in both the Old and New Testaments. In Psalm 128:5, the king of ancient Israel, David, said, "The Lord shall bless thee out of Zion, and thou shalt see the good of Jerusalem all the days of thy life." He had no reference to Tel Aviv.

Mr. Chairman, fairness, equity, and morality argue in favor of the United States moving its embassy to Jerusalem, the past, present, and future capital of Israel.

I respectfully urge you to pass this important bill.

Thank you, sir.●

DAYS OF REMEMBRANCE

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, yesterday morning the skies were weeping over Washington as ground was broken for the Holocaust Memorial Museum in a heart wrenching and moving ceremony. Survivors of the Holocaust, whom this generous and great Nation accepted with open arms, and their second generation American-born children paid tribute to the decency of this great Nation as they remembered the nightmare of the Holocaust at noon, in the rotunda of the Capitol Building, the National Civic Commemoration of the Days of Remembrance. The day before a special program was held in the Kennedy Center to commemorate through the performing arts the darkness and horror of that period.

On these occasions a number of deeply moving and personal addresses were delivered by the survivors. On Sunday evening, at the Kennedy Center, Ted Koppel read "A Plea for the Survivors" by Elie Wiesel, whom this Congress has honored by approving the minting of a special congressional gold medal in his honor. As usual, everyone present was moved by his uniquely penetrating words. Mr. Speaker, I include the statement of Elie Wiesel in the RECORD:

A PLEA FOR THE SURVIVORS

I speak without bitterness and even without anger. I feel only sadness. For you, for all of us. Together we have bungled a story unlike any other. An event that by itself should have brought about a greater sense of awareness, an all-encompassing metamorphosis, was reduced to the level of an anecdote. As for us, we were too numb, too weak, and perhaps too timid to object to what was happening before our eyes.

The Holocaust no longer evokes the mystery of the forbidden; it no longer arouses fear or trembling, or even outrage or compassion. For you, it is one calamity among so many others, slightly more morbid than the others. You enter it, you leave it, and you return to your ordinary occupations. You thought yourselves capable of imagining the unimaginable: You have seen nothing. You thought yourselves capable of discussing the unspeakable: You have understood nothing, you have retained nothing.

You have retained nothing of its blinding truth. You prefer imitation, embellishment. For you, all these horrors, all these atrocities undoubtedly are terrible but not extraordinary phenomena, possibly the result of mental aberration. Auschwitz? The decadence of an ideology. Treblinka? To be demystified, demythified. Dachau and Mauthausen? Nothing but a tremendous and tremendously convenient theme to bolster the theories of thinkers and the ambitions of politicians. Once robbed of its sacred aspect, the holocaust became a fashionable subject: Good to impress or shock. Recommended to anyone seeking a vehicle to climb, succeed, create a sensation. You thought that you could face the agony of a people; you have felt nothing.

In the beginning they tried to raise their voices—however shyly, however clumsily. In vain. People turned away, and shrugging their shoulders, muttered, "Poor devils, they are exaggerating, for they want our pity." No, they did not want your pity. Or your charity. Or you good deeds. Or your tears or your money. They asked for nothing, demanded nothing from you or anybody; they claimed no rights. All they wanted was your attention. They wanted to transmit a message to you, a message of which they were the sole bearers. Having gained an insight into man that will remain forever unequaled, they tried to share their knowledge with you, their contemporaries, they were not asking for anything in return. Anyway, your gratitude, your medals were meaningless to them. As were the goals you were pursuing. They merely hoped to justify their survival by accomplishing a mission that mattered more to them than their survival. And for years and years you, their contemporaries, refused to listen, refused to believe, refused to understand. You disclaimed their testimony.

And so they began to feel superfluous in a society that continued to repudiate them, thus forcing them into cynicism or despair.

Time does not heal all wounds; there are those that remain painfully open. How can one forget the passion, the violence a simple crust of moldy bread can inspire? Or the near-worship evoked by a slightly better dressed, better nourished, less beaten inmate?

How can one repress the memory of the indifference one had felt toward the corpses. Will you ever know what it is like to wake up under a frozen sky, on a journey toward the unknown, and to record without surprise that the man in front of you is dead, as is the one before him and the one behind you? Suddenly a thought crosses one's mind: What if I, I too, am already dead and do not know it? And this thought also is registered with indifference. Will you ever know the nature of a world where, as in Moses' time in the desert, the living and the dead are no longer separate? Will you ever know what a survivor knows?

The distinguished cochairmen of this year's Days of Remembrance Committee addressed these gatherings. Their speeches deserve the attention of the Members of this House.

Days of Remembrance, April 30, 1984—Remarks by Benjamin Meed, cochairman of the Days of Remembrance Committee and member of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council.

DAYS OF REMEMBRANCE, APRIL 30, 1984, REMARKS BY BENJAMIN MEED

I, a survivor of the Warsaw Ghetto, am honored to have the privilege of addressing you in the Capitol Rotunda.

It is fitting that we meet in a chamber of law, because the legal system, the entire power of the state—was used to persecute and oppress Jews and others. The Nazis assumed power legally and made the legislature captive to their own desires. From the Nuremberg laws to the decrees of deportation, the legal system was mobilized in the Jewish destruction; the German legislators did nothing to object, and the world stood by mute.

So I ask you—please remember. The laws that you pass—the statements that you make—the society you shape—affect real people—men, women and children.

It is fitting, too, that we meet in our Nation's Capitol. For generations, America has been the refuge of the immigrant. It is here that we made our homes—here that we raised our children. When we survivors came to this country we had nothing—no family, no language, and no profession. It is here that we began to reshape our lives and our future. No one paid attention to our foreign accents but only to the quality of our deeds.

This morning, at a symbolic ground-breaking ceremony, survivors from all over the nation gathered at the site of the future U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum. We spoke of where we have been: Hell is the place we have been—a hell created by people, men and women of culture, by lovers of music and art, by scientists, legislators, psychologists and theologians. . . .

We spoke of the future museum as a magnet for all those who visit Washington where they shall come to learn of our experience of the holocaust and to teach future generations.

This afternoon, we survivors speak of where we are—a free people in a land we cherish—and that cherishes us. We believe in that magnificent ideal called the United States of America—a place in which a person can draw the breath of self respect; a nation of just laws, where leaders and legislators can learn from mistakes, for us survivors, and for millions of others, America will always remain a blessed place—its dream will remain for us immortal—everlasting.

And with good reason. For many of us, afterall, are graduates of the Warsaw ghetto, of Auschwitz, Bergen-Belsen, Treblinka and other concentration camps. We have faced destruction, degradation and death.

The hand of fate has brought some of us—too few—and too late—to this land of freedom from which we look not backward toward the triumph of tyranny, but forward to the challenge of democracy.

We survivors today offer ourselves to this challenge, to the defense of the human spirit against the evils of hatred, against the alienation of man.

This we give to you—America—in the freedom of our adopted country, it is here that we have been living a life consecrated to both memories and tears, and to a vision of brotherhood and peace.

We are in the midst of a world of gathering clouds and impending tragedy. The world may find reasons again to abandon fellow human beings: But holocaust survivors and their children here and everywhere must speak our forever against tyranny and brutality. For the only salvation for all of us lies in remembering the past and in building a moral society.

An Evening of Commemoration, April 29, 1984 and Days of Remembrance, April 30, 1984—Remarks by Sigmund Strochlitz, cochairman of the Days of Remembrance Committee and member of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council.

AN EVENING OF COMMEMORATION, APRIL 29, 1984

On behalf of the United States Holocaust Memoral Council, and the Days of Remembrance Committee, welcome to an Evening of Remembrance through the Performing Arts.

In times when survivors are getting older and the prospects of the last survivor looms before us, it is reassuring that an evening of remembrance like the one tonight is taking place and that you remember with us for the benefit of humankind—present and future.

Tonight, we ask you to hold your applause in respect for those who perished whispering in desperation or shouting in defience—"Shema Israel."

Tonight, we will bring you the work of those who in the Ghettos and concentration camps turned to different forms of art—composing songs and music, writing poems and diaries, sculpting and drawing.

The songs of the ghettos reveal a burning will to live as human beings with dignity and self-respect and a determination to fight unto death for life—life in freedom.

The poems, written mostly by children, express sometimes hope, but more often, despair; sometimes courage, but also panic. In the face of the strongest force of dehumanization that the world has ever seen, writing, composing or drawing while the angel of death was closing in, may sound strange or even bizarre and yet it happened. We should not assume that those activities undertaken while life was ebbing were prompted only by an urge to record for posterity or to save Jewish history or even go beyond—no—not only. It was also to reassure our humanity to fight back with the only weapon—the human spirit.

Those voices—their dreams, their yearnings for a bit of nature, a site of a tree, a butterfly, were stilled in the ovens of Auschwitz, Treblinka, Majdanek and the Ghettos of Warsaw, Vilna and Theresienstadt. Those voices will come alive tonight through the craft of distinguished American artists, and because of the painful truths of which they shall remind us.

With a feeling of sadness and a heavy heart, I must remind you tonight that art, in and of itself, does not humanize. We shall be reminded this evening that a person can read Gothe and Schiller, or listen to Schubert and Bach in the evening, and still go to his or her murderous work in the morning. It happened not long ago in the heart of Europe, in Germany, in the cradle of European culture.

Where gas chambers were built by architects and engineers.

Children poisoned by physicians and nurses. Infants burned alive by teachers and lawyers. Women killed by college graduates and writers.

Yes, it happened. All those cold-blooded murders were witnessed by many who are here tonight, and recorded in diaries by others who perished.

May the memory of the Six Million Jews—men, women and children—who perished in the Holocaust, and the millions of others enslaved, starved, and killed by the Nazis never be forgotten.

Please rise for the National Anthem.

In this hall of freedom and democracy, we gather for this Nation to remember—never to forget as our Chairman, Elie Wiesel said: "What we all have in common is an obsession not to betray the dead we left behind or who left us behind. They were killed once, they must not be killed again through forgetfulness."

The Members of the House of Representatives and the United States Senate have forever committed this Nation to remember by passing Public Law 96-388.

Memory is now law and memory is indispensible to freedom, in commemorating the Days of Remembrance in every state, in cities throughout the country, in the Nation's Capitol, we not only bear witness and fight the angel of forgetfulness, but we also alert humankind to respond immediately when, under the guise of legislative or administrative processes, attempts are made to curtail the human and civil rights of any group in any place.

The process of dehumanization that began in the 1930's in the German legislative body was only the first step to the ultimate—the building of death camps.

The death camps perverted the values of the Western civilization and were at the same time a tragic failure of the Western world.

Failures are difficult to face. We would rather keep up the memory of those moments in history that show the human race at its best. But it seems to me that the administration and Congress decided that it is in the public interest for the public to contemplate the experiences of the Holocaust and its lessons.

It is our memory that could indeed serve the cause of freedom and democracy.

On behalf of the United States Holocaust Memorial Council's Days of Remembrance Committee—thank you for joining our annual national commemoration. Your presence lends respect and honor to this historic occasion.●

HOLOCAUST VICTIMS

HON. MAJOR R. OWENS

OF NEW YORK

Monday, April 30, 1984

● Mr. OWENS, Mr. Speaker, as we remember the horrors of the Holocaust, it is important that we also remember the heroism of those who resisted the Nazi plans to exterminate their neighbors. The particular heroism of the Danish people was recently remembered by a congregation in Brooklyn adjacent to my district.

Rabbi Block, spiritual leader of Temple Emanu-El of Canarsie, Brooklyn, N.Y., and the congregation met to honor the Danish people for their humanitarian efforts in helping many Jewish people during World War II on Friday, March 23, 1984. The Honorable Birger Lehman Nielsen, Danish Deputy Consul General represented the people of Denmark at this event.

In April 1940, the Germans occupied Denmark where they attempted to persecute the Jews. Both the Government, under the leadership of King Christian X, and the people of Denmark raised a great cry of protest and succeeded in preventing the persecution of their Jewish neighbors. In 1943, when the Danish people learned of Gestapo plans for the deportation and annihilation of Danish Jewry, they organized a broad plan of rescue which was the only national rescue operation of Jews during the entire Nazi period.

Pastor William H. Gentz of Salem Evangelical Lutheran Church and other members and organizations of the Danish-American community participated in the service honoring the Danish people. Presentations were made by the Honorable Howard Golden, borough president, the Honorable Carol Bellamy, president of the city council, and the Honorable Howard Babbush, State senator.

It is indeed tragic that the Holocaust occurred. It would be more tragic if we forgot its horrors and the heroism of resisters and victims.●

HON. BOB EDGAR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Monday, April 30, 1984

● Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to express my strong support of H.R. 5076, the Pennsylvania Wilderness Act of 1984, which was passed by the House of Representatives today.

H.R. 5076 designates certain areas in the Allegheny National Forest as wilderness and recreation areas. The idea of wilderness area designation in Pennsylvania has been considered in Congress for many years. I am most pleased by the passage of this particular legislation, which truly represents a compromise between preservation and development. Two large sections, Hickory Creek Wilderness and Allegheny Island Wilderness, will be designated as wilderness areas by the act. Many other regions will be protected as recreation areas.

We have done an admirable job of preserving large tracts of land in the Western section of our country as wilderness areas. As constituents of mine recently wrote in a letter to me: "It is a good idea to start creating more wilderness areas in the East. We have areas of great beauty in our wonderful state." Once again, I commend the House for its swift action in passing H.R. 5076 and am hopeful of similar action in the Senate.●

NUCLEAR POWER—NO LONGER THE PANACEA, BUT NOT THE PARIAH

HON. MARILYN LLOYD

OF TENNESSEE

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, March 28, 1984 was the fifth anniversary of the Three Mile Island accident. Although this was certainly not a time for celebration, some reflection on the status of our Nation's nuclear power industry seems to be in order. We must ask the question, "Is the nuclear power option still viable in this country, or should we pull the plug on more than 40 years of work and call it quits, leaving the rest of the world to continue the challenge of peaceful uses for the atom?"

We have been brought to this crossroad by a confluence of circumstances and events, not the least of which was the unfortunate accident at Three Mile Island. But increased plant construction costs, marked declines in electricity demand, public concerns about reactor safety, and ratcheting licensing requirements all have been major culprits in the downward trend now facing the U.S. nuclear power industry. Can we afford to be complacement, even fatalistic, about this state of affairs? I think not.

Nuclear power is an inseparable part of a secure energy future for America. This is a fact that cannot be—indeed must not be—overlooked. As chairman of the principal subcommittee responsible for Federal research programs on nuclear fission reactors, I along with other Members, have proposed strong Government initiatives to deal with these problems head-on. Reactor designs are needed that use intrinsic rather than, or in addition to, engineered safety features, employ standardized fabrication procedures to reduce costs and are substantially insensitive to the wide variations in electricity demand that we have experienced over the past several years.

Mr. Speaker, an excellent assessment of the situation was presented in an article in the Washington Post editorial page on Tuesday, March 27, 1984, written by Josh Kraft, which I am submitting for inclusion in the RECORD. I direct my colleagues' attention to Mr. Kraft's assessment that, "safe nuclear power is possible and makes sense." I believe that most of the Members will wholeheartedly agree.

The assessment follows:

KEEPING THE NUCLEAR OPTION

(By Joseph Kraft)

The accident at Three Mile Island, five years ago tomorrow, started something. Since then, many diverse failures in all parts of the country have led most Americans to give up on nuclear power.

But analysis shows that a common problem underlies all the difficulties. A fix can be made—providing the country wants to keep the nuclear option as a source of energy.

At first glance, every part of the nuclear power venture seems unsound. At Three Mile Island, near Harrisburg, Pa., a reactor went out of control. Construction flaws jinxed the Diablo Canyon plant in California, the South Texas project and the Zimmer plant in Ohio. Costs went through the roof at Shoreham in New York and in the case of the Washington Public Power project in the Northwest.

But while the troubles are different, the underlying cause is the same. In each case installation and management of a new and complex technology were left to relatively small and inexperienced units of this country's highly fragmented electrical power industry.

The New Jersey utility running Three Mile Island had one previous experience in nuclear energy. The San Francisco utility responsible for Diablo Canyon had only worked with nuclear power once before—and in a trivial project. The Long Island utility that managed Shoreham, and the Houston utility that commissioned the Texas project, had no past in the nuclear field. The Washington venture was a coalition of 80 municipal utilities all inexperienced when it came to nuclear power.

"The fragmented utility structure" has been summarized by Commissioner Victor Gilinsky of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission. According to his figures, the country now has 80 nuclear power plants "in the hands of 44 utilities, 19 of which have only a single operating reactor."

The inability of most local utilities to organize and manage nuclear power plants has been asserted with commanding force by Gov. Bruce Babbitt of Arizona, a trained engineer who served as a member of the national commission investigating Three Mile Island. In an article published in the Arizona Republic, Babbitt wrote:

"The utility industry is highly dispersed and some local utilities do not have strong management. Electric utilities are natural monopolies, heavily regulated and undisciplined by competitive forces. . . . Nuclear technology seems too complex to have much

Experience abroad makes the same point inversely. France and Japan and Korea and Taiwan have all been successful in the installation of nuclear reactors. Not because of superior technical skill. On the contrary, they have used American technology. But the management of their electrical utilities is centralized. It learns from each new project. So much so that the Japanese are getting ready to market in other countries their own improved version of American nuclear power plants.

Gov. Babbitt points out that Adm. Hyman Rickover managed development of a nuclear submarine fleet for the Navy and that NASA has successfully organized even more difficult scientific achievements in space. He suggests that if the United States wants nuclear power, it should vest research, development and installation in a single governmental entity able to work with the most experienced private firms. There would be the energy equivalent of NASA, or the National Institutes of Health.

But does the country need a nuclear option in energy?

The answer is far from evident. Oil prices have recently come down, and there is now an excess of supply over effective demand. Reserve stocks are very high. Sustained economic recovery through the industrial world would drive up consumption again. Still it would take a major political event—such as the fall of the shah in 1979 or the Arab-Israeli war of 1973—to force another shortage.

Coal is abundant in this country and some other parts of the world. Extracting the fuel is messy and dangerous. Burning it has something to do with the destruction of lakes and forests by acidification. But, though the costs go up astronomically, the acid-causing particles can be washed away by scrubbing.

The great peril in burning coal comes from the "greenhouse effect"—the collection of enough carbon dioxide in the atmosphere to admit all ultraviolat rays, while imprisoning infrared. That process yields atmospheric changes of epic proportions. A recent study for the National Academy of Sciences projects a climatic catastrophe that might, among other things, cripple agriculture in the Middle West. But not for another 50 years.

So we are thrown back on the political leadership. Safe nuclear power is possible and makes sense. But events do not force development. It will be achieved only if the Reagan administration pushes ahead. But in nuclear energy, as in so many other things, that means admitting exceptions to the free market ideology and giving up the narcotic habit of mortgaging the future to the present.●

TRIBUTE TO COUNT BASIE

HON. JOSEPH P. ADDABBO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, nations often cannot communicate with other nations. A failure in communications is certainly a major factor responsible for the arms race that threatens the world now. But language is not the only barrier which hamstrings government communications. Sometimes, Congress has trouble understanding the White House. And we speak the same language, or so we believe.

A breakdown in communications has left a dark shadow over all our lives. That is why when we see a man that holds the very special talents to communicate universally, we cherish his presence. Count Basie was such a man.

The Count could play a single note, one musical expression on his keyboard, and generations of people of all colors, religious beliefs, and ideologies, from New York to Moscow and everywhere in between, could unite in its message. The Count's playing gave us a feeling of joy, of hope renewed, that in this complex world where men have difficulties talking with other men, there is a bit of goodness left.

I was deeply saddened by the Count's death. He was truly a good friend, a fine constituent, a loyal Democrat, and the penultimate word in piano playing for the last 50 years. His royal era spanned decades and created a bond between cultures.

It is a bit farfetched to suggest that the Count's music could be the universal language that brings about global understanding, but would not it be something if it could be. Surely his music makes men realize their commonalities, it creates harmony and prompts them to investigate discord. It was Longfellow who said "Music is the universal language of mankind," what he left out was that Count Basie was the diplomat of world harmony. I will never forget his contributions to humanity, his records will echo in many of the great halls of the world forever.●

CONGRESSIONAL RESPONSIBILITY TO VOTE

HON. SOLOMON P. ORTIZ

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. ORTIZ. Mr. Speaker, each of us bears a special responsibility to be present throughout the various stages of the legislative process to see our ideas and proposals carried through from committee to the floor. I have spent the past year and a half working very closely with my colleagues as we translate ideas into actions. I therefore believe it is extremely important that we, as elected representatives, be in attendance when the House is in session and bills are pending on the floor. I take my responsibility to vote very seriously and have tried diligently not to miss any votes.

It has therefore always been my practice to remain in Washington when legislation is pending before the House and not to miss any votes, except under the rarest circumstances such as a health emergency. This has often meant that I have had to cancel prearranged meetings and appearances, but I know my constituents understand that my attendance in Washington is required on their behalf.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with you and my colleagues my reason for missing rollcall votes during the week of April 23d. I suffered chest and stomach pains while working in Corpus Christi during the Easter recess and was admitted to Spohn Hospital on April 24 for 3 days of extensive tests. It was with great relief that I learned that I have no serious health problems and that the pains were not a signal of a more serious condition.

I regret that this unexpected hospital stay prevented me from participating in my usual way in committee hearings, floor debates, and votes. Although no major bills were considered during this period, I would like my colleagues to know that if present I would have voted in favor of S. 2570. This bill continued the transition provisions of the Bankruptcy Act until May 26. Fortunately, this extension was passed by a vote of 322 to 13.

I appreciate the many kind inquiries of my colleagues about my health and thank you all for your thoughtful concern for my well being. Your consideration is greatly appreciated.●

HOLOCAUST VICTIMS

HON. DENNIS E. ECKART

OF OHIO

Monday, April 30, 1984

● Mr. ECKART. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague, the gentleman from New York for reserving time today to take a moment from our hectic schedules to remember the victims of the Holocaust. For remembering is, perhaps, the most important way to remind and educate ourselves as well as our children of this ultimate experience of human horror.

Now, many years later, we are still left in a state of shock as we recall the methodic and systematic deaths of millions of innocent people. In that perverted moment of world history where greed and destruction dominated the lives of the world, lies the message of the Holocaust. As the survivors, along with their families and friends, have grown older—the everlasting hope in their hearts as well as ours is that the concept of "ethnic purity" and "master race" will forever be locked in the pages of history.

As we race for nuclear superiority, the importance of remembering the Holocaust becomes even more crucial. We must seek out ways to prevent the continuation of a cycle of horror. We, as Members of Congress, have a commitment to remember the Holocaust,

RULE ON THE TRADE REMEDIES REFORM ACT OF 1984

HON. DAN ROSTENKOWSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to inform my colleagues that the Committee on Ways and Means today reported to the House H.R. 4784, the Trade Remedies Reform Act of 1984. This bill would provide for needed reforms to the countervailing duty and antidumping laws under the Tariff Act of 1930 as amended in the Trade Agreements Act of 1979.

I wish to serve notice, pursuant to the rules of the Democratic Caucus, that I have been instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to seek a modified closed rule for the consideration of this bill by the House of Representatives.●

THE RETIREMENT OF BLAIR R. KOST

HON. EDWARD F. FEIGHAN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, few citizens have contributed more to the good government movement in Ohio than Blair Kost, who retired on April 1, 1984, as executive director of the Citizens League and the Governmental Research Institute. Blair Kost's energy, devotion, and skill are legendary in Cuyahoga County. His contributions to the quality of our governmental institutions, his unswerving commitment to efficiency and sound management in public service, and his tireless support of reform, will all be missed. During 27 years with the Citizens League, the oldest and largest civic organization of its kind in the United States, Blair was at the forefront of every major reform battle during the past quarter century. Thanks to his efforts, we have a lowered voting age, professional budgeting offices in Cleveland and Cuyahoga County, a code of ethics in the State legislature, and a host of other improvements in the running of our State, county, and city governments. I know that my colleagues in the House will want to join me in extending thanks to Blair Kost for his years of service to the people of the Greater Cleveland area, and offering our best wishes for health and happiness during the years of his retirement.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that an article announcing Blair's retirement as Citizens League executive director be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

[From the Citizens League of Greater Cleveland]

BLAIR R. KOST RETIRES AS CITIZENS LEAGUE EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR

Winding up a career of over a quarter century, Blair R. Kost has announced that he is retiring as Executive Director of The Citizens League and the Governmental Research Institute on April 1, 1984.

In a letter to The Citizen League and GRI boards, Blair said that it was extremely difficult for him to leave after having served the two organizations for so long a period. He noted that, following his recent illness, it was impossible for him to carry out the demanding duties of the Executive Director position on a full time basis.

Blair has served The Citizens League for twenty-seven years—having joined the League Staff in 1957 as an executive assistant. The League and GRI Boards of Trustees appointed him Executive Director in January, 1973. He is the League's 14th Director since 1896. He has served the League longer than any professional staff person except Mayo Fesler, who served thirty years prior to 1945.

Blair has been on the leading edge of the reform movement of municipal, county, and state government during the span of his Citizens League career. He has been The Citizens League voice in countless efforts to promote reform measures at those three governmental levels.

When he began to work for the League in 1957, voters faced the confusion of a "bedsheet ballot". It was not unusual for a voter having to wade through 110 Democratic candidates to choose 18 State Representatives from Cuyahoga County. Because of the infamous Hanna Amendment, the "cornstalk brigade" held a disproportionate power in the Ohio General Assembly. In Cleveland, some wards were four and one-half times larger than other wards-57,000 people in the largest to 12,000 in the smallest.

At the time, it seemed an insurmountable task to change these ingrained political inequalities. Yet, all three were torn down and Blair played a leadership role—in the battle to subdistrict Cuyahoga County and the other populous counties, in the struggle to reapportion the Ohio General Assembly on a more equitable basis, and in the fight to equalize Cleveland City Ward populations.

Those three issues typify Blair's philosophy about governmental reform. "To be a reformer, you must have perseverance and patience," he says. "None of those changes would have taken place if the League hadn't doggedly worked on them year after year. It is vital that a community have an organization like the League which pushes incessantly for needed changes in spite of the odds."

Blair notes that similar resistance met the League's initial proposals for a State conflict-of-interest law. He took that proposal to the Legislature on five different occasions before the concept was finally accepted and enacted into law.

The script for these changes followed a familiar pattern: League volunteer committees studied various means of improving government; a report was written; Blair took the report to the appropriate governmental body and lobbied for adoption.

Characteristic of this format was the effort to get Cleveland City Hall to adopt better budgeting procedures, a recommendation of the League's 1964 Operation Cleveland Followup Committee. Blair oberves, "I worked for a year to convince Mayor Ralph Locher to set up an Office of Budget & Management and staff it with professionals rather than politicos. And, it was not any easier to convince the County Commissioners to establish a similar office for the County. Both the City and the County are, however, in a better position to deal with fiscal problems having this modern budgetary tool."

In a like manner, Blair successfully lobbied for Code of Ethics legislation in Cleveland City Council. Numerous suburbs followed the Cleveland example. Any number of significant reforms would probably not have been adopted except for the work of Blair and the League.

Other important measures that he championed for the League were: lowered voting age, Ohio constitutional revision commission, county alternate forms legislation, open meetings of the Ohio Senate Rules Committee, public defender legislation, statewide voter registration, election of governor and lieutenant governor as a team, municipal income tax reciprocity mandatory retirement of judges, merit selection of judges four-year terms for Cleveland Mayor, Cleveland council reduction, All-America City Award for Cleveland, Ohio tax policy reforms. The list could go on and on.

For the last sixty-five years, the League has worked to get a more viable form of government for Cuyahoga County. Eight times the League has taken the lead in trying to reorganize county government and make it more effective. Blair was out front for the League in four of those attempts. In 1980, Blair took the lead role in bringing a County Home Rule Charter to a vote of the people by initiative petition. He directed the effort to secure over 60,000 initiative signatures, at that time the highest number ever secured in the county.

Blair has regularly been sought out for advice by politicians, candidates, news editors, and civic leaders. They respect his judgment as a valued resource and authority on politics and government. He has been a confidant of every Mayor since Anthony Celebrezze—as well as numerous congressmen, councilmen, state legislators, county commissioners, judges, and other public officials.

He has been the League's lobbyist before the Ohio General Assembly and the Cleveland City Council. He has directed the League's biennial State Legislation Committee that developed scores of legislative proposals which he took to the General Assembly and lobbied on their behalf.

Blair has guided the League's well-known Candidates Committee that interviews and makes recommendations on candidates for local and state offices. Likewise, he directed the affairs of the League's highly credible Issues Committee which annually makes recommendations on many volatile ballot issues.

Blair served on the 1971-72 Ohio Citizens' Committee on the State Legislature—a 25-member statewide Committee composed of Ohio Citizens with a broad knowledge of the Legislature. He acted as Secretary to the Committee which made significant recommendations for improvement after conducting a twenty-month inquiry into the structure and organization of the Ohio General Assembly.

Blair was recently awarded Mount Union College's Alumni Service Award, which is the highest non-academic honor an alumnus of Mount Union College can receive. According to Mount Union President G. Benjamin Lantz Jr., the award was presented to Blair for, ". . . his many years of distinguished service to his community and the college. Blair Kost is truly deserving of this prestigious award. His hard work and leadership in the Citizens League in Cleveland have gained him just recognition in his community and we are pleased to present him with our institution's highest alumni honor."

The award not only honors Blair but also the Citizens League, which is appropriate. For, his "life work" personifies the League. To many, many people, he is the Citizens League. His successes have been League successes. His goals have been League goals. His retirement will leave a void in the League and in the community. He will be hard to replace.●

COUNT BASIE: MASTER OF JAZZ AND SWING

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, the music world has lost a living legend. William "Count" Basie was buried yesterday, having finally succumbed to cancer at the age of 79.

The Count stood out from the other giants of jazz and swing for decades. He was a true master of his art—a musician who struck out on his own to create a unique sound that others have only imitated. Some musicians go with the flow. Count Basie created the flow.

As with so many young artists and intellectuals of this generation, Count Basie was drawn to Harlem to find his fortune. It was here that he met Fats Waller, who taught him how to play the organ. This was the beginning that launched his career, a career that spanned an incredible eight decades.

When Count Basie played, the whole room swayed. His bands were the best around mainly because of Basie's ability to set a rhythm that other musicians flowed around. He and Freddie Green on guitar formed what was perhaps the greatest rhythm section ever, and will be remembered for maintaining the intensity of each performance.

We will remember Count Basie's music, Mr. Speaker. And just as importantly, we will remember that his music was the music of a gentleman. He was not loud and eccentric like so many of today's artists. No, the Count was smooth, elegant, and he made your soul move.

God bless him.●

A SALUTE TO THE NIMITZ HIGH SCHOOL BAND

HON. JACK FIELDS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, the 1984 National Cherry Blossom Festival was celebrated in Washington, D.C. from April 1–7. The 1984 festival marked the 57th year of what is the oldest and has grown to be the largest annual event in the Washington area. First Lady Nancy Reagan served as honorary chairperson of the 1984 event.

In 1909, First Lady Mrs. William Howard Taft became interested in obtaining a number of pink and white Japanese cherry trees to plant in the Potomac Park area. Hearing of Mrs. Taft's interest in the trees, Dr. Johichi Takimine arranged for the city of Tokyo to donate more than 3,000 cherry trees to its sister capital in the United States.

The trees arrived in Washington in 1912, and the first tree was planted in a symbolic ceremony by Mrs. Taft on March 27 of that year. The original planting of Japanese cherry trees was first commemorated in 1927, when Washington schoolchildren reenacted the event, and, later, in 1934 by a 3-day celebration. From 1935 on, the festival has grown into a week-long event that is rated one of the top events in the Nation.

The Cherry Blossom Festival Week includes musical concerts, receptions, special tours, shows, and various other events. The festival is culminated by the Cherry Blossom Festival parade on Saturday. The Nimitz High School Band, of Houston, Tex., was chosen from among approximately 125 bands, nationwide, to participate in 1984's Cherry Blossom Festival parade. Following this year's parade, an awards ceremony for participating parade bands was held at the Old Post Office Building.

It is with a great deal of pride that I congratulate the Nimitz High School Band for their selection as the No. 1 band in AA concert competition. In addition to their selection as first in concert competition, the band's performance was given a superior rating, the highest rating possible.

A salute is in order for each of the 118 Nimitz High School Band members, Directors Louis Kleeman and Gary Speck and the chaperons who made the Nimitz band trip to Washington possible.●

CONGRESS MUST ACT TO ENCOURAGE STANDARDIZED NUCLEAR POWERPLANT DESIGNS AND PROVIDE FOR REGULATORY STABILITY

HON. JAMES T. BROYHILL

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Speaker, for the past 6 months, we have been reading almost daily about the difficulties associated with nuclear powerplants—difficulties seriously threatening the continued existence of the nuclear power industry in this Nation. Utilities are being forced to abandon newly completed nuclear construction projects worth billions of dollars, but which the utilities cannot afford to finish because they have no assurance that the plants will ever be allowed to operate.

There can be no doubt that these difficulties are due in large measure to the manner in which the Federal Government regulates this industry. The laws governing the regulation and licensing of nuclear powerplants have not been overhauled since they were enacted in 1954, and are inhibiting the development of this critically important energy resource. The industry and its regulators are caught in a quagmire of regulations which prolong construction time, divert the industry from important safety work, and impose new and modified requirements without regard to overall plant and industry safety. Few utilities would consider ordering a new nuclear plant under the current regulatory regime.

Mr. Speaker, the public has the right to expect congressional action on the difficulties associated with nuclear power. I invite you to join the bipartisan group of colleagues who support nuclear licensing reform and cosponsor H.R. 5053, the "Nuclear Powerplant Standardization Act of 1984." The Nation will benefit from licensing reforms which encourage standard nuclear powerplant designs, a more effective application of industry and NRC resources, the reduction of unnecessary cost, and regulatory stability.

Mr. Speaker, I insert two editorials which appeared in the Wall Street Journal and Washington Post, on April 23 and 27, respectively, and a letter I received from the Buildings and Construction Trades Department of the AFL–CIO, at the end of my statement. This material indicates the public's growing awareness that Congress must act to preserve the nuclear option, and that their patience is not unlimited.

CLAMSHELL VICTORY

A newspaper photograph of former workers at the Seabrook nuclear power project lining up for unemployment benefits in Portsmouth, N.H., last week reminded us of some other familiar New England scenes: "No Nukes" stickers on the bumpers of BMWs in Ivy League parking lots, earth children doing their protest thing at the perimeter of the Seabrook site, lawyers tying up billions while they argue about remote threats to clam larvae.

But in looking at the news photograph, it occurred to us that the construction workers had just lost and the "No Nukes" forces had just won another big battle. After seven years and $3.4 billion in sunk costs, Seabrook is finally stalled, one unit 75% complete and the other only 25% finished. The project's future is very much in doubt, as is the financial health of Public Service Co. of New Hampshire, the lead utility in the project. The children of the Clamshell Alliance are surely exultant in their triumph. They owe it in large part to the legal playground created by Congress that we describe above.

The walking wounded of this rout are those construction workers lined up at the unemployment offices. If any of them have BMWs, they make their own payments. Their view of reality has been conditioned by the simple experience of having to earn a living. It must be incomprehensible to many of them that a country's legal system could become so warped that it favors obstruction over construction.

But we know also that the forces that have fought nuclear power to a near-standstill are not entirely dilettantish. Their manipulation of the nation's tangle of law and regulation and their enlistment of pampered youngsters to their cause conceals a political agenda. The agenda is difficult to define, but it identifies with the anti-establishment, anti-business politics that had its origins in the 1960s.

It will of course be argued by these people that the problems with nuclear power lies elsewhere, most especially with the executives of the utilities that are building nuclear power plants. Such an incompetent bunch you'll seldom find, the No-Nukers smilingly suggest. That would be more plausible if there were not such a clear correlation between the projects the No-Nukers have targeted, such as Seabrook, and the amount of trouble encountered. Nuclear power projects abroad have had very little trouble at all. It is implausible that U.S. utilities have a monopoly on incompetent management. The management incompetence theme fits nicely with the general anti-corporate stance of the No-Nukers.

It is also true that the U.S. is the only country in the world rich enough to tolerate the colossal economic losses stalled nuclear projects are piling up. But U.S. wealth is not infinite and surely the electorate's patience isn't either. Those workers in the Portsmouth unemployment line have every right to be demoralized, but they also have every right to be very angry with the people who put them there.

NUCLEAR POWER OR NOT?

Four nuclear power plants, construction well along, have been cancelled and abandoned so far this year. Four others have slid into limbo, unfinished or finished but not operating. Although these eight are big plants, the delays and cancellations will not create an immediate shortage of electricity. But the pattern here points toward trouble. If Americans don't want nuclear power, perhaps the time has come to decide what kind of power they prefer instead.

With the current rise in industrial production, the demand for electric power is also rising. There's still excess generating capacity available, and scrubbing eight nuclear plants won't plunge the country into darkness tomorrow. But generating plants wear out, and the need to replace some of them is going to get urgent as the decade goes on. Most of the country's power is now generated with coal. Anxieties about acid rain seem to be rising, and, unfortunately, acid rain is the least of the damage that results from the present methods of burning coal. The smoke is toxic, and breathing it kills thousands of people in this country every year.

Nuclear plants are both safer and cleaner than coal. But, caught among rising construction costs, past mistakes and increasingly stringent enforcement of federal safety standards, the utilities are rapidly backing away from nuclear power. The last time a utility ordered a reactor without later cancelling it was in October 1973—just before the first oil crisis arrived, with its warning not to count on oil-fired generators.

Of the four nuclear plants abandoned this year, the extreme example is the Zimmer plant that three Ohio power companies were building near Cincinnati. Suffering from an accumulation of disputes over quality control, it was 97 percent complete by the owners' reckoning when they called it quits, confronted with estimates of another $1 billion or so to meet the Nuclear Regulatory Commission's requirements.

The latest addition to the limbo list is the Seabrook plant in New Hampshire, three-quarters built. Last week, after years of litigation and disputes, the principal owner suspended work there simply because it had run out of cash.

Under these circumstances, no American power company is likely ever again to try to build a nuclear plant with its own money. If Americans think they will need nuclear power in the 1990s, the government is going to have to intervene—and it may well have to build the plants itself. Alternatively, if Americans want to dispense with nuclear power they will need to find ways to burn coal without driving up the death rates. Ideally those are choices to be made now. But past experience suggests that decisions will come only after the brownouts begin.

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR—CONGRESS OF INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATIONS, BUILDING AND CONSTRUCTION TRADES DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D.C., March 30, 1984.

Hon. JAMES T. BROYHILL,
U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BROYHILL: The Building and Construction Trades Department has always believed that it is vitally important to assure that America has an adequate supply of electricity at the least possible cost. This is essential to ensure that America continues on a path of economic growth: for without a reliable source of competitively priced electrical energy, American businesses will be forced to expand their operations in other countries and may in fact relocate their existing operations.

It is important to utilize a wide mix of energy sources to achieve the balanced, secure, and economical supply of electricity we believe is necessary to meet our future energy needs. One source, nuclear power, must be included in such an energy mix. In 1983, some 13 percent of the nation's electricity was generated by nuclear power plants. That figure is expected to double in a decade so that nuclear power will fuel more of our electric power supply than any energy source other than coal.

We are concerned, however, that current federal regulation of nuclear power plants is inhibiting the development of this crucial energy source. The laws governing the regulation and licensing of nuclear plants have not been overhauled since they were enacted in 1954, and they are seriously out of step with the development of nuclear power in this nation.

The time necessary to construct and license a nuclear plant in America now may exceed 14 years—over twice as long as other industrialized countries. The industry and its regulators are being diverted from important safety-related work as new or modified requirements are impose without regard to the impact on overall plant safety. Utilities are being forced to choose between abandoning nuclear construction projects or continuing to invest without any assurance that the plants will ever be allowed to operate. No rational utility would order a new nuclear plant under the current regulatory regime.

In order to remedy this situation, we believe that it is essential to provide regulatory stability and to encourage the development and use of standardized nuclear power plant designs. Standardized designs will improve safety by concentrating the resources of designers, engineers and vendors on a few improved designs, and by stimulating standardized construction practices and quality assurance. It will also facilitate a more ready sharing of construction experience within the industry, which will in turn reduce construction times and promote uniformly high construction standards. Predictability and stability are prerequisites for the industry to fully benefit from the expertise construction workers develop while working on nuclear construction projects. These workers' expertise is an important resource our nation cannot afford to waste.

We understand that the promotion of standardized designs and regulatory stability is the intent of H.R. 5053, the "Nuclear Power Plant Standardization Act of 1984," a bill introduced by you and a bipartisan group of cosponsors just this past month. We applaud you and you colleagues for introducing this bill. The nation will benefit from licensing reforms which encourage standardization, a more effective application of industry and NRC resources, and the reduction of unnecessary costs. The legislation you and your colleagues have introduced comprehensively addresses many of the public's concerns about nuclear power, including questions raised about the competence of utility management and the need for more meaningful public participation.

This is a workable compromise which we feel will lead to the facilitation of a sound energy policy for the United States, and will help stabilize our future energy needs.

With kind regards, I am,

Sincerely,

ROBERT A. GEORGINE,
President.●

SUPPORT OF CONTADORA PROCESS

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, in a region which is torn apart by strife and ravaged by violence from every side, the Contadora peace process offers the last ray of hope.

These four nations, Mexico, Panama, Colombia, and Venezuela, have a vested interest in peace and stability. They are just as concerned as we are that strife and instability in Central America can threaten their nations. They are highly aware that the infusion of military from a variety of foreign powers could lead to an explosion which could threaten their security. And they have a vested interest in assuring that communism does not encroach on their borders.

These nations also have the experience to understand what is needed in the region. They understand that the problems are deep and complex, that a few more weapons and twisting a few more arms will not solve the tangled social and political difficulties.

With the document of 21 objectives, the Contadora Group has stressed respect for democracy, pluralism, and social and human rights. These objectives provide a frame of reference, a foundation upon which to construct a long-term and stable peace. It is this framework that has been lacking as military buildup and violence continues to shake the semblance of stability in the region.

We must do more than give lip service to peace. By supporting the Contadora process, we acknowledge that responsible settlement and negotiation are the most effective path to peace.

The President has asked for a bipartisan concensus on central America policy. With this resolution, the House can give the message that the bipartisan conclusion is for peaceful resolution of the conflict. Not an escalation of tension, but support for those nations who are working toward a comprehensive peace.●

A TRIBUTE TO BEN LEDERMAN

HON. STEPHEN J. SOLARZ

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, my colleagues know very well that the key to running a successful and effective district office operation involves having a dedicated and talented staff which cares deeply about the personal needs of the people of the community they are supposed to serve.

In my Brighton Beach office, I have one such staffer who exemplifies this description in every way. He is celebrating a birthday this week, and I wanted to bring to the attention of the House the wonderful work of Mr. Ben Lederman.

Ben serves as one of my district representatives to the shorefront community. To the civic organizations with which he is affiliated, and to the people who come to the Brighton Beach office for assistance, he is a giant. The gentle and considerate attention which he provides to my constituents—who may need help with a lost social security check or with a form with which they apply for benefits—soothes the concerns of the distressed who seek help and enables him to complete successfully most of the cases he takes on.

One thing which makes Ben a particularly effective asset is the extraordinary ties he has to the community. He is a founder and current president of the Oceanfront Coordinating Council; a long-time member and vice president-elect of the Kiwanis Club of Coney Island; chairman of the Brighton Beach Chapter of the Oddfellows Lodge; a long-term member and former vice president of the Brighton Beach Board of Trade; a board member of the Oceanfront Development Corp., and a member of community planning board 13. These are all activities to which Ben devotes an enormous amount of personal time. And they represent further examples of his commitment to making the shorefront area a better place for all the residents and business people located there.

I would like to pay particular tribute to Ben for his work as chairman of the summer program for Vacations and Community Services for the Blind and president of their advisory board. This is just one of many examples where Ben makes a commitment to improving the lives of those less fortunate.

On his birthday, I would be remiss if I did not state publicly how much Ben's contribution means to my office, and how much Ben's friendship means both to me and my wife Nina. Ben, we salute you.●

ELIE WIESEL'S REWARD

HON. GEORGE M. O'BRIEN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, last Sunday night at the Kennedy Center, Elie Wiesel was presented with the Congressional Gold Medal for his contribution to world literature and human rights. I can think of no one more deserving of this award, for Wiesel, who was interned in Auschwitz during World War II, is an eloquent spokesman and living symbol for Holocaust survivors.

Wiesel has spent the better part of his life bearing witness to the crimes committed against his family and other Jews who fell victim to the Nazis. He has steadfastly reminded us, through words and deeds, of the profound darkness and horror of the Holocaust.

Mankind must know palpably the horror of the Holocaust so that history does not tragically repeat itself. And this is why Wiesel has written, lectured and traveled so often—to guard against any future recurrence of such inhumanity. In a sense, his message has been simple: we must not forget the lessons of the past.

Mr. Speaker, Elie Wiesel has done an enormous amount to advance the cause of human rights and peace. It is fitting that we have rewarded him for his extraordinary work.●

ARMENIAN MARTYRS' DAY

HON. JOSEPH P. ADDABBO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, this year Armenian Martyrs' Day, which fell on April 24, had particular significance for me. Although every year for the past 69 years, we have marked this black date in order to remember the mass extermination of 1.5 million Armenians who died at the hands of the Ottoman [Turkish] Empire, this year we must reaffirm our understanding. This year, the Turkish Government is pushing the State Department of the United States to deny that this ruthless Turkish Government ever intended to complete a mass extermination of the Armenian culture.

How the State Department could suggest that the death of 1.5 million Armenians was not deliberate is beyond me. Our own Ambassador to Turkey, at that time, reported "a campaign of race extermination is in progress under a pretext of reprisal against rebellion."

The nations of the free world cannot go about changing history in order to improve diplomatic relations. To do so would be to turn our backs on 1.5 million Armenians who died in this holocaust. It would be a sign to our friends and foes alike that we are willing to sell out our moral commitment to improve surface relationships.

It has been suggested that by calling attention to the Armenian holocaust we are encouraging the escalation of terrorist activities by Armenian nationalists against Turkish diplomats. There is no Member of this House who condones terrorism. At the same time, I could not see any Member, of sound conscience refusing to speak out against the mass slaughter of innocent people. Speaking out sensitizes people, it brings an awareness to those who otherwise would be in the dark.

We are not trying to bring about a rise in terrorism, we are offering a remembrance on behalf of humanity. The Turkish Government cannot continue to deny these heinous events ever happened. A woman who survived the holocaust once said to me something I shall never forget:

What the Turkish government did was evil, but I cannot hate the Turks. They must admit their crimes and make reparations. But even more importantly, mankind must know that what the Turks did was not so unique, there were people who did it before them, and there was Hitler who did it after them. What the Holocaust shows us is man's inhumanity toward man, that is what I hate. Because all men have the capabilities to commit crimes against their fellow man.

Mr. Speaker, there is no message that I could offer which has greater meaning than these words. I will always speak out in remembrance because the chance that this occurs again is a thought far too horrible to consider.●

OSHA AND COORS

HON. DAVID R. OBEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. OBEY. Mr. Speaker, an ongoing investigation by my office concerning the Department of Labor's enforcement of laws protecting worker health and safety at the Adolph Coors Co. has uncovered additional evidence of possible favoritism in the treatment of Coors by the agency.

Prior to the Easter recess I reported to the House that documents that we had received indicated:

Repeated ex parte contacts between OSHA leadership and the Coors family and officials of the Adolph Coors Co. evidenced by official documents from the Labor Department and sworn depositions and interrogatories from Labor Department officials.

That Coors facilities targeted for inspection because of their hazardous nature were removed from an OSHA inspection list or not scheduled for inspections on several occasions based on discussions and directives from the national office.

That the OSHA regional administrator for the Denver regional office, a career civil servant, may have been forced from his job because of urgings from officials of the Adolph Coors Co.

That OSHA compliance officers entered and inspected Coors facilities on only four occasions between the time Assistant Secretary Auchter was sworn in and January 1 of this year, as compared with 20 entries in the equivalent 33-month period prior to his taking over the agency.

That three of the four occasions in which compliance officers entered Coors facilities were forced by death or serious injury to Coors employees in accidents related to that company's failure to follow proper safety and health practices.

That OSHA failed to cite Coors for all of the violations found by the compliance officers and that numerous serious violations by the company appear to have contributed to the accident that caused permanent brain, nerve and liver damage to one young woman employee and the death of two of her male coworkers, in one instance resulted in a fine of only $810. In a second instance failure by the company to provide proper guarding on a backhoe tractor and adequate training in the safe use of the backhoe resulted in an employee being crushed to death for which the company was fined only $720.

That despite the serious nature of the violations that appear to have contributed to these fatalities, no follow-up inspections were conducted by OSHA to determine whether these hazards were abated.

Since then our investigation has uncovered documents indicating that OSHA inspectors were left idle and without assignment because of directives from higherups not to inspect Coors facilities and that OSHA compliance strongly disagreed with the deletion of two Coors facilities from the inspection list. A letter from Mr. Jerry Ryan, industrial hygene supervisor for the Denver area, is included at the end of these remarks.

I would also clarify a point made in my statement of April 19, the one made immediately prior to the Easter recess. In that statement I indicated that only four inspections of Coors facilities were made between the time Assistant Secretary Auchter took over at OSHA and January 1 of this year and that three of those four were accident inspections, two of which involved fatalities. Further review of the OSHA files indicate that the third accident inspection also involved a fatality. In that instance an employee was crushed by a malfunctioning machine that was neither labeled or locked to prevent its use. During the course of the inspection officials of the company indicated that they previously considered a lock on the equipment but had decided it would be too expensive. The company was cited for failure to lock or tag the equipment and a $420 fine was proposed by the area office but the citation and penalty were later vacated by the Department of Labor.

In the one nonfatality inspection that was conducted by OSHA against Coors during the 33-month period in question, noise has a major target of the inspection. The agency found that noise levels throughout the plant were two to four times higher than permissible levels, that proper engineering controls to control noise were not used, and that nearly a third of the employees had experienced significant hearing loss since they began work at the plant. The agency initially proposed one nonserious citation for those violations but later vacated any citation.

MAY 21, 1982.

Memo For: Wm Corrigan, Area Director.
From: Jerry Ryan, IH Supervisor.
Subject: Significant problems affecting the DAO health enforcement.

The single largest problem that I am experiencing is the lack of available assignments for my staff. Since 5-4-82 we have been finished with the first cycle of the health planning guide with the exception of the four Coors plants. As you are aware CPL 2.25B Ch-1 eliminated the two Coors Porcelain plants much to our disapproval. Per instructions from Curtis we have not attempted an inspection at the Coors Container or glass plants. Without such inspection attempts we can't begin to schedule inspections for the health second cycle since cycle 1 isn't completed yet. Since I have projected 30% of my inspection activity from the planning guide and we have been without planning guide inspections for the past month, I will continue to be so in the future. Until Coors inspections are resolved our inspection numbers will fall short of our projections. At present I am 17% from where I should be for the total number of inspections at this time in the third quarter. The other scheduling problem is we still don't have approval for our lead emphasis program which was submitted back in Nov. 1981.

The second problem that we have is the inspection involving the Department of the Army at the Rocky Mt Arsenal. Verbally we had been instructed not to hold a closing conference, or issue citations. On June 21, 1982 the inspection will be 6 months old. Our case file shows evidence of 23 serious violations, two of which are willful and all of which involve a potent carcinogen, NDMA. I believe our Act and Executive Order mandate that citations be issued.

Our other problems are our continued lack of search warrants and the lack of clerical support for the office.

The only good news is that I'm looking forward to my vacation June 3-10th.●

HON. KATIE HALL

OF INDIANA

Tuesday, April 24, 1984

● Mrs. HALL of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I wish to address the House on a very important and far-reaching issue. The slaughter of 1.5 million Armenians by the Turks during World War I will remain a part of our memories for all time. The Armenian genocide must be recognized as a gray fact in history that cannot be minimized or forgotten.

Armenian Martyrs' Day recounts the sadness of that period and recalls other crimes of genocide caused by man's inhumanity to man.

Let us not forget, and let us fight to prevent another tragedy of the magnitude of the Armenian genocide.●

IN TRIBUTE TO BARRETT C. SHELTON, SR.

HON. RONNIE G. FLIPPO

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. FLIPPO. Mr. Speaker, on April 22, Alabama suffered the loss of one of its greatest native sons, Barrett Shelton, Sr. In tribute to this outstanding citizen, I want to submit an editorial which appeared in the paper he edited and published for 60 years, the Decatur Daily.

This outstanding Alabamian was given more civic and service awards than anyone I know. There is hardly an award worth having in Alabama that he had not received. He was even selected to address the United Nations.

His accomplishments and honors are literally a book of golden deeds.

There are few things in the lives of north Alabama that he has not touched and made better, whether it be business, industry, health, religion, government, or journalism.

I am a better person and a better Congressman for having known Barrett Shelton, Sr., and benefited from his wise and loving counsel. As he was to everyone, whether they knew him or not, he was my friend and benefactor.

When I had an extremely important decision to make about north Alabama and the Tennessee Valley, he was always one of the first that I went to for advice.

He was more than merely a newspaper publisher in my district. He was my mentor, confidant, critic, and helper.

Decatur, Morgan County, the Tennessee Valley, Alabama, and America are better because Barrett Shelton lived and loved them all and did his very best to make them all better for each and every person.

He would be embarrassed by all of this, as he often was by praise and plaudits. If I had to list one person whom I felt always did his best, he would be at the top of the list.

I thank the Good Lord for the splendid life of Barrett Shelton, Sr.

I send my deepest sympathy to Mrs. Shelton, Barrett, Jr., and Suzanne, as well as all the employees of the Decatur Daily.

My greatest hope is that somewhere, sometime, somehow, we shall see his likes again.

The editorial follows:

[From the Decatur Daily, Apr. 24, 1984]

BARRETT C. SHELTON

(The Bridge Builder by Will Allen Gromgoogle)

An old man going a lone highway,
Came in the evening cold and gray.
To a chasm vast and deep and wide,
The old man crossed in the twilight dim
The sullen stream had no fear for him.
But he turned when safe on the other side,
And built a bridge to span the tide.

"Old man," said a fellow-pilgrim near,
"You are wasting your strength a building here.
Your journey will end with the ending day,
You never again will pass this way.
You've crossed the chasm deep and wide,
Why build you this bridge at evening tide?"

The builder lifted his old gray head,
"Good friend, in the way I've come," he said,
"There followeth after me today,
A youth whose feet must pass this way.
The sullen stream was a naught to me,
To that fair haired youth may a pitfall be;
He too must cross in the twilight dim,
Good friend, I am building a bridge for him."

Barrett C. Shelton knew he had a special gift as a leader and he gave of it freely. Sitting in a hotel room in Tokyo two years ago, he hatched a scheme to entice Toyota to build a plant here that would employ 10,000 people.

The plant wasn't built but the effort was an example of his never-ceasing drive to do something for his people. He never let up at trying to improve Decatur, Morgan County and the Tennessee Valley. Even as life slowly flowed from him during the three weeks he was in a Birmingham hospital, he directed projects he had under way.

Barrett Shelton had far greater vision than most people. He had a belief in himself and in his ability to bring together the right people and the right elements at the right time to transform his visions into reality. He was a builder, and he believed in people.

He knew a million people, it seemed, and each could tell a story about the "Old Man," each story sprinkled with his ever-present humor, but each with a common theme of trying to help someone, or trying to help Decatur, Morgan County, the Tennessee Valley or the State of Alabama.

It was his life. While others played golf and took vacations, he rarely did. He worked, not only at building a better newspaper, but at building a better community. He believed a job was sacred and he wanted each person to have one. Thousands of people are at work today because of him.

Barrett Shelton was inquisitive. He had a thirst for knowledge. He believed in education. He often said that he wasn't exactly sure what high tech was, but that North Alabama had to have it. He knew its companion was education.

He had a natural enthusiasm for everything but most of all an enthusiasm for life. He loved living. He was determined to whip that dreadful thing that kept tugging at his lifeline. Two days before he died, when talking was almost impossible for him, he said twice in measured, deliberate words: "I will be back." The vow was to return to his office at THE DAILY, the place that was his life and the place where he often said "things get started."

He was more human than most of us. He felt things more keenly. Poverty made him grieve. "It's horrible," he often said. He was a pushover for hardluck stories that cost him no telling how much in personal charity.

He had a deep loyalty to his friends and to his beliefs.

He was a Democrat, always, and it pained him greatly to have to support a Republican president, a Republican senator, a Republican anything. But he saw it as his duty to support those in office, those building a better America. Building was always the key. He supported politicians because they could aid his city, his county and his people.

Of course, at election time he would be back trying to build the Democratic Party. He was a Democrat.

He felt that a newspaper's single most important function was to build. He devoted his last 15 years to that task full time and fretted that time was running out on him and that he had projects, such as downtown renovation, yet to be finished. At age 81, he had no desire to retire.

Mr. Shelton believed in quality journalism, but often practiced it a little differently from the norm. While some editors contend that the press and government should be adversaries, Mr. Shelton didn't believe a reporter should stick his finger in an elected official's eye simply because he represented the press. But let an official violate his public trust and he became fair game.

He loved his family, and that included "The Daily Family," the men and women who produce this newspaper every day.

Barrett Shelton had an unshakable faith in God, his church, his family and his people that was the cornerstone for all that he helped build.

The Decatur Daily was born in 1912 out of a need two small towns had for leadership. Its founder was William Randolph Shelton who provided directon through his newspaper for the growing area.

When New Decatur's name was changed to Albany, the name of the paper changed in 1916. W. R. Shelton continued to supply the leadership a newspaper must when it became The Albany-Decatur Daily.

His son, Barrett C. Shelton, became publisher in 1924. Making the twin towns one city was a major goal and it was accomplished in 1927 when the paper also received its current name, The Decatur Daily.

Now a third generation of that family, Barrett C. Shelton Jr., leads The Daily. The leadership that began on that February day in 1912 under W. R. Shelton and continued under Barrett C. Shelton for 60 years will continue to be a family tradition.

The Daily will remain a Shelton family owned newspaper.●

SOVIET GOVERNMENT HARASSMENT OF JEWISH "REFUSENIKS"

HON. WILLIAM (BILL) CLAY

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to call to the attention of my colleagues the devoted efforts of the Jewish Community Relations Council (JCRC) of St. Louis on behalf of five Soviet Jewish "refuseniks." The five cases I shall outline represent the ongoing harassment by the Soviet Government of members of the Jewish community. The JCRC of St. Louis, in conjunction with the National Conference on Soviet Jewry and the National Jewish Community Relations Advisory Council representing 113 community relations agencies throughout our Nation are leading the effort to end this senseless religious persecution.

The first case is that of former Prisoner of Conscience Grigory Goldshtein, a physicist from Tbilisi, who is accused of "taking advantage of his position" at the Central Bureau of Statistics, and may face a new, 3- to 5-year prison term. He has been informed that his file was transferred to a local prosecutor. He has protested the move with a detailed letter to the First Secretary of the Georgian Republic's Communist Party. Harassment of Goldshtein and the threat of another sentence is a sign of continuing surveillance of committed Jewish activists.

Leningrad refusenik and Jewish cultural activist Mikhail Beizer was threatened with arrest by authorities if he fails to "discontinue his activities." He has taught at private seminars on Jewish history and culture, and conducted unofficial tours of Leningrad's sites of Jewish interest. The JCRC protests this interference with Beizer's human right to learn and perpetuate his own culture and religion.

Prisoner of Conscience, Victor Brailovsky was to be released in March. A scientist of international reputation, Brailovsky continues to suffer for his Jewish activism. The JCRC expresses concern that once released, he be allowed to emigrate to Israel with his family, and looks to the time when his knowledge can be contributed to the West rather than imprisoned in a Soviet jail.

In two cases, the JCRC supports the emigration of Soviet Jewish individuals who are ill and seek the right to medical care outside the U.S.S.R. Wife of Moscow physicist Naum Meinman, Mrs. Ian Meinman, is gravely ill after undergoing a painful operation for a tumor in October. She was refused permission to leave for Israel where treatment is available.

Nadezhda Fradkova has been hospitalized as the result of a life threatening hunger strike in protest of the denial of the right to emigration. Rather than being force-fed and under guard, Fradkova should be allowed to leave for Israel.

I commend the agencies working in behalf of Soviet Jews and continuing to press the American Government to work on their behalf in all appropriate channels.●

DO NOT GIVE CONRAIL AWAY

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, the Department of Transportation is currently in the process of trying to sell Conrail. Conrail is now profitable, thanks to a large Federal investment of over $7.5 billion and hard work and sacrifice by shippers, employees, and others.

I have been concerned about a precipitous sale. Conrail will make over $400 million this year. We should sell only when we get an offer that provides the best return to the Federal Government and insures continued rail service.

What follows is an editorial from the Record of New Jersey which expresses concern about a sale.

[From the Record of New Jersey, Apr. 23, 1984]

DO NOT GIVE CONRAIL AWAY

Conrail, the phoenix that rose from the ashes of the Penn Central and four other bankrupt Eastern railroads in 1976, is now making handsome profits and attracting eager buyers. Mr. Reagan is in a rush to close a deal, but the government should look carefully at the arithmetic.

Two years ago, the White House hired a Wall Street investment firm, Goldman Sachs & Company, to study how best to return the 15-state freight service to the private sector. There are several alternatives: private purchase, purchase by Conrail's 40,000 union employees, a public stock offering, or some combination of the three.

It helps in weighing these choices to look at how the railroads collapsed, why the government was forced to create Conrail and pour $8 billion into it, and how the corporation has finally achieved profitability.

The postwar railroads in the Northeast suffered from bad government policies and bad management. The industry was severely over-regulated. Competing truckers were subsidized by lavish highway programs. Congress made prodigal rules for the railroad labor unions, and the unions excelled at featherbedding.

Deteriorating service drove passengers back to their autos. Tracks and rolling stock were neglected. With bankruptcy looming, Penn Central's directors repeatedly borrowed to pay dividends. Investigating the railroad's collapse in 1972, the Securities and Exchange Commission called this policy "reckless."

The Senate Commerce Committee suggested that five directors, headed by Fred Kirby of Alleghany Corporation, were among the largest shareholders of the railroad and stood to gain millions by their votes. Shares controlled by Mr. Kirby paid $4 million a year before the bankruptcy. Now the very same Mr. Kirby and his associate directors are looking to buy Conrail, and they apparently have the inside track with the administration.

The deal they have offered the government is as self-serving as their conduct on the Penn Central board. They say they are prepared to pay $2 billion, but their figures don't hold together. Counting the tax credits collected by Conrail when it was losing millions a year and the $700 million in cash that Conrail will have accumulated by the end of 1984, Mr. Kirby and company are offering the equivalent of $500 million for a property that is earning $500 million a year. That's a price-earnings ratio of 1 to 1. A conventional New York Stock Exchange ratio is 7 to 1.

That would be quite a bargain for Mr. Kirby and company, but it's a bad deal for the taxpayers, the freight customers, and the employees of the railroad.

For years, Conrail was kept afloat—and a vital freight network preserved—by the taxpayers. It's no accident that it has finally emerged in the black. Deregulation has freed it to operate rationally; union members have given up the old featherbedding rules and more than $120 million in pay increases, and the states—New Jersey, New York, and Pennsyvania—have taken over Conrail's money-losing commuter railroads. It's time to consider the equity of the ordinary people whose hardships have paid for Conrail's success.

Any of the alternatives is better for the taxpayers than the Kirby deal. Employees deserve something for their sacrifices. They now own 15 percent of Conrail stock. In order to buy the rest, they might have to borrow more money than is prudent. Goldman Sachs has predicted that a public stock offering would net the largest return. Perhaps a combination of public and employee ownership is soundest, fairest to taxpayers and union members, and best for rail service in the long run. We've had the Great Railway Fiasco. We mustn't follow it with the Great Railway Giveaway.●

BUILDER BONDS

HON. LAWRENCE COUGHLIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, builder bonds are bonds issued by homebuilders to various investors. The proceeds from the bond sales are used to provide mortgage money for home buyers; the mortgages held by the builder are used as collateral for the bonds. This innovation was developed by homebuilders in response to the high interest rates of the late 1970's and early 1980's and the use of builder bonds has expanded rapidly.

By tailoring the bond structure to specific investor needs and eliminating various fees and profits to financial intermediaries, builders issuing bonds are able to offer reduced mortgage rates and/or lower home prices than would otherwise be available to home buyers. In view of the current upward pressure on interest rates and the key role the housing industry plays in sustaining economic recovery, I believe the importance of builder bonds cannot be overstated.

Unfortunately, the future of these instruments and their benefits are being threatened by Treasury Department consideration of changes in the method of taxing them. Currently a builder pays taxes only on income received from payment of mortgages using the installment sales method of reporting income. Treasury has been exploring the idea of taxing builders when the funds are borrowed, that is, when the bonds are sold. Not only would such a change effectively eliminate builder bonds as a source of more affordable home financing, it would also contravene longstanding principles of taxation applicable to many industries.

House Concurrent Resolution 253 which I am cosponsoring expresses the sense of Congress that the Internal Revenue Code relating to installment sales, or any other provision of the code or IRS regulations, should not be modified or amended in any way to alter the manner in which mortgage-backed builder bond transactions are currently taxed.

Now is the time for Congress to go on record in support of builder bonds and I urge the Ways and Means Committee to approve House Concurrent Resolution 253 so that it may be brought to a vote on the House floor.●

JOHN J. JURSKI

HON. MARCY KAPTUR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, recently, the city of Toledo lost one of its most respected community and political figures. John J. Jurski's death is a great loss for all Toledoans.

John J. Jurski served 45 years in various Lucas County posts. A native of Poland, John Jurski served in the offices of the Lucas County Treasurer, sheriff, and engineer. He retired in 1969 from the sign painting department at the Lucas County garage.

John Jurski's contribution to the Democratic Party was of the highest order. He was Democratic chairman of the fourth ward for 15 years. Upon his retirement from the party post in 1961, John received a letter from President John F. Kennedy commending him for his valuable years of service to the party. John Jurski was an inspiration to generations of Democrats.

I know my colleagues in the House of Representatives join me in offering condolences to John Jurski's family and thank them for sharing him with us.●

DRUG ABUSE AND ALCOHOLISM CONCERNS IN MAJOR U.S. CITIES

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, I recently received a preliminary report of the results of the 1984 survey by the National Association for City Drug and Alcohol Coordination [NACDAC] on drug abuse and alcoholism concerns in major U.S. cities.

This survey requested data from 50 major cities on incidence and prevalence of substance abuse, funding and implementation of the Alcohol, Drug Abuse and Mental Health Services [ADMS] block grant, and the effects of funding changes on treatment and prevention services. The preliminary report is based on data furnished by 19 of the cities surveyed, a 40-percent return. Efforts are continuing to collect and analyze more returns.

The results of this sample show that alcohol, heroin, cocaine, and marihuana are the most abused substances. A third of the cities reporting mentioned an increase in cocaine, heroin, alcohol, and polydrug abuse.

More than three-fourths of the cities report a reduction in Federal funds since the ADMS block grant went into effect in 1982. The cities claim that State funding has not been adequate to compensate for the loss of Federal support, and many cities feel that States have not been fair in allocating block grant funds.

As a result of funding cuts, cities report that treatment and prevention services have been reduced, waiting lists and gaps in services exist, and programs are overutilized, raising concerns about the quality of care. Last year, the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control, which I chair, conducted a series of hearings around the country to examine the extent of drug abuse problems. The preliminary results of NACDAC's survey relect the testimony we heard. Witness after witness told us that although some surveys indicate slight declines in drug abuse nationally over the past few years, drug abuse remains extremely high in our cities and has increased sharply in a number of urban areas. While the drug problems facing many cities have grown, their resources for treatment and prevention have been reduced, and they cannot keep up with the increased need for services. If we are to be successful in reducing the adverse consequences and immense costs of drug abuse to our society, we must make a stronger commitment to helping our cities meet their unique drug abuse problems.

Mr. Speaker, because I believe the NAC-DAC's preliminary survey report will be of interest to other Members of Congress and the public, I ask that it be inserted in the RECORD at this point. I intend to insert the final survey results as soon as they are available.

Dr. Piccone's letter, the survey and a list of cities responding to the survey, follows:

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR CITY DRUG AND ALCOHOL COORDINATION,

Boston, Mass., March 21, 1984.

Hon. CHARLES B. RANGEL,
Chairman, Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. RANGEL: Enclosed with this letter is a preliminary report of the results of the 1984 survey by NACDAC (National Association for City Drug and Alcohol Coordination) of Drug Abuse and Alcoholism Concerns in Major U.S. Cities.

This survey requested data on incidence and prevalence of substance abuse, funding and Block Grant implementation and the effects of funding changes on treatment and prevention services in 50 major U.S. cities.

The greatest unmet needs noted in this sample were adolescent treatment, polydrug abuse treatment, and detoxification services, among other needs. The most abused substances were noted as alcohol, heroin and cocaine, in that order, among other substances abused. A third of the 19 cities reporting mentioned an increase in cocaine, heroin, alcohol and polydrug abuse. Alcohol maintains its place as the number one drug of abuse.

More than three-quarters of the cities reporting say that they have experienced a reduction in federal funds since the implementation of Block Grant funding, that State funding has not adequately compensated for this loss, and that the states have not been fair in allocating these federal funds. Over half the reporting cities believe that federal D & A funds should be allocated directly to large cities.

While there is a State Block Grant Allocation Task Force available to half of the 19 reporting cities, only one city has reported having meaningful participation on such a task force.

The reporting cities claim that they anticipate an average decrease in D & A services and program staff of 10 to 25%. They already have: Reduced treatment and prevention service; waiting lists and caps in service; and over utilized programs, causing concern about quality of care.

Despite the Federal mandate that D & A prevention should be a nationwide priority, survey results show a decrease rather than an increase of D & A prevention services in the cities reporting.

I would like to emphasize that this preliminary report is based on a 40% return and that we continue to work to collect more returns and broaden the data base.

Sincerely,

NICHOLAS L. PICCONE, Ed. D.,
Chairman, NACDAC.

Enclosures.

SURVEY OF DRUG ABUSE AND ALCOHOLISM CONCERNS IN MAJOR U.S. CITIES—PRELIMINARY REPORT

There were 55 Surveys mailed out, 22 Returned (40 percent): 19 cities, 2 states, and 1 region.

This preliminary data is based on returns from the 19 cities.

INCIDENCE AND PREVALENCE OF SUBSTANCE ABUSE

Those cities responding have a variety of unmet D & A abuse needs. Their focus was on (in priority order): adolescent treatment, polydrug abuse treatment, detoxification services (alcohol and drug adolescent detox), evaluation of D & A programs, diversion to treatment from CJS, treatment of the dual diagnosed (D & A and MH/MR), and greater collaboration among city agencies (D & A and others, e.g. MH/MR, aging, etc.)

The most abused substances in these cities are (in order of priority): Alcohol, heroin, cocaine, marijuana, amphetamines, barbiturates, hallucinagens, and other (Talwin and Pyribensamine that is, T's and Blues).

Since 1981, heroin abuse has increased in half of these cities, decreased in 25 percent, and remained essentially unchanged in 25 percent. Alcohol abuse has increased in 75 percent and remained unchanged in 20 percent of the reporting cities (5 percent no response).

The cities provided their data from a variety of data bases: Internal City, State, DAWN, CJS and Community Epidemiology Work Group Report as well as Special University or Government Studies.

About a third of the cities mentioned the increase they have seen in cocaine, heroin, alcohol and polydrug abuse. They also noted the younger age of abusers generally and certain populations, such as women, where more alcohol abuse is noted.

FUNDING AND FUNDING STRUCTURE

Nine (47 percent) out of 19 responding cities have all governmemt funds going through a central city office/agency.

Seventeen (89 percent) cities are located in states where there are SSAs (Single State Agencies).

Half of the cities have single county authority structures. Most are responsible for city or county geographical areas.

BLOCK GRANT IMPLEMENTATION

Half of the cities reporting describe a negative effect on their D & A service system by the new Block Grant Funding mechanism and feel strongly that federal D & A funds should be allocated directly to large cities. Of the remaining cities, 4 claim a positive effect from the Block Grant mechanism and want no change in it, while 5 have given no opinion.

Half of the cities reporting say that their states have a Block Grant Allocation Task Force. However, of this number, only one city has reported meaningful effective participation in it. The others either have not been invited to join it or have had only a limited effective input.

Almost all the 19 cities claim that their SSA does not provide adequate financial support for their D & A needs.

Fifteen (79 percent) cities say that they have experienced a reduction in federal funds since the implementation of Block Grant funding, that the state funding has not adequately compensated for this loss, and that the state has been unfair in allocating these federal funds. The same 15 cities also ascribe to needs based funding.

Only three cities report that legislatively approved D & A additional funds were actually used to replace federal funding reductions.

TREATMENT

Approximately 400 D & A treatment facilities are receiving public money in the 19 reporting cities—serving 116,502 clients.

More than a third of these 19 cities have formal waiting lists for Methadone Maintenance, alcohol and outpatient drug free treatment, extending for up to five weeks.

They also note, in several instances, that they continue to have heavily over-utilized programs. This raises concerns regarding quality of service in these over-utilized situations.

For fiscal year 1985 they are anticipating an average decrease in D & A services of 10-25 percent, as well as a program staff reduction of 10-25 percent.

They claim that they have already experienced: Reduced treatment and prevention services; waiting lists and gaps in services; and overutilized programs.

They have reduced, or will be reducing services even as they all seek other public and private funding and strain to use all available resources in a maximum way.

EDUCATION, PREVENTION AND INTERVENTION

Only Los Angeles and Buffalo note any significant increase in prevention funding. This is significant as regards the Federal mandate that D & A prevention should be a priority, nationally. Despite this mandate, the survey results thus far show that there is a decrease rather than an increase of prevention services in the cities reporting.

5,000 to 105,000 people in these cities received substance abuse prevention education in fiscal year 1983; 90 percent were youth.

Prevention programs anticipate a reduction in services of an average of 10-25 percent during the coming year.

Prevention programs are seeking alternate funding from public and private sources even as they face the reality of reduced prevention service availability.

HOLOCAUST VICTIMS

HON. WILLIAM J. HUGHES

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 30, 1984

● Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, this week begins the designated Days of Remembrance of the victims of the Holocaust. Today I would like to convey my sentiments to the survivors of the Holocaust and their families.

These men and women are truly brave individuals. Throughout severe persecution, they retained the mental and moral strength to persevere and withstand the fear and dangers initiated by their oppressors. Their spirit and resilience deserve our deepest respect.

But these people wish more than our respect. They desire our attention and remembrance. Those who gather here in Washington implore our recognition of the destruction one group brought upon another, so that the complacency which allowed this Holocaust will never again occur.

Plans for a Holocaust Museum are still underway, and recently a building was acquired. Like all symbols, this museum will serve as a constant reminder to future generations of the darkest hour in human history. It will also serve as a memorial to the many who were killed.

These days of remembrance are the cornerstone from which we must build a disgust against tyranny. For tyranny has historically wrought havoc, as can be seen from the nightmarish events under tyrannical Germany that led to such great human loss and suffering.

I am pleased I had this opportunity to share my deepest admiration for those people who fought to remain alive, and who now share their experiences in the hope of saving succeeding generations from the senseless scourge of war.●

ANGRY COMMISSION CHAIRMAN WALKS OUT ON INTERVIEWERS

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, it is with grave concern that I insert the following article from the April 1984, issue of Navy Times magazine in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The attitude and tone of the chairman of the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control, Mr. J. Peter Grace, is such that I fear that the national alarm concerning his committee's recommendations is indeed justified.

Mr. Speaker, the article follows:

[From the Navy Times magazine, Apr. 1984]

ANGRY COMMISSION CHAIRMAN WALKS OUT ON INTERVIEWERS

(J. Peter Grace, chairman of the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control, agreed to be interviewed by Navy Times Staff Writer Tom Philpott and Federal Times Reporter Winston Wood in his Washington office February 8. He angrily cut short the interview after about 15 minutes. The following is a transcript of the discussion.)

Times: Mr. Grace, I work for the service Times papers, the Army Times, the Navy Times, the Air Force Times. Winston (Wood) is with Federal Times. Of course, your recommendations would touch the lives of these people in many ways.

Grace: Yes, Well, may I say that an awful lot of people would not be affected because of the grandfathering of the situation. Anybody, basically, 45 years and older would really not be affected. But the whole issue comes down to, really, we were asked to look at the economics and thrust of the whole government. And when you see we are heading for a total unfunded liability in Social Security and the civil service and the military of $27 trillion in 17 years then you say to yourself, "Can we afford this?" And there is nothing in our ideas and recommendations that the people who are, say, 45, 46 and beyond, those on retirement, would really be affected very much at all.

We've had letters—another thing I want to say is—we have had letters, a number of letters, and even money, from retired service people who have said, "We think that what you are recommending might hurt us. But we want to tell you that we have children and grandchildren who are looking down the road to the future and we think you are right in principle and we want to send some money in to help you."

And I've been on quite a number, quite a few radio call-in shows and I have had retired military people and retired FBI, widows of retired FBI men, come on and say the same thing. "We think you're right. We don't think the government can afford to spew this money out the way they are doing it."

So I just mention, I don't think it's something that people above 45 years of age are really not going to be affected very much. Or those that are retired. We shouldn't get into a confrontational attitude. And those that are below these ages, they are going to get hit with the overall impact of all these expenditures anyway. And I think they will be just as anxious as all the rest of us to see that something is done sensibly. To see, you know, that the whole nation doesn't go down the drain.

Because, as we pointed out to the Senate Finance Committee today, the difference between doing our recommendation, our 2478 suggestions that we have made, and of not doing them, is a difference of having a $1.996 trillion deficit or a $37 billion deficit in the year 2000.

So, it is a total cumulative difference of $10.35 trillion. And therefore, something has to be done. If it isn't these ideas, then it will have to be something else. And a younger man, as I am saying, those that are say 40 or 45, they'll only be 52 to 57 [sic] at the turn of the century, fairly young people. And yeah, they will be affected by this, but by the same token, if they weren't affected by this and if nothing else is done they will be living with an economy which has a $2 trillion annual deficit. So I just wanted to put the whole thing in context.

Grace: You did?

Times: Yes.

Grace: And you saw the numbers?

Times: Yes. And we have seen them in your reports as well.

Grace: You stayed for the whole hearing?

Times: Yes.

Grace: Oh, you did?

Times: Yes. Well, let's see. Until 12 o'clock. I don't know whether that was . . .

Grace: Yeah, that was about when it ended.

Times: Yes, we were there for the whole thing. But perhaps we can start with the cost-savings figures. There's been criticism of that throughout the government. Even the agencies that are looking over your numbers now, months ago they said . . .

Grace: You said, ". . . are looking over your numbers now." Ah, that means they are looking over 23,650 pages. Is that right? Is that what you are saying? Yeah, they are looking them over. How long do you think it will take them to study those carefully?

Times: Well, your reports were out in August, as I recall.

Grace: Oh no, the final reports came out about 10 days ago. With duplicated savings and everything else. We stand on our final reports, which came out on January 16.

Times: But the people who have looked over your findings since August, though . . .

Grace: "The people who have looked over . . ." I want to be very careful now. Who are "the people?" These are certain people who have looked over it.

Times: Okay.

Grace: "The people," huh?

Times: You want me to name names?

Grace: No, no. I don't want you to name names. Your sentence reads, "The people who have . . ."

Times: Well, let me ask you this, Mr. Grace.

Grace: No, no. I would like to hear the end of that sentence. "The people who have . . ." Go ahead.

Times: Looked over . . .

Grace: Now what were you going to say?

Times: That is, analysts in the government. That is, people—like in a corporation, the comptroller people, but like in the government—who have looked over your budget of cost esimates, they're saying your cost estimates are grossly exaggerated.

Grace: So you are saying everybody who has looked it over is saying that?

Times: I'm saying the people I have talked to. I would go so far as to say consistently, the people I've talked to.

Grace: The people you have talked to. So now we are down to the circle of people you have talked to, is that right?

Times: Okay.

Grace: Good. That's fine. Now what am I supposed to say to that? I don't know who you have talked to. I mean I'm not going to say to you that, before I came in here, I went over to the Carlton Hotel and talked to everybody I could find in the lobby about you and they all told me you were a son-of-a-bitch. But I'm not going to say that to you.

Times: Uh, uh.

Grace: And that I didn't do it. And they didn't say it. But I don't know who you talked to. So, therefore, it doesn't mean a damn thing to me.

Times: Okay. Do you know (Defense) Secretary Weinberger?

Grace: Sure, I know him.

Times: Then he says that your savings are, what you plan for military retirement won't work. Won't provide you with the force that you need.

Grace: Hooray for him. That's his opinion.

Times: Well, all I'm asking you is if that's not going to work, what does the President do with * * *

Grace: You say it's not going to work. When did you ever hear people * * * I got the senators all laughing this morning when I said, "When did anybody ever start on an economy program where all of the people, before you gave them your recommendations, said, 'Oh, yeah, that's right. We haven't done any of those things that we should have done before.'" The first reaction from people who have told, "If you do thus, thus and thus * * *"

Times: Who are these "people" you're talking about?

Grace: I'm talking anybody. Anybody. Anybody.

Times: Same people I was talking about.

Grace: Same people. Anybody you talk to who said, "Now I'm going to show you how you can do everything that you do, only at 30 percent less cost." And when I come out and tell your boss about it, you're going to say, "He's nuts. He doesn't understand," et cetera.

(Aide hands Grace a one-paragraph letter)

Grace: Here's a letter I got from Cap Weinberger, received on January 17th. "You may be assured that we are considering all of your recommendations in our office to gain the fullest advantage from your many good ideas."

Times: He may be considering them, but let me tell you what Cap Weinberger said at a recent press conference.

Grace: Sir, I think I have had it. I mean, you obviously have come in here to insult me. We stand on our recommendations. I don't give a goddamn who you saw or what they said. And I went through this and you didn't even listen to it. I've had it.

Grace: I haven't got time to talk to someone as prejudiced as you.●

DAYS OF REMEMBRANCE OF VICTIMS OF THE HOLOCAUST

HON. BOB CARR

OF MICHIGAN

Monday, April 30, 1984

● Mr. CARR. Mr. Speaker, over 40 years ago today, the rumor of a terrifying Nazi plot to exterminate the Jewish race began to circulate throughout Europe. Soon after that the Jews were expelled from the countryside of Poland and forced into urban ghettos. Their property was confiscated, their labor exploited, and their bodies starved as a means of control. This marked only the first phase of destruction.

What followed was the most unconscionable act of programed genocide the world has ever known. The use of mobile killing units and extermination camps ultimately brought about the death of 6 million Jewish men, women, and children.

The most devastating part of the Holocaust for many who lived through it was their fear that no one would ever know. For many survivors, the past would be obliterated. The duty to describe the past became the very reason to stay alive. Their testimony was a moral appeal to the world's conscience, an urgent plea that this moment in world history never be repeated.

We have learned a valuable lesson from those survivors who stepped forward to bear witness. The Holocaust left them with memories far worse than any of us can imagine yet they had the courage to live on, publicizing to the world their tragedy, even though the world might have preferred not to listen. Their lives were a testimony to humaneness in spite of the inhumanity of the concentration camp.

Today we have the duty and opportunity to pay homage to those who died and those who survived this physical and psychological catastrophe. Through this day of remembrance we proclaim to our fellow Americans and the world that we have not forgotten the conditions the Jewish people were forced to live and die under. It is in honor of the courage of the victims—and the survivors—that we mark the Days of Remembrance of Victims of the Holocaust.●

CRIME ISSUE

HON. THOMAS F. HARTNETT

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. HARTNETT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of my colleagues an issue which is becoming an embarrassment to the House of Representatives. The issue is criminal justice system reform. In March 1983, the President sent to the Congress the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1983, of which I am a cosponsor, proposing substantive changes to the criminal justice system. Some of the issues in this bill include bail reform, capital punishment, and the exclusionary rule. The Senate held hearings and processed the act as four separate bills resulting in passage of all four this past February. Unfortunately, on our side, the bill was not even sent to the appropriate subcommittee until March 1984.

Crime is one of the high priority issues on the minds of our citizens. All polls reflect crime as being considered one of the major ills of our Nation. And yet, for some unexplainable reason, the House is unable to act on legislation which will improve the criminal process in our country.

The issue of crime is complex and concessions have been made in order to get a consensus on proposed legislation. The Senate's action reflects taking on a difficult issue and resolving it with passage of the bill reflecting bipartisan support.

It is time for us to get on with the crime issue and act in a responsible manner to pass this legislation. More specifically, Mr. Speaker, when are we going to get this bill out of committee in order that we may vote on the issue at hand? I call upon the leadership of the House to take necessary steps to insure this proposed legislation is brought to the floor so that we may act responsibly before the end of the session. The American people are worried about crime, constructive legislation has been passed by the Senate and we desperately need to get on with the process and pass this measure without delay.●

HON. JOHN F. SEIBERLING

OF OHIO

Tuesday, April 24, 1984

● Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, April 24 marks the 69th anniversary of the deaths of Armenians in Ottoman Turkey. Estimates suggest that as many as 1.5 million Armenians died, and another half a million were forced into exile. The unfortunate events of 1915–23 presaged darker efforts to extinguish other religious, ethnic, cultural, and racial groups during the Second World War.

I am pleased to be a cosponsor of House Joint Resolution 247, which sought to designate April 24, 1984 as "National Day of Remembrance of Man's Inhumanity to Man." Unfortunately, a shortsighted technicality prevented the House from passing the resolution in time to commemorate April 24 as a day of remembrance for victims of the events of 1915–23, and indeed for all victims of the brutalities which we have inflicted on each other from time immemorial.

We should not forget the victims of Armenian genocide, just as we should not forget the victims of the Holocaust. To paraphrase the Armenian Genocide Commemorative Fund, such a remembrance would be an affirmation that will help preserve life today, and will reconfirm our dedication to the ideals of personal and religious freedom.●

NETWORKS GETTING MESSAGE ON EXIT POLLS

HON. TIMOTHY E. WIRTH

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Speaker, I call to your attention and to the attention of my colleagues the following article by Mr. Daniel Ritchie, chairman and CEO of Group W (Westinghouse Broadcasting and Cable Inc.), which appeared in last week's New York Times.

Mr. Ritchie expresses his very compelling thoughts on the extraordinary role that television has in our society and the potential it has to provide diverse and quality programing. I wholeheartedly agree with Mr. Ritchie that television is an enormously pervasive medium for informal learning and has not lived up to its potential to be a more positive influence.

It is unfortunate that there are not more broadcasters like Daniel Ritchie who understand that in return for the exclusive use of a very scarce natural resource—the public's airwaves—a broadcaster is statutorily required to provide programing that serves a community's needs and interests. One way that this lack of concern by some broadcasters for the public's interest has manifested itself is in the role that the broadcast media play in our electoral process.

The article focuses on a side of the problem of early projections of election results by the networks that has yet to receive much attention—the responsibility of local television affiliates for network practices. Mr. Ritchie very aptly points out that—

> Local stations form each community's delegation to a much larger process . . . as local television licensees, they are the legal arbiters of what is ultimately transmitted via the airwaves.

More and more Members of Congress are condeming the networks' practice of explicitly or implicitly projecting an election winner, based on exit polls or other techniques, before all voters have had the opportunity to cast their ballots. However, the ultimate resolution of this particular issue, and the overall issue of responsiveness to the community that a broadcaster is licensed to serve, should not lie with the Congress, but with the industry itself.

Voluntary restraint from projecting a winner before the polls close hides no information, censors no fact and destroy no one's right to know. Broadcasters, as public trustees of our Nation's airwaves, can play a key role in encouraging voter participation and informing the public about our electoral process. There need be no conflict between the electronic media's rights to report actual news events as they occur and a voter's right to exercise his franchise. These are two very compelling, not competing goals.

Mr. Ritchie's thoughtful article comes from a very interesting perspective—that of a broadcaster. I encourage my colleagues to read it.

NETWORKS GETTING MESSAGE ON POLLS

(By Daniel L. Ritchie)

It was a fitful and dog-tired Harry Truman who turned in his sleep one memorable election night in 1948 to hear radio commentator H.V. Kaltenborn pronounce him doomed. Mr. Truman was ahead in votes counted, Mr. Kaltenborn acknowledged, but no matter. The polls showed Thomas E. Dewey incontestably ahead. Tally all the votes and it would be done with.

Daylight, of course, told a different tale. The pollsters ran for cover as Mr. Truman, skillfully mimicking the clipped diction of Mr. Kaltenborn, chided all those who had guaranteed his defeat.

We'll never know how Mr. Truman might have fared had there been exit polls back in those days. But he might not have had quite so much fun the next morning.

Within four years of his victory, in time for the next national election, television had eclipsed radio as the medium of prime importance to Presidential candidates. And in the decades since, the science of polling and the technical artistry of television have grown ever more sophisticated. Yet here we are again, witnesses to the same uneasy relationship, with pollsters and broadcasters locked in the same awkward embrace. Not strange bedfellows, perhaps, but unsettling ones.

Consider the words of Ted Koppel of ABC News on election night 1980. At 10:15 P.M. he proclaimed: "It's inevitable now that as this night continues, the Democrats are simply not going to bother to vote where the polls are still open. why should they? It's all over as far as they're concerned." Mindful of the power of the medium he serves, Mr. Koppel had the presence of mind to amend his comments moments later: "Voters on the West Coast: there's more than a Presidential race. Please vote." Yet he was right the first time. Television had made millions of American voters feel superfluous.

The simple answer is to heap scorn on the networks for reporting election winners prematurely. But network news practices, including those governing the use of exit polls, are not born willy-nilly. They are the product of fierce competition for viewers nationally, and, in this respect, each network's approximately 200 affiliated stations share a measure of respsonsibility for preserving the integrity of the voting process.

Local stations form the networks' most important constituency. The networks need to hear from their own membership that premature reporting of exit-poll information on election day is unacceptable.

As owners of three NBC affiliates, two CBS affiliates and an ABC affiliate, we are seeking to make that point. Last month, we ceased reporting the results of exist polls we conduct locally until after the polls close. Our radio stations, including three of the country's largest all-news stations, are following the same policy.

But the polling issue, which has been the subject of debate since at least 1964, is only the most topical challenge facing television today. Political coverage overall warrants deeper scrutiny and more substantive treatment. And matters of equal moment need tending to. In a candid address recently, Grant Tinker, the chairman of NBC, suggested that the industry as a whole might have failed its viewers in terms of the quality and diversity of its programming.

I believe television has much to its credit. But Mr. Tinker speaks the truth. Prime time seems hardly prime these days. Most of what turns up on the dial seems roundly duplicative and silly. How many stories of abused and violated people do we really need? How many living room sitcoms can we survive?

Local stations cast a powerful vote in the conduct of network news and program practices. As local licensees, they are the legal arbiters of what is ultimately transmitted via the airwaves. In theory, if not always in practice, local stations form each community's delegation to a much larger process.

Television's best hope this election year is that grass-roots industry support for self-prohibition will encourage a responsible resolution to the exit-poll dilemma. Contrary to popular belief, the networks are not insensitive to questions concerning their role in the American political process. Most noteworthy in this regard is the example of Leonard Goldenson, the chairman of ABC, who has begun a scholarly review of television's place in our political system.

Such actions cannot advance unsupported. They require and merit a show of solidarity among television's own precinct workers: its station people in cities and towns across the country. Beyond that, it is vitally important to the continued health and well-being of our society that the powerful affiliate bloc play a more active role in shaping future programming policy for television.●

CAPITOL TO CAPITOL VISIT

HON. VIC FAZIO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, toward the end of this week a delegation of 115 businessmen, women, and local government officials from the greater Sacramento metropolitan area will converge on this city for the 14th annual "Capitol to Capitol" visit. Their purpose will be to communicate to us and to the Federal bureaucracy the unique concerns and needs of Sacramento.

Divided into 15 separate teams, the delegates will keep 88 appointments over 2½ days to discuss 92 subjects in areas such as water resources, health, housing, public broadcasting, agribusiness, small business, transportation, energy, welfare, education, employment and training, and arts and history.

They will be following in the footsteps of the first "Capitol to Capitol" delegation, sent to Washington in 1971 by the Sacramento Metropolitan Chamber of Commerce to protest the proposed closure of McClellan Air Force Base, one of Sacramento's major employers.

That year, five chamber members, the mayor of Sacramento and a county supervisor were successful in removing McClellan from the base closure list. Thus encouraged, the chamber decided to make the cross-country journey an annual event designed to express the community's appreciation for area military installations and to show support for their military construction programs.

In 1975 the trip was expanded, at the suggestion of then-Mayor Phil Isenberg, to cover not just military involvement in the area but also a wide range of community projects and legislative issues affecting Sacramento. As a result, what began as a handful of concerned community members has now expanded to more than 100 individuals paying their own way and devoting time away from their businesses to communicate and support the interests of their community.

The chamber of commerce and the people of Sacramento are to be applauded for their foresight, their commitment and their willingness to involve themselves in the wheels of government for the betterment of the greater Sacramento metropolitan area. I know of no other community in the Nation that has undertaken such an endeavor. It is with a measure of pride as one of Sacramento's congressional representatives that I commend their efforts to your attention.●

HON. RAYMOND J. McGRATH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to a remarkable woman who has recently celebrated her 53d birthday.

Ida Nudel is one of the more well-known Soviet refuseniks. She has gained notoriety for her steadfast and courageous resistance to Soviet authorities who seek to cut off her contact with the Jewish religion and her people's heritage.

Ida's fight to keep the traditions alive has cost here dearly. She has been imprisoned, harassed, and exiled from her native Moscow.

Authorities continue to monitor her activities although her sentence of internal exile expired in March 1982. She has been warned not to leave the town of Bendry where she has been living. This implied threat of disciplinary action for violation of the warning has prevented her from receiving medical treatment for her heart condition.

Even in her weakened condition Ida Nudel continues to fight. She is an inspiration to other refuseniks throughout the Soviet Union and to all of us who marvel at the dedication and belief in religious values and teachings which burns inside people like Ida.

She has the admiration and respect of millions to which today I add birthday greetings.●

H.R. 5503, THE HEALTH PROFESSIONS MINORITY TRAINING ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1984

HON. LOUIS STOKES
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, the severe underrepresentation of minority physicians, dentists, veterinarians, pharmacists, and other minority health professionals is a critical national problem that can no longer be studied, discussed, and debated. It is a problem that deserves priority national attention and action by Congress.

On June 16, 1983, the Association of Minority Health Professions Schools (AMHPS), an organization of eight predominantly black medical, dental, pharmacy and veterinary schools released a study, entitled "Blacks and the Health Professions in the 80's: A National Crisis and a Time for Action," which examined the status of minorities in the health professions. The AMHPS study reported that there are significant shortages in the number of minority health professionals in the United States and warned that these shortages are likely to become more acute unless action is taken by the President and the Congress.

The AMHPS study documents the continuing shortages of black physicians and other health professionals. While blacks represent nearly 12 percent of the U.S. population, the percentage of black physicians is a pitiful 2.6 percent. This percentage represents a mere one-half of 1 percent increase in the proportion of black doctors which has existed since 1950. The statistics for the representation of blacks in other health professions are equally dismal. Less than 3 percent of the Nation's dentists are black, only 2.3 percent of the pharmacists and a mere 1.6 percent of the veterinarians throughout America are black.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, I consider it a national disgrace that there has been little or no improvement in minority representation in the health professions, during a period when there has been a tremendous growth overall in the numbers of students being trained for service in the health industry. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that recent projections of a surplus of some types of health professionals in the United States by 1990 is totally unrelated to the status of blacks and other minorities in the health arena.

Currently, of the 127 medical schools in the United States, the four minority schools—Howard University, School of Medicine, Meharry Medical College, Morehouse School of Medicine and Charles Drew Medical School—produce almost 25 percent of the black physicians; of 58 dental schools, the two minority institutions—Howard University, School of Dentistry and Meharry Dental College—produce 38 percent of the black dentists; of 71 pharmacy schools, the four minority schools—Howard University, School of Pharmacy, Texas Southern, Xavier University and Florida A&M—produce 45 percent of all black pharmacists; and of 27 veterinary medicine schools, predominantly black Tuskegee produced 75 percent of all black veterinarians.

In 1984, the scarcity of black role models among practicing health professionals in the United States suggests to black young people that it is not realistic to pursue a career in the health professions. This negative message to black youngsters is reinforced by poor counseling in high school and college, where minority students are often steered into vocational courses and less rigorous academic subjects, leaving many of them poorly prepared for the study of a health profession.

In addition to the very important goals of insuring parity and equity for minorities in the health professions, there are other very crucial reasons why Congress should turn its attention to the shortage of minorities in the health professions. Numerous studies over the years have documented the fact that blacks and other minorities in this country still receive the short end of the stick with respect to high quality and easily accessible health care. The appalling statistics describing the disparate health status between black Americans and white Americans, most recently published by the U.S. Public Health Service in, "Health, United States, 1983," tell us that something is terribly wrong with our health delivery system today.

Mr. Speaker, our country has the most sophisticated health system in the world. Yet, the average life expectancy for black males is 6 years less than that of white males. The infant mortality rate for black babies is 21.4 per 1,000 live births, twice the rate for white babies. And, this gap is growing.

Our Nation's history has shown that a major factor in improving the health status of blacks and other minorities lies in expanding the supply of qualified health professionals and enhancing the likelihood that these professionals will practice in inner city and rural communities that are underserved. We also know for example, that black physicians also tend to locate in underserved areas and to specialize in primary medicine more so than other physicians. We know that this is true of other black health professionals as well.

Mr. Speaker, because minority health professionals and predominantly minority health professions schools are needed to address the severe unmet health care needs of our poor and minority citizens, we face a philosophical and ethical dilemma: Either we provide the financial and other resources needed to implement our country's creed of equal opportunity, or we abandon a large segment of our population to a high infant mortality rate, a shortened life expectancy, debilitating poverty, a crushing burden of illness and disability and increasing disillusionment, frustration and loss of hope. As the most affluent of nations and the leader of the free world, we should not allow this to happen.

Recently, I introduced H.R. 5503, the Health Professions Minority Training Assistance Act of 1984. H.R. 5503 is a modest and sound proposal which seeks to accelerate the rate of participation of blacks and other minorities in the health field, and thereby help to improve the health status of minorities in the United States. Specifically, the bill, if enacted, would:

Provide grants to health professions schools to establish a fund from which low-interest loans may be made to low-income students;

Establish a low-interest, service obligated, loan forgiveness program for minority health professions students;

Provide for federally guaranteed loans to assist minority graduates of health professions schools to set up private practices in underserved areas;

Provide incentive grants to accredited public or nonprofit health professions schools to encourage the expansion of minority enrollments;

Establish endowment development grants for health professions schools with predominantly minority or low-income students;

Provide grants for health professions schools with predominantly minority or low-income students;

Provides financial need scholarships to minorities and low-income students;

Provide fellowship grants to encourage minorities to pursue academic and research careers; and Reauthorize the advanced financial distress and the disadvantaged assistance programs for an additional 3 years.

Mr. Speaker, the development and enactment of the Health Professions Minority Training Assistance Act, is of the utmost importance to the millions of ethnic minority groups living throughout the Nation. It is my firm belief that special and targeted Federal efforts for minority training and education activities are required and well justified to raise the level of national commitment to improving health care for all Americans. Mr. Speaker, even the Reagan administration has admitted that we must increase opportunities in health education for the economically disadvantaged and minorities, and increase the number of health care providers serving populations of minorities and underserved. Unfortunately, the administration's budget and legislative proposals do not reflect a significant commitment toward these goals.

H.R. 5503, however, would provide for a substantive and long-term commitment by providing the necessary resources for minority students to attend health professions schools and for minority health professions schools to expand training activities.

Mr. Speaker, many factors other than the availability of health professionals affect the health status of minorities. However, expanding the supply of well trained minority health professionals, sensitive to the needs of the minority community, is a key tool in addressing the pernicious problem that has plagued minorities in this country for far too long—the lack of accessible health care.

In the words of Dr. Louis Sullivan, president and dean of Morehouse Medical College and immediate past president of the Association of Minority Health Professions Schools:

As a nation, we need to utilize the most talented individuals available for the demanding health professions in an effort to improve the health status of our citizens and to improve our nation's system of health care. For blacks, who are aware of the fact that, compared to whites, their lives are shorter, their pregnant mothers and their infants die more frequently, and they have a greater burden of illness and disability, the statement that the United States has the best system of medical care in the world has a hollow ring.●

NATIONAL NURSING HOMES RESIDENTS DAY

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, as a cosponsor of House Joint Resolution 457, which would establish April 27, 1984, as "National Nursing Homes Residents Day," I rise to urge favorable consideration of this legislation which was introduced by the distinguished former chairman of the House Select Committee on Aging, CLAUDE PEPPER.

As an original member of the House Select Committee on Aging, I think it is only appropriate that we take time out today to pay tribute to those 1½ million older Americans who reside in nursing homes across the country. These very special citizens have contributed and continue to contribute to the growth, development, and progress of this great Nation, and as elders, offer a wealth of knowledge and experience.

A look at the demographic changes which confront this Nation today and in the coming decades amply demonstrate that we must consider fundamental changes in our health care systems if we are to protect these vital services for all elderly Americans. The over-65 population is growing at a phenomenal rate and will comprise 14 percent of our total population by the year 2000. By 2080, there will be more than 18 million Americans over 85, representing 24 percent of the over 65 population. The combined age groups of 75–84 and over 85, which are now 40 percent of our older population, will represent more than half of this same age group by the year 2040.

We can be grateful that conditions in nursing homes have improved so dramatically as a result of the strengthening of inspection standards in those nursing homes reimbursed by medicare and medicaid. There was a time not too long ago when conditions inside nursing homes were nothing short of horror stories. We can be happy that as a result of action taken here in Congress these days are past.

The establishment of a National Nursing Home Residents Day will serve as an effort to reintegrate these valuable elderly citizens into their communities by encouraging community recognition of and involvement in the lives of nursing residents. This day would also serve to educate the community about the needs and special contributions of these frail elderly and disabled residents.

I was proud to join with my colleagues in cosponsoring this important resolution. At this time I would like to take time to recognize a member of private sector who played a key role in encouraging support for this measure. Mr. Vic Rosenthal, executive director, of the Coalition of Institutionalized Aged and Disabled, has for many years been a strong and loyal supporter of programs benefiting the elderly. He has on many occasions provided valuable assistance to me in my congressional district as I strive to improve life for our Nation's senior citizens. Because of his intense involvement in this campaign to provide for a special day for nursing home residents, House Joint Resolution 457 has achieved more than the needed number of cosponsors—and a near 100 percent from the New York delegation.

The House is taking a very important step in taking into consideration this resolution which would recognize nursing home residents in America.●

A TRIBUTE TO THE FIFTH GRADE CLASS OF HUNTINGTON WOODS ELEMENTARY SCHOOL

HON. HAROLD S. SAWYER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, as you know, being a Member of Congress entails many responsibilities, long hours of hard work, and often, a great deal of frustration.

But every once in a while, you receive a phone call, a letter or experience something personally that reminds one of the honor and the privilege of serving the 513,000 individuals whom you represent.

I recently received such a letter, and it brought such an overall good feeling that I thought I would share it with you.

This letter was addressed to the Statue of Liberty—Ellis Island Foundation. It begins:

DEAR FRIENDS: The enclosed money is a contribution from our school to help restore the Statue of Liberty. We fifth graders organized and conducted a second-best sale. All the students in the school, kindergarten through sixth grades, brought in good used toys, books, games and other things. The total amount we earned on this sale was $120.77. Our Parent Teacher Organization contributed an additional $200.00 which gave us the amount we have sent to you, $320.77.

We understand that our name will be entered in the Register of School Contributions to be displayed at the museum of the statue. We would appreciate having the entry read: Huntington Woods Elementary School, Wyoming Public Schools, Wyoming, Mich.

Due to declining enrollment, our building is being closed at the end of this school year. It will mean a great deal to all of us at Huntington Woods to have our building's name listed, as well as the name of the school system.

The money is a small amount compared to the $230 million needed. But we know it will help. We had a good time earning the money, and are grateful to our P.T.O. for helping us, also.

Sincerely,

THE FIFTH GRADERS,
Huntington Woods Elementary School.

I would like, if I may, to list these individuals who, as young as they are, understand and appreciate the symbolism and meaning behind our grand lady, the Statue of Liberty. I am deeply proud and honored to have them as a part of our community, and thank them for making my job all the more worthwhile.

They are as follows:

LOIS WINDHORST: A REMARKABLE WOMAN OF TOTAL DEDICATION AND DEEP COMMITMENT

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, motorists in Kentucky enjoy greater protection against drunk drivers now, thanks to a stiff drunk driving law passed by the 1984 Kentucky General Assembly in substantial part due to the courageous and untiring efforts of Mrs. Lois Windhorst, president of the Kentucky Mothers Against Drunk Driving (MADD).

For the past 3 years, Lois Windhorst has been the driving force behind the welcome crackdown on drunk drivers in Kentucky. As president and founder of the local chapter in Kentucky—a responsibility she assumed after the death of her in-laws in 1980 at the hands of a drunk driver—Mrs. Windhorst has done an extraordinary job of focusing our communities' and our Commonwealth's attention on the tragedy of drunk driving.

Lois has increased community awareness of this national menace and she has been an effective grassroots lobbyist in seeking and getting needed changes in Kentucky drunk driving statutes.

At all times, it has been a demanding and tiring effort for Mrs. Windhorst and her organization. She had to curtail personal and family activities to attend to her duties at the helm of MADD.

It is no wonder to me that Lois is now stepping down from her leadership role in order to devote more time to herself and her family who have personally sacrificed much to support her in her work.

I have had the privilege of working with Lois Windhorst over the years, and have found her to be a remarkable woman of total dedication and deep commitment. In many ways I hate to see Lois leave an active leadership role in MADD, but she is entitled to a respite from her noble efforts.

She certainly can take with her into her retirement the satisfaction and pleasure of knowing that she has helped place laws on the books which make Kentucky highways and streets safer for all of us. That is a worthy and significant legacy to leave to her successor in MADD and to all of us.

I extend my thanks and congratulations to Lois for her efforts over the years and I wish her family the very best.

I insert the following article on Mrs. Windhorst, which appeared in the Louisville Courier-Journal on April 8 in the RECORD in its entirety at this point:

[From the Courier-Journal, Apr. 8, 1984]

DRIVING FORCE IN MADD IS GIVING UP LEADERSHIP, BUT WILL "ALWAYS BE THERE"

(By Elinor J. Brecher)

A prominent Jefferson County Democrat, apparently assuming Lois Windhorst would want to parlay her wide recognition into political office, recently told the outgoing Mothers Against Drunk Drivers president she had a bright future.

"Yes," replied Mrs. Windhorst, who founded Kentucky's first MADD chapter in 1981, "a bright future in my kitchen."

After 3 years of struggling for a tougher drunken-driving law, passed in the 1984 Kentucky General Assembly, Mrs. Windhorst, 30, is headed home.

One of the more successful grassroots lobbyists to work the legislature recently, Mrs. Windhorst said it's time others take over what she started 16 months after the deaths of her in-laws on Father's Day 1980.

That day, Ollie and Francis Windhorst were killed in a wreck with an unlicensed, uninsured drunken driver. One of their three sons was severely injured.

Mrs. Windhorst said even though she's relinquishing her leadership position, she'll "always be there, but at my pace."

Mrs. Windhorst said Louisville MADD began as her effort to "do something positive" about her in-laws' deaths. "Then it became something for my husband and my kids and the family. Then it was grasping at the hope of saving other people."

She said she never believed MADD "would get this far. My goal was to get 20 people at that first meeting."

But 140 showed up: victims, sympathetic citizens and grieving survivors, who she intends to continue helping. She'll also continue advising new Kentucky chapters and acting in a liaison role with the national MADD board, a nomination to which she declined last week.

In explaining that decision to Candy Lightner, the California woman who started the group after her daughter was killed by a drunken driver, Mrs. Windhorst cited pressure at home and anxiety attacks that have plagued her for two years.

Daughters Hollie, 7, Bobbie Anne, 6, and Tiffanie, 4, have been asking, "Mommy, when are you going to quit your job with MADD?" and telling her to get off the phone, which rings all day long.

Mrs. Windhorst said the death of a son several days after his premature birth in October 1982; the parole a month later of the man convicted in her in-laws' deaths, who served only 14 months of a 9-year sentence for manslaughter and wanton endangerment; and a frantic schedule on behalf of MADD and former Gov. John Y. Brown Jr's. drunken-driving task force, combined to cause the anxiety attacks.

"It all added up," she said. "And I realized there was nothing I could do that would take away the hurt from the victims. I kept seeing myself in them over and over. I guess I never had a chance to heal."

Sometimes she found herself taking heat from disgruntled MADD members and combative legislators at the same time, which made her feel "like a puppet with its feet in two blocks of cement and 105 strings on each arm with people pulling on them."

But she said she learned important political lessons from two sessions at the Capitol, much of the time spent battling people who claimed to be friends of the "Slammer Bill," as well as with its opponents:

"Never take anything for granted. No matter how right the cause is, it won't ever be easy. And never trust a politician. They don't even trust each other."

She said she also discovered that successful lobbying "means beating your head against the wall till you have no brains left," but she believes the results were worth the effort.

A major feature of the new law, which takes effect in July, is that it gives judges the option of jailing first offenders, as well as fining them. It also mandates a license suspension for 30 days with treatment and education (6 months without) and mandates jail for repeat offenders.

Mrs. Windhorst said she supports the consistency of enforcement the new law will bring and is convinced it will keep drunks off the road.

But she still favors mandatory jail on first offense and thinks the law falls short in part because it doesn't meet the requirements that would have brought federal money for state enforcement.

The law finally passed, she thinks, because of public support and "the fact that we kept our emotions pretty much in check on a highly emotional issue. We had our facts straight and we had documentation for all our arguments. . . . We didn't do any wining and dining. We meant business and were never treated with anything but respect."

Mrs. Windhorst credits her husband, Ollie Jr., an electrical contractor, and her mother, Nova Hensley, with making her successes possible, by taking over many family chores.

"The cause was a good one," said Windhorst, who didn't become directly involved in MADD. "My helping her was my way of contributing to the community."

He said the hardest part of his wife's commitment was "listening to the other victims' stories, and there was a constant flow of that."

Mrs. Windhorst said MADD now plans to monitor compliance with the new law statewide because "there will be loopholes and we want to find out what they are and be ready to shut the door on them in 1986."

Despite the bill's passage, Mrs. Windhorst said there are disappointments. Few volunteers are willing to spend the time it takes to monitor Jefferson County's courts, and the sentences for drunken drivers who kill or injure aren't severe enough.

She hopes someone will start a "judge watch" in Kentucky, part of a nationwide effort to monitor all sentencing by the National Organization of Victim Assistance, or NOVA, based in Washington, D.C.

POLISH CONSTITUTION DAY

HON. BARBARA MIKULSKI

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Speaker, I want to pay tribute to Polish Constitution Day, the anniversary of which falls on May 3. On May 3, 1791, Poland adopted a new and progressive constitution which embodied the great ideas of democracy, justice, and freedom. In fact, many of the ideals represented in this constitution are also essential components of America's Constitution, principles which we cherish today. Free Poles throughout the world continue to celebrate Polish Constitution Day. It is an important reminder that Poland was one of the first pioneers of progressive thought in Europe. It is a bitter fact of history that although the Polish people have cherished freedom, tyrannical neighbors and leaders have made Polish liberty more a dream than a reality.

Through the long history of the United States, freedom-loving Polish immigrants have contributed their skill and hard work to make this country great. They have actively worked for our Nation's freedom and have defended it on battlefields since it was born.

Today, when we honor Polish Americans in history who have made great contributions to our Nation and our world, we quite appropriately look toward two great American war heroes, Thaddeus Kosciuski and Casimir Pulaski. While it is vital to recognize the crucial accomplishments of these two brave and dedicated men, I feel that we should not overlook the work of many other great Poles. For example, Madam Curie performed landmark research on radiation from which even today people around the world derive enormous benefits. Madam Curie holds the remarkable honor of being the only physicist in history to receive two Nobel Prizes.

Second, we should not forget Dr. Marie Zakrzewska, a Polish American of the 19th century who was one of the first women physicians in the United States. Despite enormous obstacles, she established two outstanding hospitals in the United States and helped to establish a third. Finally, I want to pay tribute to the great accomplishments of all of the Polish nuns and priests in America who played such an important role in teaching us about the old world in Poland while at the same time preparing us to be good citizens in our new home.

In spite of the invasions and occupations of the Polish nation through history, the spirit of the Polish people remains strong. Although our homeland remains under the shadow of Soviet domination, the Polish people still commemorate the Polish Constitution and honor the rich contributions of Poles around the world. It is my hope that the great principles of freedom and democracy embodied in the Polish Constitution will in the near future become not just a dream but a reality of Polish soil.●

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. ROBERT E. WISE, JR.

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker, last Thursday, because my presence was required at a black lung advisory meeting in my district, I missed rollcall Nos. 104, 105, and 106.

Had I been present, I would have voted "Aye" on rollcall No. 104, "No" on rollcall No. 105, and "Aye" on rollcall No. 106.●

A SELF-MADE MAN

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to address the House about an owner of a fine small business in Greater Cleveland. John R. Leone represents what America is about: he is a self-made man.

John has been involved with the construction industry all his life. This year he celebrates his 30th year in business. President of the Leone Corp., he was elected its chief executive officer in 1970. Previously, Mr. Leone was vice president and general manager of this corporation. He began his business career in 1953 with this company, then called the L. Leone Trucking Co., Inc. As its chief executive officer, he worked toward the diversification of this company and established four divisions which were instrumental in surviving the poor economy of the past 2 years. Subsequently, the company was a builder of highways.

Born, raised, and educated on the West Side of Cleveland, Leone donated many hours to civic projects in the city of Cleveland going back to the year 1970 and including the Rapid Recovery Group. Among other activities, John is a long-time member of the Tremont Civic Organization and a trustee of the Clark-Metro Neighborhood Improvement Group which involved the rebuilding of neighborhoods.

Active in the small business community and a member of the Greater Cleveland Growth Association and the Council of Small Business Enterprises, Leone was appointed a delegate to the White House Conference on Small Business by President Carter in 1980. Real estate development is a major part of Leone's career, and he has been quite successful.

Some of his other activities include president and cofounder of the United Trucking Association, an industry group; executive secretary and trustee to the Local 436 Welfare and Pension Fund Board of Trustees for 16 years; chairman of the Legislation and Resolution Committee, Cleveland Chapter of the Ohio Contractors Association for 2 years and the current chairman of the Cleveland chapter.

Truly, John Leone is a great American, a fine civic leader, and an outstanding business man.●

HON. BERNARD J. DWYER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 30, 1984

● Mr. DWYER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, it is both with pride and sorrow that I join my colleagues in commemorating the Days of Remembrance of the Victims of the Holocaust. This commemoration serves as a constant reminder to all freedom loving nations that human rights violations must never go unchallenged.

The world must never forget the unspeakable crimes committed against the Jewish people. Over 6 million innocent Jewish men, women, and children were slaughtered during World War II. It is imperative that we pay tribute to those who have died and have suffered immeasurably. The Jews who have survived the Holocaust were subject to a multitude of physical and psychological abuses at the hands of the Nazis. With this in mind, I urge all persons to reflect on and remember the lessons of the Holocaust.

As we consider this terrible atrocity, let us challenge violations of human rights wherever and whenever they occur. As representatives in the free world, it is up to us to challenge the policies of authoritarian and totalitarian regimes that have led to direct aggression and the enslavement of nations. We must offer hope to those seeking control of their destiny.

The memory of the millions of innocent human beings who perished at the hands of the Nazis will live forever in the hearts and minds of those who cherish individual freedom.●

FTC DISCONTINUES COSTLY AND INEFFECTIVE LINE OF BUSINESS PROGRAM

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Speaker, recently the Federal Trade Commission wisely voted to discontinue the line of business program. After extensive public comment and lengthy internal review, the Commission determined that the line of business program did not yield the benefits it was designed to generate, and, in fact, was quite costly to industry.

The Commission's line of business program collected detailed sales, profitability, expense and asset data from hundreds of the Nation's largest corporations. As originally envisioned, the program was to provide financial data, which was industry specific, for use by business planners, private investors, academic researchers, and antitrust enforcement agencies.

The Commission's review of this program clearly established that the program's goals were not being realized. The accumulated data was not significantly utilized in either case selection for antitrust enforcement or for purposes of business planning or investment. Moreover, the data is antiquated—the data collected for 1977 has yet to be published. Further, in terms of financial impact, it has been estimated that the compliance cost to the subject firms exceeded $40 million annually.

The line of business program has had a controversial history since its inception in 1974. It has been the subject of extensive litigation, as to the Commission's authority to collect such information, and legislation, dealing with industry concern over the confidentiality of sensitive financial information that is supplied.

Given the negative conclusion of the Commission's review, I heartily applaud the Commission's decision to discontinue the line of business program. Instead of ignoring the clear signals that this program was not utilized and was overly burdensome, the Commission had the wisdom and foresight to take this important step.●

A TRIBUTE TO JUDGE GILBERT "RUDY" RUIZ

HON. MATTHEW G. MARTINEZ

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Speaker, at a time when we all wonder if the admirable quality of putting compassion and duty toward our fellow man above our own concerns has all but faded away, I find it inspiring to honor a citizen of the 30th district of California who has exemplified this quality and is stepping down from just one of his positions of honor and respect.

Judge Gilbert "Rudy" Ruiz is resigning from the East Los Angeles Boys and Girls Club board of directors after 11 years of distinguished service and after twice being elected president of that board. He has unselfishly given his time to this organization to better the lives of the boys and girls of East Los Angeles and has provided a superior role model for everyone with whom he has worked.

This position will join the long list as just one of the worthy organizations with which Judge Ruiz has worked. He has been active in such community organizations as the Mexican-American Bar Association and the Montebello-Ensenada Mexico Sister City Association. Judge Ruiz has been president of the Belvedere Rotary Club, chairman of the Hispanic Alumni Association of Whittier College, and chairman of other narcotics prevention projects. Few people can boast of such a diverse history of community service.

I would like to take this opportunity to bring this remarkable and eminent citizen of my community to the attention of my fellow Members of Congress, and to personally thank him for his diligent work in community service.●

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF NEGRO WOMEN SECTION OF THE ORANGES HOLDS ANNUAL SPRING EVENT

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to call my colleagues' attention to the annual spring luncheon and fashion show sponsored by the National Council of Negro Women, Inc., Section of the Oranges.

The event will take place on May 5 in West Orange, N.J., and has as its theme: "Dedication, Compassion, and Caring For One." These three words certainly apply to this organization. The section has been involved with numerous charitable activities in our local community, including the Toy Bureau of the Oranges and Maplewood, which provides new toys and Christmas stockings for indigent children. In addition, the section has been working on the pressing problems of adult literacy and teenage pregnancy.

At this annual fundraising luncheon, the section will pay tribute to one of the founding members of the National Council of Negro Women, Miss Garnette Henderson. Miss Henderson played an active role in founding the organization in 1935, and also served as the fourth president of the New Jersey chapter and the first president of the section of the Oranges. She will be honored by her colleagues for her part in the development of the national organization as well as the local chapter.

The National Council of Negro Women works for equal opportunity for all, and it is a special privilege for me to pay tribute to them today. I offer my best wishes to Miss Henderson and all of the participants in Saturday's event.●

A SALUTE TO CHIEF KENNETH J. CRAST

HON. GEORGE C. WORTLEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. WORTLEY. Mr. Speaker, this coming Sunday, May 6, 1984, at Hancock Field, the Air Force base in my congressional district of New York State, Chief M. Sgt. Kenneth J. Crast will retire from the Air National Guard after a distinguished military career of 39 years, 4 months and 5 days.

It is a signal honor for me to bring the occasion of this event to the attention of the Congress.

Chief Crast began his dedicated service to our country in the Army Air Corps on July 7, 1942, during World War II.

During that war, he was a flight engineer and gunner on a B-17 Flying Fortress. On September 13, 1944, while flying on a mission over Germany, he and fellow crew members were shot down and captured by the enemy. After 8 months as a prisoner of war and several unsuccessful escape attempts, Chief Crast and a fellow prisoner managed to escape confinement and successfully elude the Nazis.

During the Berlin crisis, Chief Crast was reactivated and served in France.

His many decorations for bravery in World War II and other service include the Air Medal with two oak leaf clusters and the Purple Heart.

In July 1948, when the 174th New York Air National Guard unit was in its infancy at Hancock Field, Chief Crast joined the unit as a full-time air technician.

Since that time, over a period of 35 years, Chief Crast's contributions to the 174th Tactical Fighter Wing have been consistently outstanding.

According to Brig. Gen. Paul A. Schempp, the commander of the 174th, the chief's "sense of duty, professionalism and dedication to excellence have been an inspiration and example for all to emulate."

The selection of the 174th as the best aircraft maintenance squadron in the U.S. Air Force, in 1982, is due, in large part, to the efforts of Chief Crast. With varied responsibilities, including that as squadron training noncommissioned officer and chief enlisted maintenance superintendent, the chief has played a key role in making the 174th the premier unit of its type in the Tactical Air Force.

Chief Crast's superior skills have kept America's combat aircraft flying for nearly four decades, from the P-47 Thunderbolt of World War II to the awesome A-10 Thunderbolt II of today's tactical force.

Mr. Speaker, the American people, whom the Members of this Congress represent, have been well served by the faithful dedication of Chief M. Sgt. Kenneth J. Crast.●

KEN PITTS, OUTGOING PRESIDENT OF LONG BEACH JAYCEES, TO BE HONORED

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, on May 5 the Long Beach Junior Chamber of Commerce will hold its 53d annual installation dinner. As I am sure you are aware, the Jaycees' membership is comprised of young men between 21 and 35 who are committed to its political, civic, and charitable goals. Their motto, "Service to humanity is the best work of life," has certainly been exemplified by the dedication of the outgoing president, Ken Pitts.

Ken was born November 18, 1950, in Compton, Calif. He attended Compton Junior College and graduated from Long Beach State in 1973 with a degree in journalism. Following graduation, he entered the sales and sales management field. By the age of 30, he was the youngest regional sales manager ever in industrial sales. He supervised 31 salespersons in 13 States for Armac Tape, later American Tape. At this time, he was also accepted in Who's Who in California. Not one to rest on his laurels, in 1983 he personally was responsible for over $2.5 million in sales.

His success in the business field is matched by his accomplishments with the Jaycees. He served as State director from 1982 to 1983 and as president of the Long Beach organization in 1983-84. Currently, he is a candidate for metro vice president for the California State Jaycees.

Nor is the Jaycees the only community organization to which he devotes his efforts. He has served on the Board of Directors of the Long Beach Area Chamber of Commerce and was a candidate for the Special Olympics Boosters contest in 1983.

Ken has achieved much and given much to his community. I am confident the Long Beach Jaycees will continue to benefit from his support, as will Long Beach. My wife, Lee, joins me in wishing Ken and his wife, Rita, continued success in the years ahead.●

PASSAGE OF THE CHILD PASSENGER—SAFETY ACT OF 1984

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the House of Representatives unanimously passed H.R. 4616, the Child Passenger Safety Act of 1984, which directs States to use at least 8 percent of their Federal highway funds for additional highway safety programs concerning child passenger-restraint safety devices.

I heartily applaud the intent of the legislation and the action of the House in this area.

Child passenger-restraint safety seats protect lives; the facts prove it. Child safety seat usage could be up to 90-percent effective in preventing fatalities and injuries, but less than 1 out of every 12 children who are passengers in automobiles are given the protection of a restraint system. The young child between the ages of 1 and 4 is 50 times more likely to die in a car accident if unprotected by a car safety seat or seatbelt, than from some illness or disease.

It is hard for me to comprehend the fact that in the last decade 10,000 children under 5 lost their lives as passengers in cars, yet more than 90 percent of our children still ride without using safety restraints. That is why State programs, prompted by this act, are so necessary to promote the use of the child safety seat.

I have been active for many years in Pennsylvania in the cause of promoting safety seat usage. In 1982, as the State senator from Dauphin County in Pennsylvania, I was able to lead the legislative efforts in the General Assembly of Pennsylvania to acquire a child safety seat law. Now, as the Congressman from Pennsylvania's 17th District, I pledge my support to urge all 50 States to enact child safety seat legislation and promote passenger safety programs.●

APRIL 24: A DAY OF REMEMBRANCE FOR ARMENIANS

HON. MATTHEW G. MARTINEZ

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Speaker, on April 24 in the city of Montebello, in my district, Armenian people from all over California and over the Nation will come together in a day of remembrance. They will join hands and hearts at the base of a monument built to commemorate the memory of the Armenian men, women, and children who, on April 24, 1915, were the world's first genocide victims.

This deplorable action of mass murder by the Ottoman (Turkish) Empire must be remembered in order to prevent such occurrences in the future. It can never be assumed that genocide will not occur in this century. It is no secret that Hitler pointed to the Turkish example when he began the mass extermination of Germany's Jewish population. He answered his critics, who cautioned him against such a policy because it would alienate world opinion, by saying that the world had no opinion when the Turks eliminated the Armenians.

There is a great need for the Armenian people to remember these historical crimes against a peaceful people, because we all share the responsibility for allowing such events to slip into obscurity and be disregarded or forgotten. To remember will hopefully prevent another Hitler or ruthless dictator from implementing a policy of genocide.

Today, the Armenian people believe that the Turkish Government not only refuses to come to terms with its past, but insists on distorting this truth by closing access to its archives, fabricating data, and pressuring other countries into denouncing the occurrence of the genocide of the Armenian people.

As a nation with a longstanding commitment to truth, liberty, and justice, the United States should insist on having Turkey recognize history for what it is and open dialog with representatives of the Armenian community in the diaspora.

By supporting House Joint Resolution 247, the U.S. Congress will not only set April 24 as a day of remembrance of man's inhumanity to man, we will show that our strength and determination is to be used to prevent another future tragedy such as the Armenian genocide. It is not a foreign policy issue, as the State Department might have us believe. It is a recognition of world history and a pledge that we can learn from the past experiences of others. Congress should join the people of Montebello and Armenians from around the Nation in remembering April 24 as a tragic day in world history.●

THE KID FROM RED BANK

HON. JAMES J. HOWARD

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, Monmouth County, N.J., has been the home and birthplace of many extraordinary individuals. But no one has generated more pride and enthusiasm than Count Basie, who was born in Red Bank, N.J., 79 years ago.

The "Count" died Thursday and the entire country is mourning the loss of one of our greatest pianists and band leaders. In Monmouth County, we feel the loss of a favorate son loved and admired by everyone.

Count Basie's skill at the keyboard and feel for his audience were matched only by his qualities of kindness and concern for others. He was a "class act" in every way.

The following editorial reprinted from The Sunday Register, Shrewsbury, N.J., conveys a sense of what Count Basie meant to the people of the Third Congressional District:

WILLIAM "COUNT" BASIE

The death of Count Basie robs American music of one of its giants, a gifted pianist and band leader who revolutionized jazz, influenced some of the finest musicians of his time, and delighted millions with the sound of swing.

He took his first piano lessons in Red Bank, where he was born William James Basie 79 years ago, practicing—only because his mother forced him to, he said—on an old oak piano in the basement of the Mechanic Street house where he grew up.

From his first professional appearance in a Jersey shore restaurant, he went on to play the Harlem clubs in the '20s, and then toured the black vaudeville circuit. The tour took him to Kansas City, where he joined the famous Bennie Moten band. When Moten died in 1935, Count Basie formed his own band, which soon won wide acclaim and devoted fans, and over the years included some of the greatest jazz musicians. Despite the diminishing health of his last few years, the Count never stopped being on tour—he had performed in California last month and had several concerts scheduled for May. When arthritis made it difficult for him to walk, he would drive on stage on a motorized scooter, sometimes honking his horn with gleeful enthusiasm, as he did at a concert in Marlboro Township two-and-a-half years ago.

The Count is Red Bank's claim to royalty. His was the first American band to play a command performance for the queen of England; he played for presidents and was awarded the highest honor this nation bestows on performing artists. But he never forgot the borough of his birth and boyhood. "The kid from Red Bank" was a nickname he relished, and he made the borough known throughout the world of music as Count Basie's hometown. Last April, although grieving for the death of his wife only 10 days earlier, he returned to Red Bank to pay a benefit concert for the educational youth center of the Shrewsbury Avenue A.M.E. Zion Church, as he had done four years earlier. His voice soft with emotion, he told the hushed crowd, "I just couldn't miss being here with you. You don't know what a pleasure it is to be back home again."

Count Basie's mark is indelible; Basie hits have become American classics. It is sad that the borough he made famous has been so slow to pay official tribute to its famous son. It was not until last month, when the Borough Council voted to rename Memorial Field "Count Basie Park" that there was any move to acknowlege his accomplishments. We believe the planned honor too meager. We repeat our urging that consideration be given to naming one of Red Bank's schools for the man who established a standard of excellence in American music.●

A TRIBUTE TO OFFICER RANDY LYMAN

HON. MEL LEVINE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in recognition of Officer Randy Lyman, whose brave and expert performance on board the Redondo Beach Harbor patrol boat recently saved the life of Mr. Leonard Alfonso.

On Saturday, March 10, 1984, a large wave broke over the breakwall in Redondo Beach Harbor causing two people to be washed off the wall and thrown into the water. The Harbor Patrol, with Lt. William Wheeler at the helm and Officer Randy Lyman as second officer immediately responded to the call, but when Mr. Alfonso was taken aboard he was unconscious, with no pulse and was not breathing. Officer Lyman, with the assistance of a citizen, administered CPR to Mr. Alfonso as he was transported to the Harbor Patrol docks. During that time, Mr. Alfonso's breathing and pulse were restored. He was then transported to South Bay Hospital by the paramedics where he was listed in critical condition.

I am pleased to report that Mr. Alfonso has been released from South Bay Hospital and has fully recovered. Had it not been for the professional administration of CPR, Mr. Alfonso would not be alive today.

I would like to ask my colleagues to join me in commending Officer Lyman for a job well done. His quick and competent performance of his duties enabled him to save this citizen, and I am proud to know that men like him are serving the citizens of Redondo Beach, Calif.●

OPM RESTRICTS FEDERAL WORKERS POLITICAL ACTIVITY

HON. WILLIAM D. FORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, April 24, 1984, the Office of Personnel Management (OPM) published final regulations which prohibit the use by Federal employees of voluntary payroll deductions for contributions to political funds of nonparty affiliated organizations. I believe these regulations exceed OPM's authority, conflict with current law, and are bad public policy.

No Federal employee would be exposed to partisan political pressure in his workplace, to coercion or reprisal on political grounds because of his or her contributions through payroll deductions to a political fund unaffiliated with any political party. Unlike direct contributions to parties and candidates, which are permitted by the Federal Election Campaign Act, such contributions would not be required by law to be a matter of public record subject to the scrutiny of superiors and "others in a position to affect careers or working conditions." Payroll deductions could be kept confidential.

OPM's only real policy purpose is to limit the freedom of Federal employees to organize and work together to support common political goals. It is understandable, but unacceptable, that an administration that has waged war against its employees would seek to stifle their legitimate political activity.

Mr. Speaker, OPM has not adequately responded to the objections I raised in February 1983, together with the chairmen of the House Committee on the Judiciary and House Administration. A statement of our objections appeared in the RECORD on February 22, 1983, and I refer my colleagues to that statement again.

I am afraid that Federal employees will once more be forced to resort to the courts to secure rights which Congress and the Constitution have granted, but which Director Devine and the Office of Personnel Management seek to strip away.●

THE STARS REALLY ARE "STARS"

HON. BILL CHAPPELL, JR.

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. CHAPPELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a moment to share with my colleagues a few words about a basketball team within my district who displayed superior athletic performance throughout the basketball season.

Jacksonville is proud these days—proud of the athletic achievements made by "The Stars," Florida Junior College's (FJC) basketball team. And proud they should be, because for 2 out of the last 3 years "The Stars" have made it to the State Junior College basketball tournament. In addition, they were regular season champions in the mid-Florida conference and rated the second best junior college basketball team in the State of Florida.

"The Stars" exemplify the cliche that "nothing is impossible" particularly when so actively pursued. With the steering of FJC's basketball coach

Arthur (Buster) Harvey, the team set their goals and then went on to accomplish them.

Although "The Stars" season ended with disappointment in the final championship game, they walked away, nonetheless, proud of what they had accomplished.

Friends, it gives me great pride to acknowledge the accomplishments of this team, Coach Harvey, and FJC President Ben Wygal for their display of spirit in true American competition.●

FAIRVIEW STATE HOSPITAL

HON. ROBERT E. BADHAM

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. BADHAM. Mr. Speaker, Fairview State Hospital in Costa Mesa, Calif., will be celebrating its silver anniversary on May 28. To mark their 25 years of service to the community they are going to embark on a "Silver Challenge."

Fairview State Hospital opened its doors to serve the needs of the developmentally disabled on January 4, 1959. Since that time, the dedicated staff has served more than 6,000 clients with 1,150 living at the facility today. Of the 6,000 persons housed at Fairview, some have returned to their homes and some developed the necessary skills to live semi-independent lives in the community of their choice.

However, after 25 years Fairview is beginning to show the wear and tear. The "Silver Challenge" is a renewal of effort and commitment to bring the environment at Fairview up to standards that show respect for its clients, their families, and those who work at the facility. The challenge is to find ways with the assistance of the community to get Fairview in topnotch shape for the years ahead.

The "Silver Challenge" is a community celebration of Fairview's continuing contribution to society. I congratulate and commend all those involved with Fairview State Hospital and wish them nothing but success and happiness in the years ahead.●

ACID RAIN: SULFUR DIOXIDE MAY NOT BE THE VILLAIN

HON. MARILYN LLOYD

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to bring to the attention of my colleages some recent statements made by the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, William Ruckelshaus, regarding the causes of acid rain and the status of our current knowledge of this phenomena. While testifying before the Energy and Commerce Committee's Subcommittee on Health and the Environment, he stated:

Our current knowledge does not tell us whether the offending pollutants (which cause acid rain) are sulfates, nitrates, oxidants, or heavy metals. This new information, while troubling, raises the possibility that if we act too quickly, we may control the wrong pollutant. If, as many believe, sulfate deposition is not a major contributor to forest problems but oxidants and nitrates are, a significant reduction in sulfur dioxide emissions could inadvertently result in elevated levels of oxidants or nitrates * * *.

Mr. Speaker, it is remarkable that given the importance of this subject, this is the first time that the complex chemical aspect of acid rain has received attention. It has been characteristic of the debate on this controversial issue that these scientific facts have been virtually ignored by the press to the extent that the public has been subjected to a purely visceral discussion. There are, of course, those parties interested in this issue who would prefer unilateral controls on specific chemical compounds no matter what the scientific facts suggest. The fact that sulfur dioxide may not be the chemical villain is a fact which they prefer to ignore, and the fact that SO_2 may even have a benign effect by reducing oxidant levels is something that they would apparently prefer to suppress. The EPA Administrator's statement confirms the information which I have received through correspondence and discussions with distinguished scientists who are participating in the Federal acid precipitation research effort which involves uniquely capable teams at our national laboratories.

In attempting to determine the effects of acid rain on forests in particular, there is by no means unequivocal evidence to support the current claims of those who believe that sulfates are the major cause of tree diebacks. On the contrary, conclusive evidence linking acid rain to diebacks has not been found. Even in what is possibly a worst case example, the German Black Forest for which the damage to the trees quadrupled between 1982 and 1983, scientists are contending that ozone formation leading to oxidant production is the more likely major cause of the damage.

We do know that, given the complicated atmospheric processes which occur, attempting to single out one type of pollutant, such as the sulfur oxides, as the cause of forest damage would be difficult, if not impossible. Even in the Black Forest area, research has shown that the rate of decline of the trees is not equivalent for the various species affected, nor is it uniform across the affected regions. Ozone, sulfur dioxide, nitrogen oxides, fluoride, hydrogen chloride, and trace metals, among others, can cause serious damage to crops and forests and cannot be considered separately from acid rain as solitary causes of damage. It is obvious that our lack of knowledge of the various interactions constituting the complex chemistry, as well as air transport and deposition phenomena in determining species concentrations, have hindered our efforts to identify the causes and effects of acid rain. Indeed, there is some question as to whether the impact of the previously mentioned chemical species can even be separately delineated from other pollutant effects.

For these reasons, it is imperative that we augment our efforts to improve our scientific knowledge through continuing research before regulating specific pollutants which may or may not be a direct cause of acid deposition. In concert with our cause-and-effect research efforts, we should continue to aggressively pursue our development of control technologies so that a genuine range of options will be available beyond today's wet scrubbers. When research ultimately provides us with clarification of these complex interactions and related phenomena with a delineation of the role of the major pollutants, we shall then be prepared to take the necessary control action.●

"ADAM"

HON. BOB McEWEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Speaker, last night the movie "Adam" was aired for the second time. The tragic story of a courageous family gripped the Nation and focused our attention on the problem of missing children.

The first half of the movie deals with the actual circumstances of an abducted child, the long search, and the tragic news of Adam's death. The second part of the program focuses on us and what Congress and the Federal Government can and must do to address this national tragedy.

Every time that we call attention to the problem of missing children by recognizing a missing children's day, or by sponsoring a child safety day in our districts, or by supporting local, State, and Federal efforts to help find missing children or prevent their abduction, we make this country more secure for all our children.

I have introduced H.R. 4740. This legislation will conduct a national symposium on missing children, will disseminate information to citizens and agencies, and will make recommendations to the President and Congress. In addition, I plan on sponsoring a child safety day in the Sixth Congressional District of Ohio and encourage all of you to do the same. The ACTION Agency has provided an excellent handbook describing how to do this.

The Walsh's have used their personal tragedy to focus efforts on making this Nation safer for other children. Let us join them in this just cause.●

HOLOCAUST

HON. MAJOR R. OWENS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 30, 1984

● Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, today we remember the Holocaust. The immediate thought that comes to mind is Conrad's line, "The horror. The horror." However, there is another side to the Holocaust. There were untold numbers of victims and resisters who dared to defy the overwhelming military might of the Nazis. There were those who were safe, who put themselves at risk by hiding Jews, and other intended victims. In Denmark, a whole nation chose to wear the Star of David rather than identify, isolate and prepare their Jewish citizens for slaughter.

Looking back, what lessons can we learn from the horror and heroism that characterized the Nazi Holocaust? We can see that it is possible for many to be led by force and persuasion. We can see that it is physically possible to destroy vast numbers of human beings for no reason other than the accident of birth. We can also see that amidst the atrocities it is also possible for all that is good in human beings to survive and resist the evil that surrounds them. It is that goodness in people which survives as a living memorial to those who perished.

It is particularly important for us, as Members of Congress, to remember the Holocaust as an example of the power of government to direct the energies of a people in the path of hatred. The corresponding power to direct a people in the path of reconciliation and peace also exists. It is our responsibility to speak to that which is constructive and good in our people. To encourage and support efforts which bind our people together. Abraham Lincoln, in his second inaugural address, said:

> Let us strive to do all which will achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace among ourselves and among all nations.

The forces which bind and separate us may be different than they were in President Lincoln's time, but the goal should remain the same.

The Holocaust was a product of the most scientifically organized and systematic hatred that the world has ever experienced. The Holocaust was not a savage massacre committed by a small group in the isolation and stress of the battlefield. The Holocaust involved widespread systematic savagery facilitated by the industrial efficiency of one of the most educated nations of the world. Men and women with high IQ's and numerous credits for their technological achievements administered and implemented the Holocaust.

The America of 1984 should take heed. If and when we fail to use the power of our Government to direct the energies of our people in the path of reconciliation, peace, and charity, there is a great danger that they will succumb to behavior which leads to the path of hatred. High achievements in education, culture, and technology do not guarantee that a nation will pursue the proper path. Only the constant promotion of reconciliation, peace, and charity can save us. Let the Holocaust be a lesson to America and the whole world.●

TRIBUTE TO SYBIL BRAND

HON. HOWARD L. BERMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, May 8, 1984, on the occasion of her birthday, Sybil Brand will be honored by the Ann Mary Kelly Foundation for the Performing Arts. It is rare that I have the honor of recognizing a woman who has contributed so much of her time to the encouragement of others who is also a dear friend.

Sybil serves as one of two honorary chairmen of the foundation and has been instrumental in promoting its ideals and purposes over the past several years. She has worked selflessly to carry on the tradition started by the work of Ann Mary Kelly and John Augustus Kelly, Sr.

Sybil continues to support talented emerging performers in the Los Angeles area through her work at the foundation. The foundation's financial assistance to such performers enables them to pursue their work and also brings these dedicated artists to the public.

During the 10 years which I have known her, Sybil has not limited herself to promoting only those affiliated with the foundation. She has participated in a number of civic and philanthropic activities. I was honored to work with her as a State legislator on projects aimed at helping troubled youth.

For the years of dedication to emerging performers through her support of the foundation, and her extensive community involvement, I ask the Members to join the Ann Mary Kelly Foundation for the Performing Arts and myself in honoring Sybil Brand.●

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise to commend Herman Platt, a unique community leader in Los Angeles and a lifelong friend of mine and of my family, on the occasion of his 75th birthday. I would like to bring some of his accomplishments to the attention of my colleagues.

Herman Platt, one of Los Angeles' most prominent civic leaders, celebrates his 75th birthday May 7, 1984. One of the few members of his generation to be born in Los Angeles, he attended Los Angeles High School and graduated in 1931 from UCLA.

Herman Platt is a legend in the Jewish community of Los Angeles. Following in his father Ben's footsteps, he served as president of Sinai Temple and on its board of directors for more than 35 years. His chairmanship of Mt. Sinai Memorial Park since its inception 20 years ago has earned him the nickname "Digger Platt."

Platt and his wife of 37 years, Marjorie, this year endowed the Marjorie and Herman Platt Art Gallery at the University of Judaism. He was instrumental in raising the funds to build the west Los Angeles campus of the university. He is chairman of the Patron Society and he and Marjorie were honored by the university at a testimonial dinner held January 15, 1983, at the Beverly Hilton Hotel.

In 1972, Platt received the prestigious "Spirit of Life" award at a testimonial dinner held at the Beverly Hills Hotel, for his dedicated service to the City of Hope. He is also a trustee of the UCLA foundation.

Platt compensates for his one unfulfilled desire in life—to have been a prominent sportswriter—by editing the newsletter for Hillcrest Country Club, where he serves on the board of directors.

In business as well as community work, Herman Platt is recognized as an inspirational and tireless community leader. He has been president of Platt Music Corp., for the past 52 years, bringing the small chain of concession departments in the southern California May Co., stores to 107 department store branches, nationwide.

Platt has served the city of Torrance Chamber of Commerce for 18 years, where he was chairman of the Housing Task Force Committee.

But despite his lifetime of outstanding accomplishments, Herman Platt feels his most satisfying achievement is his large family of 5 children and 15 grandchildren.

It gives me great personal pleasure to honor this man whom I have known and respected for three decades—a true community leader and an outstanding human being.●

HHH CITES NATIONAL COUNCIL OF JEWISH WOMEN'S COURT-APPOINTED SPECIAL ADVOCATE INVOLVEMENT

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, the Greater Harrisburg, Pa., Section of the National Council of Jewish Women, in my district, deserves recognition in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The National Council of Jewish Women has received an award from the Department of Health and Human Services for its outstanding public service in advocating for children and in promoting volunteerism through the court appointed special advocates program. National Council President Barbara A. Mandel received the award on behalf of the organization.

Some 270,000 children in the United States are living in some form of substitute care. The court appointed special advocate volunteer's first responsibility is to the child—advocating for whatever is in the child's best interest, whether it be temporary care, return to the birth parents or placement in an adoptive home. A court-appointed special advocate volunteer investigates the circumstances surrounding a child abuse or neglect case, makes an evaluation, recommends to the court that further action is in the child's best interest, both immediately or in the long run, and monitors the case until permanent placement is achieved.

It should be noted that President Reagan has instructed the Department of Justice to fund the National Council of Juvenile and Family Court Judges to work with the National Council of Jewish Women and other cosponsors to spread court appointed special advocates to even more than the 250 jurisdictions currently served.

The National Council of Jewish Women's involvement with the special advocates program dates from 1979. Currently, the National Council of Jewish Women maintains 15 special advocates sites across the United States.

Established in 1893 the National Council of Jewish Women is America's oldest Jewish women's organization with more than 100,000 members in some 200 sections nationwide. The Greater Harrisburg, Pa., section of the National Council of Jewish Women was one of the first five NCJW sections nationally to initiate the court appointed special advocates program.●

WHAT IS LEADERSHIP?

HON. ROBERT H. MICHEL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, a few months ago I had the honor of participating in a meeting with students from my congressional district. The topic of that meeting was "What is Leadership." Three of those students have written prize-winning essays in the Everett McKinley Dirksen essay contest sponsored by the Dirksen Center in Pekin, Ill.

I would like to share with you the essays of R. Clark Hunt of the Washington Intermediate School, Jenny Spurlock of Broadmoor Intermediate, and Chad A. Reiman, Edison Intermediate School, all from Pekin, on the subject of leadership.

These young people had some nice remarks to make about me in their essays and I appreciate their kindness. But the reason I want to share their views with you is to give you some idea of how our young Americans are thinking about leadership for our country.

At this point I would like to insert those essays in the RECORD:

WHAT IS LEADERSHIP?

(By R. Clark Hunt)

Leadership, serving the people and keeping unity among them, is best achieved by having an understanding of the needs of those people being led.

Although the dictionary defines leadership as the act of leading or guiding, I found the word had as many meanings as the people I interviewed—a business leader, a teacher, and my parents.

My parents' thoughts about leadership were, "Qualities of leadership are having a goal, being committed to that goal, and planning to reach it. Showing how the goal meets the needs of people and caring and being committed to others are other leadership characteristics." My dad only had one important quality when he said, "Plan your work, and work your plan."

Mr. Dale Pauley, a former coach stated, "A leader is a servant to the people. Jesus was a servant to the people, and He was humble."

A business leader, Mr. Jim Rassi, listed seven leadership qualities. They are dependability, consistency, authoritativeness, perception, getting along with others, keeping unity among people, and understanding people. "A problem with some leaders is they don't stand out in the group, and others want to take over." He also told me that the most important quality is to have an understanding of the people you lead.

In the Jaycee Action Magazine for Leadership Training was a checklist of good leadership attributes. Here are a few:

Leaders are judged by the performance of their followers.

Leaders must always set the example.

Leaders must accept responsibility.

Leaders must exercise supervision.

Leaders must develop loyalty toward members of the organization.

Leaders must be good counselors.

Leaders must be firm, fair, and just in all action.

Robert H. Michel is an example of a good leader. Michel was elected House Republican Leader of the 98th Congress in Decem ber of 1982. He served in that position three other times.

On March 2, 1923, Robert Henry Michel was born in Peoria, Illinois. He went to school in Peoria and graduated from Bradley University with a B.S. degree in Business Administration. Michel served during World War II in the enlisted ranks. He was wounded at the Battle of the Bulge, was discharged as a disabled veteran, and was awarded two Bronze Stars, the Purple Heart, and four battle stars for his service.

Michel was first in Washington in 1949 as an Administrative Assistant to his forerunner, Representative Harold Velde. He served in this position until 1956. Since 1964 Michel has been a delegate to every National Convention, has chaired the Platform Subcommittee on Human Resources, and was Floor Leader for Presidents Ford and Reagan.

Michel said that his three qualities of leadership are a desire to be a good leader, an ability to be a good listener, and a good measure of confidence in his own ability.

He said, "A person should listen 90% of the time and be tolerant enough to listen to the other person's point of view."

I think he is an effective leader because he is brave, a good listener, and unafraid to speak his thought. I think a leader should really desire to be a leader. A leader should listen, be a good planner, and carry out his plans.

Bob Michel is a good listener, and he plans well, too, in order to carry out his plans.

Thus we can see that an understanding of the people being served is necessary to planning for effectiveness as a leader.

WHAT IS LEADERSHIP?

(By Jenny Spurlock)

The dictionary suggests direction and guidance as synonyms for leadership. There have always been those who are eager to guide and direct, but they need to have followers if they are truly to be leaders. What leadership qualities make people willing to follow a particular person?

Honesty is a quality most people demand from a leader. One of the leaders who had this quality was given the nickname "Honest Abe." He was given the nickname when, overchanged by three pennies, he walked ten miles back to the grocery store to correct the error. This quality stayed with Abraham Lincoln throughout his entire life. Without his honesty and compassion, the Emancipation Proclamation may never have been written.

Another quality people demand from a good leader is courage. A good example of courage was President John F. Kennedy. Without courage, he would not have been able to take the stand he did during what has come to be known as the Cuban Missile Crisis. He proved to the world that he would not let the United States of America be intimidated by any other world power.

Every good leader needs public speaking ability. Congressman Robert Michel has shown that this is a strong quality of his. By being elected to eight terms in public office, he proves that he can convey to the public his ideas in a way that meets with their approval. By becoming the House Minority leader, he proved that he can relay these ideas and be listened to and accepted by his peers.

Representing the people and their needs is a most important quality also. A man who led with this quality was Everett McKinley Dirksen. His interest of creating a clearer knowledge of Congress to the public was in response to a need he saw. He is quoted as saying, "I want to do what I think is in the interest of the present and future well-being of probably the only real, true free republic that still remains on God's footstool."

Of course, these are only a few of the qualities of a good leader. There are many others. Alone, none of them is as valuable as when they are put into use together by one man or a group of men. Our leaders today, I believe, have an abundance of these qualities and are continually striving to provide us with the leadership we desire.

WHAT IS LEADERSHIP?

(By Chad A. Reiman)

Leadership was a word I didn't give much thought to until I entered this essay contest. As I read materials and listened to comments about leadership, I realized that good leadership is a valuable resource in our United States. In the following paragraphs I would like to share some of my insights on this subject.

The ability to unite and guide a group of people to a common goal is one definition of leadership. It can also mean bringing, greatness out of people rather than trying to make people great.

Sixty-one years ago a leader was born in Peoria, Illinois. On March 23, 1923, the proud parents named their son, Robert Henry Michel. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Michel lived with religious convictions and also had a belief that politics were evil.

One of the first opportunities Robert Michel had to show his ability as a leader was while he served as president of his high school class. After high school, he served his country in war, not as a leader, but as an enlisted combat infantryman.

His public political career began in 1949 when he served as Administrative Assistant to Representative Harold Velde. Mr. Michel assisted Rep. Velde for seven years. In 1956, he was elected to the 85th Congress as Mr. Velde retired. Congressman Michel has been re-elected for 14 consecutive terms since then. He is presently serving as House Republican Leader of the 98th Congress.

As Mr. Michel explained to me, to be a good leader one must have the desire to lead, be a good listener, have confidence, not live in fear of making wrong decisions, and must be able to take criticism. He went on to say, a good leader will be educated and informed in a variety of matters. He said Teddy Roosevelt possessed the qualities he admires in a leader.

I believe Congressman Michel shows qualities of a good leader and he tries to do what is best for us. He seems to be more concerned about how people he is leading and representing regard him, rather than how he impresses President Reagan and Speaker of the House, "Tip" O'Neill. He appears to fit this quote by General Omar N. Bradley, "Fairness, diligence, sound preparation, professional skill, and loyalty are marks of American leadership."

In summing this up, I know we all have the opportunity to try to become good leaders. People can have confidence in and count on a good leader. A good leader will leave behind him a will and a conviction in his followers.●

TRIBUTE TO TRINITY EPISCOPAL CHURCH

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, May 20, Trinity Episcopal Church in my home district of the Bronx, will be celebrating their 110th anniversary. At this time I would like to pay tribute to Trinity Episcopal Church and the fine work it has done for the Bronx community.

Trinity Episcopal Church has a long history of service to the Bronx community. For 110 years it has stood as a spiritual center and has worked closely with its parishioners to provide them the spiritual guidance and religious enrichment in times of sorrow and joy. The history of Trinity Episcopal Church has been one committed to fulfilling the religious and spiritual needs of its parishioners.

Father Wendell Roberts has been the pastor of Trinity Episcopal for 34 years. During his 34 years of service, Father Roberts has worked hard to keep up Trinity Episcopal's tradition of service and commitment to the Bronx community. An example of this commitment is the summer program for children run by Father Roberts. The program includes musical instruction and daily field trips to various educational and recreational facilities. Trinity Episcopal currently has about 400 members and together with the clergy they have worked hard to maintain Trinity Episcopal Church as a fine religious institution.

It gives me great pleasure to honor Trinity Episcopal on the occasion of their 110th anniversary. This anniversary not only marks 110 years of service but is also indicative of the important role Trinity Episcopal Church has played in the lives of its members. Those 110 years were undoubtedly marked with times of hardship as well as times of prosperity and joy. Through it all Trinity Episcopal has stood as a symbol of hope, love and understanding. I am proud to pay tribute to Trinity Episcopal on this momentous occasion and I am confident that Trinity Episcopal will continue to serve the Bronx community and continue to provide its parishioners with spiritual and religious guidance and enrichment.●

A SINGLE STANDARD OF JUDGMENT FOR CENTRAL AMERICA

HON. DOUG BEREUTER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, a recent editorial in the Washington Post caught my attention. It is rare that one reads a balanced analysis of the hostility in Central America, and I believe this editorial is a serious attempt by critics of the administration's policies in Central America to look at all sides of the issue.

Nicaragua cannot continue to receive a free ticket of support from critics of U.S. policy in Central America. In the past, the Sandinistas have been able to talk their way out of being judged by the same standards as all the other countries of the region. Now there are signs everywhere that supporters of the Sandinistas are beginning to rethink their unquestioning endorsement of everything that is done in Managua. The Post editorial focuses on two particular issues: The elections of November, which seem to be an enlightened version of the Cuban-Soviet model, and Managua's support for Salvadoran guerrillas who are intent on criminally destroying civilian targets—just like the contras who also are wantonly engaged in the destruction of civilian targets in Nicaragua.

As the Post says, "There is a great need for a single standard of judgment in Central America." This need is great both in Washington and Managua. I commend this article to my colleague's attention.

ADVICE FOR MANAGUA

President Reagan has been receiving much good advice, from Congress and, especially generously, from the press, on the subject of Nicaragua. But Nicaragua needs some good advice, too, if Central America is eventually to settle down. It could most usefully come from the Willy Brandt-type social democrats in Europe and those liberals elsewhere who tend to coddle the Sandinistas, and from the larger group that has faulted the interventionist aspects of President Reagan's policy. We have in mind two points.

The ruling Sandinistas stand strongly behind the demand of the Salvadoran guerrillas to be admitted to a "power-sharing" process in El Salvador. In Nicaragua, however, the nine comandantes reject any thought of admitting Nicaraguan guerrillas to power-sharing or even to the elections the regime now plans on Nov. 4. After the country's Catholic bishops called for a peace dialogue involving all Nicaraguans, including those "who have risen in arms against the government"—such dialogue is the left's constant appeal in El Salvador—the Sandinista police chief denounced the call as "criminal." The Sandinistas insist they will not open their elections—elections they seem intent on running in the Soviet style anyway—to the Nicaraguan contras even if the guerrillas lay down their arms.

The Sandinistas, by way of seeking international support, are now broadcasting news of the considerable damage done by the contras. People are being killed in military engagements, but many of the targets are economic and civilian in character, and the results are commonly measured in dollar terms or in terms of hardships inflicted upon the population. The Sandinistas, of course, show no similar dismay over the substantially greater damage done to economic and civilian targets by the guerrillas whose operations they encourage in El Salvador. Some on the left suggest it is all right to destroy, say, a coffee planation belonging to an "oligarch." This is rubbish. Peasants work on plantations; Nicaragua's friends in El Salvador have also shot up the bus fleet, which transports the poor.

There is great need for a single standard in judging political events in Central America. There is a need for it in Washington and a need for it in Managua, too.●

THOMAS H. BRUGGERE

HON. LES AuCOIN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform my colleagues that Thomas H. Bruggere, founder of one of Oregon's fastest-growing, high-technology companies, has been named Oregon's Small Businessman of the Year by the Small Business Administration.

As we all know, a great deal of attention is being focused all across the country on the role our high-technology electronics industry must play in developing America's economic strength and competitiveness in world markets. It is clearly an industry that holds promise for America's future, and for Oregon's.

It is therefore fitting that we acknowledge and encourage those entrepreneurs who have kept this critical industry at the cutting edge of technological innovation.

Tom Bruggere is such a man. As President and Chief Executive Officer of Mentor Graphics Corp. in Beavertown, Oreg., he has contributed significantly to the diversification of Oregon's economic base. Tom founded Mentor Graphics in 1981 in the heart of Oregon's "Silicon Forest." Under his leadership, the company has emerged as the industry's leading supplier of computer-aided engineering systems. These advances have substantially increased the productivity of electronics designers at a time of intense worldwide competition for computer applications to old problems and new challenges.

Since 1981, Mentor's work force has grown to 260 employees. In 1983, the company's first sales year, Mentor had nearly $26 million in revenue from domestic and overseas sales.

Overseeing the operations of a firm that is growing as fast as Mentor Graphics does not leave Tom much spare time. Despite the demands of his business, however, Tom has worked to improve Oregon's business environment through service on the board of directors of the American Electronics Association and as chairman of the AEA's Oregon chapter.

I am delighted to salute the remarkable achievements of my friend, Tom Bruggere, to congratulate him on being named Oregon's Small Businessman of the Year, and to extend to him my best wishes for continued success.●

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. GARY L. ACKERMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1984

● Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, while on an official leave of absence to serve as a congressional adviser at the annual meeting of the Asian Development Bank, I was unable to be present and voting on the floor of the House during the week of April 24. Had I been present, I would have voted as follows:

On Tuesday, April 24:

Yes on rollcall 91, final passage of S. 373, Arctic Research and Policy Act of 1983.

On Wednesday, April 25:

No on rollcall 93, Gregg amendment to H.R. 4974, National Science Foundation Authorization for fiscal year 1985.

No on rollcall 94, Walker amendment to H.R. 4974.

Yes on rollcall 95, final passage of H.R. 4974.

On Thusday, April 26:

Yes on rollcall 96, on approving the Journal of Wednesday, April 25.

Yes on rollcall 97, passage of House Resolution 490, the rule on S. 2570, extending the transition provisions of the Bankruptcy Act.

No on rollcall 98, Sensenbrenner motion to commit S. 2570.

Yes on rollcall 99, final passage of S. 2570.

Yes on rollcall 100, passage of House Resolution 481, the rule on H.R. 5172, National Bureau of Standards Authorization for fiscal years 1984 and 1985.

Yes on rollcall 102, Fuqua amendment to Gregg substitute to Walker amendment to H.R. 5172.

No on rollcall 103, Gregg amendment to Walker amendment to H.R. 5172.

Yes on rollcall 104, Gregg substitute, as amended by Fuqua amendment, to Walker amendment to H.R. 5172.

No on rollcall 105, Rudd amendment to H.R. 5172.

Yes on rollcall 106, Fuqua motion that the Committee of the Whole rise.●

SENATE—Wednesday, May 2, 1984

(Legislative day of Monday, April 30, 1984)

The Senate met at 10 a.m. on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

May we have a moment of silence during which we remember Judge William Webster and the loss of his wife Drusilla.

Blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord . . .—Psalm 33: 12.

Almighty God, we have come a long way since our birth as a Republic but we have wandered somehow. Our Founding Fathers held freedom of religion as fundamental. We have translated their deep conviction into freedom from religion. We have become technological giants—spiritual and moral dwarfs. We are sophisticated in scientific progress and primitive in spiritual development. We are knowledgeable in the ways of the world and ignorant in the way of God. We live as though man is the center of the universe and God a peripheral invention of pious enthusiasts. We are abundantly rich in material resources and abysmally poor in spiritual and moral capital. Dear God, help us to get our act together before it is too late. In the name of Him who is the Way, the Truth, and the Life. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

CONGRATULATIONS TO ALASKA

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Alaska, the assistant majority leader, wishes part of my time today. I am happy to accord him that time to speak on the matter of the President's and the Pope's visit to Fairbanks, AK. I was in Fairbanks once, and judging by the pictures I saw on television last night there are going to be more reporters up there than there are people. But in all seriousness, I congratulate the State of Alaska and Senator STEVENS and his colleague for playing host to the President and to the Holy Father. I yield to him now so that he might proceed.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I thank the majority leader.

PRESIDENT REAGAN AND POPE JOHN PAUL VISIT ALASKA

Mr. STEVENS. I do want to call attention to the Senate that the President, returning from his most successful trip to China, has stopped in our State. He arrived there about 3 a.m. Tuesday morning. He has had a most interesting visit with the people of Fairbanks and of Alaska as a whole. Because of personal reasons I was unable to be there, but I am delighted that the President has spent this time in Alaska; that he has decided to stop and wait for the Holy Father, Pope John Paul II. It is a most historical occasion for Alaska to be able to play host to both the President and the Pope at the same time. I thank my good friends from the White House staff, Jim Baker and Mike Deaver, for their courtesies in assisting us to arrange this visit and to make it one that will be so memorable for the people of my State.

When the President arrived in Fairbanks, he was greeted by an editorial that was in the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner, which is published by my good friend, C.W. "Bill" Snedden. I ask unanimous consent that this editorial, which is entitled "Our Nation On The Right Track," be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner, May 1, 1984]

OUR NATION ON THE RIGHT TRACK

During the four years that Ronald Reagan has led our nation, Alaskans have taken a growing pride in being Americans.

Our nation is on the right track, with an emphasis on private sector growth, a strong defense posture, and a balance between natural resource development and environmental preservation. We believe the leadership of President Reagan is in good part responsible for the positive changes we've seen over the last four years.

Today, we're pleased to welcome President and Mrs. Reagan to our community. We take this opportunity to acknowledge—with thanks—the economic policies, defense positions, and conservative attitudes that have set America on a course we heartily endorse.

Fairbanksans were strong supporters of Mr. Reagan during the 1980 elections, voting for him nearly two to one over Democrat Jimmy Carter. We Alaskans can certainly answer the Reagan administration query—are you better off today than four years ago—with a resounding yes.

Granted, we still have some disputes with the federal government over issues where the Alaskan perspective has not been given due consideration, but at least we are dealing with an administration that recognizes the vital contribution the private sector makes to our nation's health.

Four years ago, under the heavy hand of the Carter administration, Alaskans voted to set up a state commission to study our status within the federal fold. Our distrust and dislike of the federal government even led some of us to go so far as to propose independence. A few Alaskans still press for that release, but the thrust of the movement has dissipated under a federal administration that has lightened the government regulatory burden, brought down inflation rate, eased the pressures for locking up our natural resources, stimulated private sector growth, and reduced the income tax burden.

When Alaska was granted Statehood 25 years ago this year, it was partly due to a growing national recognition that Alaska had many contributions to make to the nation.

As we enter our second 25 years, the Reagan administration is helping us continue to make good on that promise. Initially under Secretary of the Interior James Watt and now under William Clark, many of the repressive policies of the Carter Administration have been turned around. Federal oil and gas leasing have been accelerated, state and Native land conveyances have been made a top priority, access provisions have been loosened, fewer permits have been required, and local input has been encouraged.

Those policies haven't solved every problem we have with every federal agency, and the priorities of a Democratic Congress have often hampered them. Nevertheless, the good will and sensible policies of the Reagan administration have been apparent and appreciated.

Though Alaska never really participated in the recession which grew out of the short-sighted policies that preceded President Reagan's election, today we are enjoying the benefits of the nation's strong economy. In addition, renewed emphasis on patriotism, conservative values and a bootstraps attitude have been welcome to Alaskans.

We are indeed honored by the visit here of our nation's leader. We say welcome, and thank-you . . . A very sincere "thank-you!"

Mr. STEVENS. I thank the distinguished majority leader.

(Mr. KASTEN assumed the chair.)

A PRESIDENTIAL VISIT

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Alaska. What I said about Fairbanks, of course, was said in jest. A man who comes from a town of 500 has no right to poke his finger at a town of 50,000, but in any event I congratulate the State of Alaska and the two Senators and the Governor of Alaska for this singular honor.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor.

I cannot resist remembering it was 2 years ago yesterday that President Reagan came to Knoxville to open the 1982 World's Fair, and my wife and I invited President and Mrs. Reagan to be our guests overnight after the official ceremonies, which they did, which is a great honor to us and we were and are very grateful for that. Senator MURKOWSKI had told me that the President and Mrs. Reagan were going to stay at his house. I said:

Well, now, FRANK, that is fine, but as a man who is a veteran in these experiences, let me tell you a few things. Presidents are nice to have but they are tough to be around.

I certainly am not complaining about the subject, but to begin with when we confirmed that the President was going to visit in our home, the telephone company showed up and installed a telephone cable as big as my leg. I was fearful that it was at my own expense. It turned out not to be. But my fears had only just begun. That telephone cable had to go someplace and there was then a forest of telephones installed. I still have evidence of that because they drilled a hole in the floor every place they put them.

We were especially pleased that the President was going to be in our little guest house, which is built on a bluff overlooking the river canyon, a beautiful view. That is why we built it there. I really relished the idea of taking the President out on the back porch and showing him this view across the canyon to a wooded hillside 2 miles away. But when the President arrived, I found that the Secret Service had nailed my drapes shut.

Then that night we had some 30 guests for a dinner party. I found that instead of the caterers which we had employed to serve the meal, as far as the President was concerned they had brought their own waiters and had cooked his meals in Washington and brought them to Tennessee.

All those things are absolutely necessary, I am sorry to say, in this time when there is such grave threat to world leaders and to the President in particular, but I had to tell my friend FRANK MURKOWSKI that while it is a great honor to have a Presidential visit in one's home—look out for the drapes and the floor.

SENATE SCHEDULE

Mr. BAKER. Now, Mr. President, I have been facetious, too long. I should report that after the special order is executed, there will be morning business until 10:30 a.m., when we will resume consideration of the boat bill and the Grassley-Kassebaum-Biden-Baucus amendment will be pending. I get mixed signals about that. Some of the sponsors, whom I will not now identify, say that they should be able to finish with about 3 hours on a side. Some of the sponsors say it may be 3 days. I have assured them that we are going to do whatever we need to do and that we will explore the situation as the day progresses. It is my unpleasant duty, however, to reiterate what I said on Monday and again on Tuesday: Members should expect a late evening tonight.

Mr. President, if I have any time remaining, I reserve 1 minute of that time so that after the minority leader has spoken, I may perform certain other routine functions.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

KAL 007—AN INTERNATIONAL RESPONSE

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, it is an easy thing to let the press of events claim our attention. Here in the Senate we are propelled from one demanding situation to another. Emergencies—real and imagined—often set the agenda. The most recent crisis thrusts itself on us, and we forget the dangers of a situation that intensely absorbed our attention a short time before.

Often I have called upon my colleagues to remember the freedom-loving peoples of Afghanistan. As I have said on previous occasions, I do not know of any Afghan constituents in West Virginia. There may be some in the town of Weirton, in Hancock County, where, I have been told, there are more than 60 different ethnic groups. The press, for the most part, has been excluded from war-torn Afghanistan. The reporters who covered that brutal invasion are off in Iran or Iraq, in Beirut or Chad, in El Salvador or Grenada. Afghanistan has, in a real sense, become another forgotten tragedy. But brave men and women still fight and die there, civilian homes still are bombed there, and refugees still seek safety from the 4 years of Soviet tyranny.

Other recent examples of infamy also seem to have faded from the popular imagination. Last September 1, 269 men, women, and children died when their civilian airliner was attacked and destroyed by Soviet fighters when it strayed into Soviet air space. The Soviets to this day have shown no real hint of remorse or regret for this vicious action. The Soviet Government admits no legal responsibility to compensate the families of the victims. Indeed, the Soviets refused to permit search and rescue operations within Soviet waters. The Soviet navy harassed search vessels operating in international waters, ignoring diplomatic protests and repeated appeals for cooperation. Recently we have heard reports that the Soviet pilot responsible for shooting down the Korean airliner has received a medal for that act of butchery.

Despite this complete lack of Soviet cooperation, the international community went forward with an independent investigation of the shootdown of the Korean airliner. The call for that investigation came from a special session of the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO). At my request, Kevin Nealer of the Senate Democratic Policy Committee staff attended that meeting. As a former State Department officer and legal adviser to U.S. delegations, Kevin assisted the U.S. delegation to ICAO in obtaining a commitment to an impartial investigation. I commend the U.S. delegation for their efforts, and I am pleased that a member of the Senate Democratic Policy Committee staff was able to participate in that accomplishment.

After several months of thorough work by an international team of experienced investigators, the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO) reported that a navigation error was the likely cause of the Korean airliner's deviation into Soviet airspace. The investigation discounted the espionage theory advanced by the Soviets. Moreover, the investigators concluded that the Soviets did not adequately warn the Korean airliner that it had entered Soviet air space, and that the Korean airline pilot was unaware of the Soviet interceptor aircraft, even after his plane had been hit by the Soviet missiles which destroyed it.

This was powerful evidence. On the basis of the independent investigator's report, the ICAO Council recently passed a resolution condemning the Soviet Union for its use of force against a civilian aircraft and called for improvements and cooperation to avoid such tragedies in the future.

The resolution is some measure of the international outrage at the brutal and irresponsible act that led to the deaths of so many unarmed, helpless civilians. I am pleased to see that the international community has censured the Soviet Union for the wanton waste of innocent lives. I commend the members of the ICAO Council and the international investigation team for their pursuit of the truth. It is important that the international community speak with unity and conviction when the norms of human behavior are disregarded so utterly. And it is also important that we take steps to assure that such a tragedy will not recur.

This month, all 152 members of the ICAO are meeting to consider a proposed amendment to the 1944 Chicago Convention which would prohibit the use of deadly force against civilian aircraft. Despite Soviet opposition, it seems clear that some version of that amendment will succeed, this codifying existing international understandings that such a resort to force is lawless and irresponsible.

Mr. President, the SALT II Treaty was on the Senate Executive Calendar at the time of the invasion of Afghanistan by the Soviets. Immediately following the invasion of Afghanistan by the Soviets, I called then-President Carter from my home and asked to see him.

Later that day, I was in his office, and I said to him: "Mr. President, we would be poorly advised now if we were to call up the SALT II Treaty. In the light of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, there are not the votes in the Senate for the adoption of the resolution of ratification of the SALT II Treaty."

President Carter agreed with me, and that was the end of that.

So, the Soviets, themselves, scuttled the treaty when they invaded Afghanistan. But that has not been the end of the invasion and the ruthless efforts on the part of the Soviets to suppress the spirit of liberty and freedom in Afghanistan.

May the Afghan freedom fighters fight on.

I hope that the Moslem communities throughout the world will be more sensitive than it appears up to now with respect to the brutal murder of their brothers and sisters in Afghanistan.

Perhaps even the large Moslem community in the Soviet Union will finally learn the facts.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a Journal of Commerce article reporting on the ICAO Council's action be printed in the RECORD, along with a copy of the resolution of the ICAO Council.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ICAO COUNCIL CONDEMNS SOVIET ACT

MONTREAL.—The governing council of the International Civil Aviation Organization has condemned, by an overwhelming vote, the Soviet Union for the shooting down of a South Korean airliner last Sept. 1.

By a vote of 20-2, with nine abstentions, the ICAO council passed a U.S. resolution late Tuesday condemning "the use of armed force which resulted in the destruction of the Korean airliner and the tragic loss of 269 lives." Two countries were absent for the secret ballot.

The ill-fated aircraft, en route from Anchorage, Alaska, to Seoul, was shot down by Soviet fighter planes over the Sea of Japan after it had inadvertently strayed 500 kilometers off course. An ICAO technical report, released last week, confirmed the findings of an earlier report by the Montreal-based organization that referred to navigational errors by the pilots.

The resolution also "deeply deplores the Soviet failure to cooperate in the search and rescue efforts of other involved states and the Soviet failure to cooperate with the ICAO investigation."

Earlier this week, the Soviet delegate reiterated the allegation, rejected by the ICAO report, that the airliner was on a spy mission when it flew over strategic military installations on Sakhalin Island.

In a separate report to ICAO, the Soviet Union argued that its interceptors tried to communicate visually with the airliner on KAL flight 007. The ICAO report, however, took the Soviet authorities to task for failing to provide the agency's investigation team with radar data or transcripts of communications between the Soviet fighters and their base commander.

An ICAO spokesman noted that the affair constitutes "quite an unprecedented case" in the history of the international civil aviation body, which will be celebrating its 40th anniversary this year.

In effect, though Israel was condemned in 1973 by ICAO for the shooting down of a Libyan airliner, the Israeli authorities admitted their responsibility for the incident, accepted the legal consequences and offered compensation to the victims.

After the crushing vote, U.S. delegate Donald Segner said "the United States is gratified that the council has fulfilled ICAO's responsibility for the safety of international civil aviation. The world can now be assured that such attacks against a civilian airliner and its innocent passengers will not be condoned no matter who is the perpetrator."

South Korean observer Keun Park remarked: "It is a motion of censure, of disapproval, and it will certainly have an impact on the future of civil aviation."

Council President Assad Kotaite said the vote terminated ICAO's investigation of the incident unless new evidence surfaced.

Mr. Segner added that ICAO deserved credit for passing the resolution despite "severe political pressure" from the Soviet Union not to vote on it.

France, Italy, Japan, Canada, Belgium, Australia, West Germany and Spain were among the countries supporting the U.S.-sponsored resolution, which also invited all of ICAO's 151 contracting states to cooperate fully in the preparation of an extraordinary session at the end of next month.

On April 24, an extraordinary session of the ICAO assembly will consider a proposed amendment to the Chicago Convention, which involves an undertaking to abstain from the use of force against civil aircraft and improvement of procedures to follow to avoid any future similar tragedies.

RESOLUTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL CIVIL AVIATION ORGANIZATION (ICAO) COUNCIL, AS PASSED MARCH 6, 1984

(1) Recalling the resolutions adopted and the decisions taken on 10 September 1983 at the extraordinary session of the ICAO Council and endorsed by the 24th session of the ICAO assembly in October 1983 as well as the council resolution of 13 December 1983, relating to the destruction of a Korean Air Lines civil aircraft on 1 September 1983 by Soviet military aircraft:

(2) Having considered the report of the investigation by the Secretary General and the subsequent technical review by the Air Navigation Commission:

(3) Recognizing that, although this investigation was unable, because of lack of necessary data, to determine conclusively the precise cause for the serious deviation of some 500 kilometers from its flight plan route by the Korean aircraft into the air space above the territory under the sovereignty of the Soviet Union, no evidence was found to indicate that the deviation was premeditated or that the crew was at any time aware of the flight's deviation;

(4) Reaffirming that, whatever the circumstances which, according to the Secretary General's report, may have caused the aircraft to stray off its flight plan route, such use of armed force constitutes a violation of international law, and invokes generally recognized legal consequences:

(5) Recognizing that such use of armed force is a grave threat to the safety of international civil aviation, and is incompatible with the norms governing international behavior and with the rules, standards and recommended practices enshrined in the Chicago convention and its annexes and with elementary consideration of humanity:

(6) Expressing its continuing sympathy with the families bereaved in this tragic incident:

(1) condemns the use of armed force which resulted in the destruction of the Korean airliner and the tragic loss of 269 lives;

(2) Deeply deplores the Soviet failure to cooperate in the search and rescue efforts of other involved states and the Soviet failure to cooperate with the ICAO investigation of the incident by refusing to accept the visit of the investigation team appointed by the Secretary General and by failing so far to provide the Secretary General with information relevant to the investigation;

(3) Urges all contracting states to cooperate fully in the work of examining and adopting an amendment to the Chicago convention at the 25th session (extraordinary) of the ICAO assembly and in the improvement of measures for preventing a recurrence of this type of tragedy.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I congratulate the Democratic leader, Senator ROBERT C. BYRD, for his persistence day after day for many months in calling attention to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan which has gone on so long and because there has been no spectacular development. It has been ignored by our press and has not been discussed as it should have been by those of us here in the Senate, with the prominent exception of our distinguished Democratic leader.

The Soviets, after all, have violated human rights. They have also violated a treaty, the Chemical Warfare Treaty. Their violations have been documented. I am delighted to know and am very proud that our leader, ROBERT C. BYRD, has called attention to this this morning as he has done so persistently pointed to the Soviet violations in shooting down an unarmed plane and in documenting the independent investigation by an international group.

So I thank my leader for this service. I joined him once or twice. I wish I had been with him even more often. But I expect to do so in the future.

I congratulate him again for a great service.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin for his kind comments. He has spoken out on this tragedy, and I am delighted to hear him say that he will continue to do so.

As the Senator from Wisconsin has pointed out, more of us should be doing this so that the world will not so easily forget the sacrifices that are being made by Afghans in that war-torn, brutalized country. And from what we hear, the suffering, the killings, the woundings, the maimings, are not limited just to Afghan women and men, but are also being sadly experienced by Afghan boys and girls. Young people—even children—have been slaughtered in the villages, as they have been victims of minefields, chemical warfare, and high altitude bombings.

It is just too bad that the world press is not allowed to go into that war-torn country. It is a sad reflection on the Soviet Union's system of government that it shamelessly excludes the press so that the world may not see, may not know, and may not feel the terror occurring in Afghanistan.

RECORD FIRST QUARTER TRADE DEFICIT

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, last week the Commerce Department announced the latest trade figures. For the third consecutive month, our deficit grew. For March, that deficit reached a record $10.26 billion! That is the largest monthly trade deficit in our history. The March data completes the quarterly trade profile, which reveals the largest trade shortfall ever in the first quarter of 1984—a total deficit of $29.9 billion. That deficit is more than twice as large as the total trade shortfall for the entire year of 1976. Dr. Fred Bergsten, Director of the Institute for International Economics, predicts that these records could foreshadow a total manufacturing trade deficit of $140 billion by the end of this year. This would be twice the level of last year's record trade deficit.

If that figure is a little difficult to appreciate, let me put it in human terms. The Commerce Department tells us that every $1 billion decline in exports costs this country 25,000 jobs lost or not created. This means we could add more than 2.5 million more Americans to the jobless roles this year, solely because we are losing our ability to export. It means that the record March trade deficit translates into more than 250,000 Americans out of work. That is more than a quarter of a million men and women who will not know if they can make the house payment, feed themselves and their children, or otherwise make ends meet.

What do these numbers mean for our major industries? For the steel industry, they mean that foreign steel imports flooded the U.S. market in the first 3 months of this year at a rate that exceeds all previous levels. Over 6 million tons of foreign steel entered the U.S. market, giving foreign companies control of an astonishing 24 percent of this country's steel market in the first quarter of 1984. On Capitol Hill today, there is a truck carrying the last pieces of steel made at the Armco steel plant in Houston, TX, in January some 4,200 people lost their jobs when that plant closed. I am an original cosponsor of a bill introduced by Senator HEINZ and Senator RANDOLPH on behalf of the Steel Caucus which would limit steel imports to 15 percent of the U.S. market. That Fair Trade in Steel bill requires the American steel industry to spend more on capital improvements and modernization. It provides an interval of adjustment so that American firms can compete on a level playing field for their share of the domestic and international market.

Why are we facing the current trade crisis? In March I outlined the source of the real problem. It is just as Martin Feldstein and Senator MATHIAS, the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee's Subcommittee on International Economic Policy, have said. High interest rates, a dangerously overvalued dollar, and the related Federal deficit all work hand in hand to create this crisis. These are policies which the administration has encouraged, and continues to support. This triple threat has caused our trade deficit, and it is a problem which will not be solved until we bring our economic policies into line with reality.

The American worker and our companies are doing all they can to be productive and competitive in the international market. But their best efforts are being undercut by a policy that creates the largest budget deficit in history and, as I have pointed out before, is leading to a situation where this country is a debtor nation. Within the next few years, the President's own economists tell us that much of America's growing debt will be held by foreigners. Thus we are facing a situation where our economy is being run from beyond our borders. The trade deficit is one symptom of that problem.

I am pleased to say that Senate Democrats are looking for honest solutions to the challenge of the international marketplace. We recognize that the world economy has become interdependent—that the United States cannot and should not insulate itself from the world market. Indeed, trade is and continues to be vital to the health of our economy. My own State of West Virginia ranks third in the Nation in the percent of its manufactured goods going to export. West Virginia jobs—American jobs—depend on a strong export policy.

The Senate Democratic Task Force, chaired by Senator KENNEDY, offered 22 specific recommendations for a stronger American economy. That task force is preparing legislation to implement those recommendations, and I understand that a package of trade initiatives will be ready for introduction within a month. I welcome that effort, and I know many American businesses will welcome these initiatives. If this administration is content to stand by failed policies and the failure of political will which has resulted in the worst trade deficit in history, I am not. I know my colleagues are not. And I know that many members of the President's own party have made it plain that they are not satisfied with those policies.

American workers and American business deserve more from Government than good wishes in the struggle to compete in the international market. They deserve good policies—ones that are responsive to the real problems that handicap our exports. I look forward to the initiatives being prepared by the Democratic Task Force as an important step in coming to terms with the challenge.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a Washington Post article of April 28, 1984, entitled "Trade Deficit Hits Record $10.3 Billion" be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Apr. 28, 1984]

TRADE DEFICIT HITS RECORD $10.3 BILLION

(By Jane Seaberry)

The nation's merchandise trade deficit last month grew to a record $10.3 billion—the third consecutive monthly record deficit—as purchases of imports in the United States also reached new heights.

At the current rate, 1984 is shaping up as the worst trade year in U.S. history.

The February trade deficit was $10.1 billion, and it exceeded the January record of $9.5 billion, the Commerce Department said. The deficit for the first quarter also was a record—$119.3 billion at an annual rate, up from an $89.1 billion rate during the fourth quarter last year.

Although imports continued to grow to record levels, exports also improved by $515 million last month because of improved economic conditions abroad, Commerce said.

"Faster economic growth among our trading partners should limit further widening of the U.S. trade gap and may help to bring some improvement by the end of this year," said Commerce Secretary Malcolm Baldrige. He has predicted that the trade deficit, which was a record $60.6 billion last year, probably will top $100 billion this year.

Imports last month totaled $28 billion compared with $27.8 billion in February. Major increases were in imports of iron and steel plates and sheets, motor vehicles, aircraft and parts, electronic tubes and transistors, office machines, advanced data-processing equipment, and power-generating machines.

Sales of several kinds of foreign agricultural products declined, as well as fish and shellfish, and some crude inedible goods, Commerce said.

The trade deficit with Japan was $2.7 billion, the largest for the year so far, up from $2.4 billion in February. Trade with the European Economic Community resulted in a deficit of $1.7 billion last month, up from $999.4 million in February, Commerce said.

First-quarter exports were 3.6 percent higher, and imports were 12.8 percent higher, than during the fourth quarter of 1983.

The trade-deficit problem threatens to be a catalyst for more protectionist legislation this year, which some members of Congress may find hard to resist—particularly with elections in November.

One reason for the deficit has been the high value of the dollar, caused largely by high U.S. interest rates resulting from the large federal budget deficits and the safety of investing U.S. assets.

High rates attract foreign investment, increasing the demand for the dollar and raising its value. The strong dollar, in turn, makes U.S. exports more costly to foreign trading partners, discouraging sales, while simultaneously making goods from abroad cheaper for Americans, thus encouraging imports.

Another problem has been the general pattern of consumption following recessions. As a country pulls out of hard times, incomes expand and consumers tend to buy more imports. In addition, the economic recoveries in many countries have lagged behind that of the United States, preventing them from having the incomes to purchase American goods.

Many Latin American countries, burdened with debt problems, also have cut back on imports from the United States.

For example, the West German economy probably will grow by about 3 percent this year compared with only 1 percent last year, according to Kemper Financial Services Inc. In Great Britain, growth may exceed 3 percent for the second straight year. The Japanese economy should grow by between 4 and 5 percent this year following a 3 percent expansion last year, Kemper said.

WILLIAM COCHRANE

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues an article about a man whom we all know, and whom we hold in high regard, Mr. William Cochrane, who has served on the staff of the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration since 1972.

Bill Cochrane came to Washington in 1954 as administrative assistant to Senator W. Kerr Scott of North Carolina, intending only to stay for 1 year. Thirty years later, Bill continues to work with the diligence and dedication he has shown from the very beginning of his career, wishing only that there were more hours in the day to complete his many duties.

Mr. President, this article which appeared in Carolina Alumni Review is titled "North Carolina's Man on the Hill."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this article be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NORTH CAROLINA'S MAN ON THE HILL

(By James P. Hughes)

Outside of his family, there are just two loves in the life of William McWhorter Cochrane—the University of North Carolina and the United States Senate. He is a loyal son of one (Class of 1937), resident sage of the other, and tireless servant of them both.

Leave it to Bill Cochrane to find a way to combine the two. In all his 30 years as a top Senate staffer, the 67-year-old Newton native has acted as an unofficial and unpaid lobbyist for the University, a role that earned him its Distinguished Alumnus Award in 1978.

Looking out for the University, however, has never conflicted with his official staff duties, nor kept him from performing many other invaluable services for his state and nation. On Capitol Hill they call him North Carolina's third Senator.'

He's served as administrative assistant to North Carolina Senators W. Kerr Scott (1954-58) and B. Everett Jordan (1958-72), staff director of the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration (1972-80), and, since the 1980 GOP takeover, Democratic staff director of the same committee.

No matter what his title, Bill Cochrane has always been there when North Carolina calls. In his home state there are countless examples of his influence at work. The Jordan and Falls Lake reservoir projects, which he stood behind from start to finish, are two; another is the National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences, which he and Senator Jordan directed to Research Triangle Park by requiring it to be located outside a 50-mile radius from Washington.

Probably his biggest satisfaction, though, comes from running an informal employment agency for the sons and daughters of his native state. They are almost daily visitors to his cramped and cluttered office in the rotunda of the Russell Building, where they are provided with friendly advice, encouraging words, and, more often than not, a leg up on a job.

He has never cast the first vote in the Senate, but the Cochrane imprint can be found on any number of major bills. The landmark Budget Control and Impoundment Act is largely his doing, as is the creation of the Federal Election Commission and the Office of Technology Assessment.

Some of his best work has been reserved for the Library of Congress. As senior staff member of the Joint Committee on the Library, he has overseen the most dramatic expansion in the Library's 180-year history. Officials there credit him with the idea to rename its two older buildings in honor of Jefferson and Adams, and only half-jokingly say that the new Madison Building stands more a monument to Bill Cochrane's quiet influence than to our fourth President.

Every four years for the past 20, Bill has been in charge of arranging the presidential inaugural ceremonies, each of which takes a full year of preparation. Both parties keep asking him, and he has yet to say no.

Bill runs on a simple formula of hard work and longer hours, which are as much a Cochrane trademark as his bow ties and ever-present pipe. He says there's no telling what he could get done if only the day didn't end so soon.

His career with the Senate coincides with some of the most tumultuous years in American history—the dawn of desegregation, the close of U.S. involvement in Vietnam, and the unprecedented resignations of a vice president and president. Bill Cochrane was heavily involved in all three.

The Supreme Court ruled segregation of public schools unconstitutional in its now famous Brown v. Board of Education decision of May, 1954. Almost two years later, on March 11, 1956, 101 Southern members of Congress issued the "Southern Manifesto," a petition protesting racial desegregation, declaring Brown "a clear abuse of judicial power" and pledging resistance "by all lawful means."

The signatures of both North Carolina Senators were on the document, and nine of the 12 Representatives. Of the three who refused to sign, only one was returned to Congress after elections that fall, and then only after he was forced to say that he "hated and despised every word" of the Brown decision.

To this day, the morning of March 11, 1956 stands out in Bill Cochrane's memory. "It was about 9:30 or 10," he recalled in a recent interview. "The Senator was usually in by that time. He walked in every morning from the Westchester Hotel, about five or six miles. This morning he hadn't gotten in yet.

"I was sitting at my desk, reading the newspaper, when my phone rang. It was Senator Scott. 'Bill, are you where you can talk?' I told him I was. He said 'You know, they're coming out with that statement today. And I said yes.

" 'Bill, is there any way you can get my name off that thing?' I reflected on it a minute. It was already 10 by that time, too late. Senator Walter George of Georgia was supposed to read it in an hour, and advance copies had already been distributed to the press.

"It hurt me to say it, but I had to tell him, 'No, Senator, there's no way to withdraw your name now. You'd call more attention to yourself that way than if you left it on there: There was silence, and then he said, 'I guess you're right and hung up.

"That story's never been told before, at least not publicly. Only a few people know about it," Cochrane said. "I was always sad that we couldn't get his name off of there. Senator Scott never had any problem with black people, and he never went in for that kind of strong stuff."

Thirteen years later, when the Vietnam War had replaced race as the central issue back home and in Congress, Biil returned from a fact-finding trip to the Far East convinced of the futility of further U.S. military involvement there.

Over the next few weeks, he and Senator Jordan discussed the war issue from every conceivable angle and for hours on end. With the Sentor's permission, Bill taped their discussions, and these tapes will go with his papers to the Southern Historical Collection at Chapel Hill upon his retirement from the Senate.

The Senator, too, soon became convinced that disengagement was the preferred course, and in June, 1970, cast his vote in favor of the Cooper-Church Amendment, which called for an immediate pullback of U.S. troops from Cambodia. He was one of a handful of Southerners to do so.

"I remember Senator Mark Hatfield called our office that afternoon looking for the Senator. He got me instead," Cochrane said. "He said, 'Bill, that was a courageous thing your boss did today, and I want you to thank him for me. It'll mean five more votes for our side down the road.' "

"A few weeks later, Senator Jordan went to the state Democratic convention in Raleigh, and when he came in there, he made a triumphal entry, with his arms raised and his hands up in a V for a Victory salute, and they gave him a thunderous ovation. And when they voted, it came out 1,200 to 600, his way, against the war," Cochrane said.

His health failing, Jordan was upset in the 1972 primary by Nick Galifianakis of Durham, who was subsequently buried in the Nixon landslide in November, losing to Jesse Helms. Before leaving the Senate, Jordan made Bill staff director of the influential Committee on Rules and Administration, which the Senator had chaired since 1965.

The stage was now set for Bill Cochrane to make his most important contribution. By mid-1974, the nation was in a state of crisis; confidence in government had hit an all-time low.

The Nixon Presidency had steadily deteriorated under revelations of White House complicity in the Watergate break-in. Vice-President Spiro T. Agnew was already out of the picture as a result of criminal charges left over from his tenure as governor of Maryland.

In place but untested, the 25th Amendment provided for Presidential succession in just such emergencies. No one knew if it could work. Finding out fell to Bill Cochrane and the Rules Committee, not once but twice in the space of eight months. First, Nixon named Gerald Ford of Michigan to succeed Agnew; then, after Nixon resigned, Ford chose Nelson Rockefeller of New York.

"We spent 60 days—mornings, nights, and Sundays—investigating Gerald Ford, and then had to turn right around and spend another 120 days on Nelson Rockefeller," Cochrane said.

By all accounts, Bill performed with considerable grace under pressure, and served as a steadying influence during the nation's long ordeal.

His achievements in the Senate are all the more remarkable considering Bill Cochrane never intended to stick around anywhere near this long. When he came to Washington in 1954, he announced to one and all he intended to stay no more than a year. After that he was going back home to Chapel Hill and the Institute of Government, where he had worked since his discharge from the Navy in late 1945.

The year came and went; Bill stayed. Three years later, Senator Scott died, and Gov. Luther H. Hodges appointed Jordan to succeed him. Bill said he'd stay until Jordan got settled, then he was going home. His bags were already packed.

Somehow he got sidetracked. He found out he liked working for Jordan. "He was just like a daddy to me," he said. Bill decided to stay just a little bit longer.

For the next 10 to 15 years, he was always going back to Chapel Hill after "just one year more." Today he swears he never left.

"I've got 20 acres down there with the Gimghoul view, and I'm going to put a house on it one of these days, and then I plan on sticking around as long as my cousin Louis Round Wilson did," he said.

If he ever follows through on that pledge, the University will lose one of the best friends it ever had in Washington. "There are few federally funded projects here that he didn't have a hand in one way or another," said UNC President William C. Friday, his friend of nearly 40 years.

"For every one you see or hear about, there's probably 10 back there that you'll never know Bill helped get. That's the way he is. He's never done one thing for public credit or personal aggrandizement, but he always gets the job done," President Friday said.

Dr. Isaac Taylor, dean of the UNC-CH School of Medicine from 1964 to 1971 and presently deputy director of the Hubert H. Humphrey Cancer Research Center at Boston University, recalls how Bill got the job done for an expansion of Memorial Hospital in the mid-1960s.

"We were in line for a Hill-Burton Award to build the Ambulatory Patient Care Facility," Dr. Taylor said. "We had secured whatever matching funds we needed from the General Assembly, we had taken bids, and now we had 30 or 60 days to get the contracts signed, or we'd have to rebid the project.

"The man in charge of Hill-Burton awards happened to be out of the country at the time, and his stand-in was a timid sort who wasn't about to approve those funds for us on his own. Meanwhile, the clock was ticking.

"Finally, I went to see this fellow, and I remonstrated with him. I said, 'If we don't have those funds by the end of the week, we will have to rebid those contracts, and it will cost us 10 percent more, which we don't have.' And he said, 'But, Dr. Taylor, I could lose my job.'

"Well, I figured right then that what he needed was somebody to assure him that he wouldn't lose his job if he approved our award. So I called Bill. 'No problem,' Bill said, 'I'll just call over to the White House.' Senator Jordan and President Johnson were good friends.

"When I got back to Chapel Hill, I got a call from the timid stand-in. 'Dr. Taylor,' he said, 'I believe I've figured out a way to get that money to you.' "

Devotion to the University took root in Bill Cochrane from the first day he set eyes on Chapel Hill—September 12, 1933, barely six months past his 16th birthday, he fell under its spell, and it holds him to this day.

"The idea of taking the University to the people, and not taking it C.O.D., that was the theme of those days," he said. "You were taught to give freely of what had been given you. And, of course, Dr. Frank Porter Graham had a lot to do with that.

"But it was the University of the people, and it was the University against the vested interests, or the other way around. The University's struggle over all those years was a very inspiring thing, and it was hard not to be caught up in it.

"All of these things have been better said by a lot of other people. You know who says things right, in the great old tradition? The Chancellor, Chris Fordham. He can say the University story—freely and easily and much better than I can. Alderman had that gift, and Frank Porter Graham, and Edward Kidder Graham, too, from what I've read by him. Those are some of the key figures who've been able to express the spirit of the University.

"It is a unique place, and nobody has really ever been quite able to say why, but I suppose that all those things together are the reason."

ANNUAL CONFERENCE OF NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF POLICE ATHLETIC LEAGUES

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, beginning on May 6, the National Association of Police Athletic Leagues will hold its annual conference in Orlando, FL. I take this opportunity to commend P.A.L. participants for the fine work they do.

Since 1944, when the league was founded in New York City, its membership has grown to over 2 million youths in over 150 cities throughout the United States and Canada. There are six participating leagues in my own State of West Virginia.

P.A.L. sponsors leagues for such sports as baseball, basketball, tennis, hockey, and softball, and organizes cultural activities such as dance, music, drama, and arts and crafts.

By providing young people with access to such wholesome activities, P.A.L. helps to reduce juvenile crime and delinquency. Further, by forging friendships between police officers and children, P.A.L. encourages a positive approach to a young person's view of the role of a policeman. The value of this, in terms of community relations alone, is incalculable.

The national P.A.L. organization offers a number of helpful services to the individual leagues, such as reduced insurance rates, discounts on the purchase of sporting equipment, and training seminars. P.A.L. also circulates a newspaper to provide information about championship games and matches and other such activities in which the local leagues can participate.

I congratulate the National Association of Police Athletic League for their 40 years of excellent service to our young people and to our communities, and I urge people everywhere to pursue the formation of P.A.L. leagues in their own communities and to support them. This is a national juvenile crime prevention program that works.

A NUCLEAR WEAPONS CHALLENGE TO SENATORS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, this Senator wishes to challenge my colleagues this morning. I wish to challenge my colleagues to a contest to pick the easiest, softest, most vulnerable spending target in the 1985 budget. The target should cost at least $1 billion. It would require $20 billion or more in spending over the next 5 years. It should also be totally useless or even counterproductive. And it should provide the basis for spending hundreds of billions of dollars—perhaps $1 trillion or more over the next couple of decades.

Is there a nice, easy multibillion dollar spending candidate out there that we can chop out of this budget and pave the way for far greater savings as the years go by? Yes, indeedy, there is. Nestled neatly into the 1985 budget is a little old $2 billion item to begin to shoot this country off on the long and immensely expensive road to carry the nuclear war into space. The administration is asking for $2 billion in 1985 and $25 billion over the next 5 years to begin to develop the capability to shoot Russian missiles out of space before they reach American targets. When I say begin to develop the capability, I mean exactly that. It will certainly take hundreds of billions of dollars, perhaps several trillion dollars to develop a complete system, and there is every scientific reason to expect that no matter how much we spent on it, it would never work.

Indeed the Under Secretary of Defense for Research, who is in the Reagan administration, Mr. DeLauer, says that there is no way we can make it work unless we can also persuade the Russians to limit their production of offensive missiles. Well, good luck.

But suppose through some 100-to-1 miracle, it did work. Suppose that this new "star wars" system would be able to intercept every missile the Soviets could launch, suppose the new defensive system absolutely dominated the skies of the future. Would this prevent nuclear war? Of course not. It would simply change the way nuclear payloads are delivered. For a trillion dollars or so, the United States would simply have assured that any nuclear attack on this country did not come through the atmosphere from anything like an intercontinental ballistic missile. Would that defense then defend this country from a nuclear attack? No way. It would simply assure us that nuclear attack would come from any number of other sources.

Our port cities could be hit from submarines firing very low trajectory war heads from a few miles off our thousands of miles of shoreline. Nuclear attack could come from commandos and terrorists, carefully organized and trained to bring portable nuclear weapons on their person across the endless miles of U.S. borders for deployment at military targets and cities throughout the country.

As the New York Times pointed out on April 2 in an editorial, nothing in technology is forever. A defensive system that might work perfectly in 1995, could and almost certainly would be overcome by newer technology by the year 2000. Furthermore, such a defense would make nuclear war more likely, not less. The Times writes:

> Defense is destabilizing. It stimulates the opposing side to develop offenses that will defeat it, and offers a premium to the side that strikes first.

Mr. President, the more we spend on this nuclear technology, the more we find ourselves wandering down a maze that leads ever more certainly to nuclear war. We find ourselves in a technological nightmare. Safety, security, an assured peace all keep fading into the distant mists. We have been very lucky for the last 30 years or so. We have literally stumbled into a deterrence—a balance of terror, an assured mutual suicide that has kept the nuclear peace. It is as if God has given us a few years of grace to find a way to end this terrible arms race that promises utter destruction. In all this, we have two choices. Both are treacherous. Both are dangerous. Both are risky. Neither of these two choices can assure us salvation. But to this Senator the choice is very easy, indeed.

The two choices are these: First we can follow the road we are now pursuing. This is an all-out defensive and offensive reliance on building ever more destructive nuclear arms with a little feeble lip service to arms control. The second is a genuine commitment—a firm and full reliance on arms control. That means primary reliance on negotiations with the other superpower, totalitarian, Communist Russia. It means reliance on a mutual agreement with the knowledge that whatever verification and enforcement provisions we write into the agreement will always be subject to violation by a nation few Americans trust.

What then makes this choice easy to this Senator? Just this: we know that if we go down the nuclear arms race path, the nuclear arms technology will speed us closer and closer to a steadily more dangerous world with nuclear deterrence eventually evaporating as one side or the other senses that it has gained or lost the ability to mount a nuclear attack without the retaliation that constitutes the heart of deterrence. And there is an even more threatening consequence of the ongoing arms race. It is the assurance that the developing nuclear arms technology will surely lead to an increasing proliferation. Continuation of the nuclear arms race assure us that scores of nations will acquire some of the nuclear weapons the superpowers develop. And then the days of human life on this planet will, indeed, be numbered.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial from the New York Times of April 2, to which I have referred, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE MIRAGE OF SPACE DEFENSE

In his "Star Wars" speech a year ago, President Reagan challenged scientists and engineers to design a space-based defense against Soviet missiles to "give us the means of rendering these nuclear weapons obsolete." An expert panel has now given a forceful response: For the foreseeable future, a total shield is technologically impossible.

A defense against strategic missiles has been sought for years. If there was any practical basis for Mr. Reagan's exhortation, it lay in new technical ideas—the X-ray laser developed under Edward Teller's auspices at Livermore or the ground-based excimer laser advocated by George Keyworth, a Teller protégé who is Mr., Reagan's science adviser.

Mr. Teller is often given credit for developing America's hydrogen bomb. But others, like Hans Bethe and Richard Garwin, also played important parts. Mr. Bethe and Mr. Garwin led the opposition to an antiballistic missile in the late 1960's. Now, as members of the Union of Concerned Scientists panel, they express vigorous skepticism about the X-ray laser and other aspects of the proposed defenses.

The X-ray laser is a one-shot device powered by a nuclear explosion. Its beam would shoot 2,500 miles across space and hit Soviet missiles before the warheads—and easily deployed decoys—separate from their booster rocket.

The scientists' panel points to a fatal flaw: Boosters can be redesigned to part from the payload low in the atmosphere, beyond the reach of the most powerful X-ray beam. Other lasers could, in theory, penetrate the atmosphere enough to damage a booster by heating its skin. But they would be effective only if the Russians neglected simple countermeasures, like spinning the booster to prevent the laser from burning a hole, or hiding its telltale flame with heat shields.

Destroying missiles in the booster phase is by far the best strategy for the defense. Only after reentry into the atmosphere sorts out the decoys is defense again feasible. At that late stage, some protection could be given to missile silos, but not to cities vulnerable to nuclear bursts at high altitude.

The science panel found that all conceivable defense weapons, from particle beams to the homing device used in America's antisatellite missile, have grave if not insuperable defects for a Star Wars system. So do platforms which such weapons might be launced or directed. Platforms in space are sitting targets, and the gigantic mirrors needed to direct laser beams would be especially vulnerable. To cover Soviet silos round the clock would require hundreds of platforms. Just to lift their laser fuel into space would cost $70 billion.

Computer speed is another problem. It is unlikely that any software now conceivable could work fast enough to manage an antimissile battle. Since even minor holes in any defense would risk millions of deaths, no system is worth having unless it works almost perfectly. And since it could never be fully tested, perfection is unattainable.

Secretary Weinberger says he has no doubt that a "reliable and effective defense" will one day be possible. Other Pentagon officials have told Congress that the Star program is designed only to develop technology and that no deployment decisions will be taken before 1990.

But a decision can be taken right now. It's worth spending something, but surely not $25 billion, on Star Wars research. Short of some giant new stride in technology, the old answer remains as cogent as ever: Defense is destabilizing. It stimulates the opposing side to develop offenses that will defeat it, and offers a premium to the side that strikes first. As far ahead as anyone can see, the most effective protection is agreement with the Soviet Union to limit the nature and quantity of nuclear forces.

A BUDGET FREEZE—BITTER, NECESSARY MEDICINE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I have decided to vote for the budget freezes which will be offered over the next few days. I have strong objections to some parts of a freeze—delaying social security cost-of-living adjustments, for example—but the staggering deficits facing this Nation are so dangerous that drastic, painful measures are justified.

Optimists look ahead and say that deficits will "remain" around $200 billion for the next 3 or 4 years. But if the country slides into another recession the deficits could easily double and reach $400 billion or more. Under those circumstances, we could be facing an economic crisis matched only by the Great Depression.

Even if the optimists are correct and the deficits stay around $200 billion, they will still push our economy into an economic slough of despond. They will provide the tinder for another round of inflation. New investment money will be absorbed; productivity will remain anemic. The dollar will continue as a strong currency because of high interest rates and our ability to compete in the world market will weaken. Unemployment will stay high, especially in industries whose customers rely on reasonably priced credit.

A sick economy cannot help but endanger many vital Federal programs. Over the past decade, as the economy faltered, Government spending programs faced unprecedented difficulties.

Look at what happened to social security. In 1977, Congress passed a far-reaching bill designed to put social security on a sound financial footing for the rest of this century. Then the economy was buffeted by a combination of record inflation and high unemployment. Last year, 6 short years later, Congress had to pass another bill to rescue social security. We had to face this explosive issue once again purely and simply because the economy performed much worse than anticipated.

Other social programs suffered similar fates. Grants to State and local governments were actually cut, reversing a 15-year upward trend. Means-tested entitlements, centerpieces of a compassionate government, were ground in the same mill.

I do not want Congress to be forced into repeating this experience. Next time, the measures needed to avoid an economic calamity will be that much more draconian. Better to take some bitter medicine now and avoid open-heart surgery later.

I expect that most of us who vote for a budget freeze have objections to some aspect of the overall package. I certainly object to opening the social security issue again and delaying cost-of-living adjustments. Some of my colleagues will object to the reductions in defense and still vote for the package.

Mr. President, the leadership plan endorses a $200 billion deficit in 1987—4 years into a recovery. What a vain hope. The deficits will choke that recovery before 1987. A freeze is the only way to make more than a dent in the deficit. It is bitter but necessary medicine.

HUMAN RIGHTS VIOLATIONS: AS BAD AS EVER

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, recently I received a publication compiled by the American Civil Liberties Union and Americas' Watch Committee entitled "As Bad As Ever: A Report on Human Rights in El Salvador." The report documents the continuing atrocities perpetrated against those whom the death squads and the security forces wish to suppress. In El Salvador as in other countries, murder instills terror; and terror is the government's method of maintaining control.

The fact remains that an average of 120 civilian noncombatants were killed weekly in the last 3 months of 1983, and the response of the Salvadoran Government has been limited to the transfer of only three of the officers linked to death squad activity.

Systematic torture continues. Disappearances continue. The number of political prisoners is increasing. The evidence clearly demonstrates that the Army, in massacres of unarmed civilians during military operations, is responsible for the majority of civilian killings in El Salvador.

The record is clear: The Government of El Salvador is engaged in a consistent pattern of gross violations of internationally recognized human rights.

Mr. President, the current administration apparently acknowledges the tragic realities of this region, but our pleas lack credibility when we continue to underwrite the violence. It is an embarrassing situation to supply the aggressors and then apologize for their abuse on human rights.

A cloud of inconsistency is shadowing our pledge to uphold individual rights around the world. To remove this conflicting and ambigious message we must be consistent in publically condemning all violators.

El Salvador is one area which has harmed our international credibility as the leader in human rights. Our failure to ratify the Genocide Convention is another.

Unless we have recanted that priority to human rights, the necessity to pledge ourselves as a forerunner has not diminished. And ratification of the Genocide Convention, which outlaws the murder and serious mental or physical harm of a racial, ethnic, or religious group, will undoubtedly strengthen that commitment.

Let us return to solid ground by refusing to support the barbarous acts of the Salvadoran Government and by endorsing the Genocide Convention.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 10:30 a.m. during which Senators may speak for up to 2 minutes each.

WATER RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT ACT

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, S. 1739, the Water Resources Development Act of 1983, is scheduled to be considered by the Senate later this month. My distinguished colleague, Mr. ABDNOR, chairman of the Subcommittee on Water Resources, has called for expedited floor action on this legislation. I commend Senator ABDNOR for his work in the area of water resources development. However, I feel that, prior to bringing S. 1739 to the floor, it is imperative that the Senate be made aware of the great concern that waterway carriers and shippers have with title V—inland waterways—of S. 1739.

I feel very strongly that, before the Senate acts on S. 1739, the Finance Committee should be given the opportunity to consider the tax policy included in this bill. I have worked hard with my colleagues in the Environment and Public Works Committee to craft a sound water policy bill. I support passing a "Water Resources Development Act" this year.

But, I cannot support title V of S. 1739. This title has major tax implications that could have a far-reaching effect on waterway users, the waterway industry, and international trade. Title V should be referred to the Finance Committee in order to fully consider these tax implications. Amendments to title V could strengthen the bill. Absent these amendments, I cannot support S. 1739.

Title V would cap through the year 2000, annual Federal obligations for expenditures on the commercial inland waterway system at $646 million. At the same time, it would give the Secretary of the Army sole authority to impose and collect additional waterway user charges, that is taxes, if funding above the annual cap is required. Title V also establishes a 21-member Inland Waterway Users Board, whose members are selected by the Secretary of the Army, to recommend inland waterway spending levels. This Board, however, is strictly advisory; the Secretary is not required to follow the recommendations of this Board concerning either revenue or expenditure levels.

No one knows the potential impact of title V. It amounts to a game of Russian roulette for users. It places the private sector—shippers and carriers—totally at risk. The bill surrenders jurisdiction over expenditures and revenues of the Federal inland waterways from Congress to the Corps of Engineers. According to the corps' own analysis, drastic increases in the fees would occur year to year.

It is my view, and the view of a number of my colleagues that, prior to reaching the Senate floor, the Finance Committee should be granted jurisdiction over this revenue-raising measure to address its equity and to insure that any additional navigation user fees are determined by Congress—not the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers.

AGRICULTURAL CONCERNS

Many members of the agricultural community have expressed strong opposition to title V. In 1983, the United States exported 162 million metric tons of wheat, feed grains, corn, and soybeans. Approximately 40 percent of these exports moved through the Nation's waterways. Existing user fees are expected to cost American farmers $38 million in 1984. Using the corps' projections for an increase in the fuel rate tax to 48 cents and without taking inflation into account it is estimated farmers will have to absorb $226 million in user fees in 1990 for grain alone.

The Congressional Budget Office in a study on charging for Federal services completed late last year, concluded that a user fee set to recover one-half of all Federal waterway expenditures would increase the cost of waterborne grain shipments by about 9 cents per bushel by 1990. Assuming that only one-half of this increase were passed on to America's farmers, it would mean an additional transportation cost and loss of gross annual revenue of about $1,300 for a typical 400-acre corn and soybean farm.

Increased user fees could seriously threaten the U.S. share of world grain exports. Loss of grain markets would further erode our balance of trade and would result in further increases in transportation costs. A recent study prepared for the U.S. Department of Agriculture's Office of Transportation, but never released, States that any increase in waterway transportation costs will adversely affect the U.S. grain industry. Using corn as the example, the study concluded that any increase in the cost of shipping corn will be primarily shifted to corn producers. The study further asserts that waterway user taxes would have similar impact on the other grain producers dependent on the inland waterway system. Higher prices for waterborne farm production inputs such as fertilizer and chemicals would also result from increased waterway user fees and would be passed to farmers as a cost of production.

CONDITION OF THE BARGE INDUSTRY

We must consider the severe economic condition of the domestic water transportation industry. This industry is still in the throes of the recession. No recovery is foreseen for at least 2 years. It makes no sense for Congress to be advocating higher waterway user fees at this time. The inland water transportation industry has been paying an escalating waterway user tax since 1980. This tax is scheduled to be increased 2 additional cents beginning in 1985. The tax has been accumulating in a trust fund that by law must be used for construction, rehabilitation and replacement projects. These funds have never been spent. Title V treats this tax as part of the Federal expenditure cap. It fails to credit the industry for the contribution that they are already making.

CONCLUSION

I want to reiterate, title V should be referred to the Finance Committee for consideration of tax policy. I strongly oppose title V in its present form. I plan to work to amend title V in the Finance Committee. If I am not successful there, I will bring my concerns to the floor of the Senate. If title V is not substantially amended, I will be forced to oppose S. 1739.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a joint letter from the American Waterways Operators, Inc., the American Inland Waterways Committee, the Water Transport Association, and Pacific Northwest Inland Waterways Association be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE AMERICAN WATERWAYS OPERATORS, INC.,
Arlington, VA, April 10, 1984.

To: Members of the United States Senate.

The undersigned, representing a broad cross-section of the domestic waterway industry, are concerned with the development of comprehensive and equitable legislation improving the efficiency of our water transportation system. We now understand that there may be uncertainty concerning the industry's position on S. 1739, the Water Resources Development Act of 1983, which has been reported by the Committee on Environment and Public Works. The purpose of this letter is to inform you that a unified waterway industry cannot support S. 1739 in its present form.

This is a time of crisis in our industry. According to figures compiled by Arthur Andersen & Co., fifteen of the leading companies in our industry reported losses well in excess of $40 million last year. At the same time, we are painfully aware of the need to improve navigation on America's rivers. While the cost of necessary improvements represents an insignificant portion of the federal budget (without considering that each project has earned a favorable public cost/benefit ratio), those costs projected over the next decade would probably exceed the gross revenue of our entire industry. Thus. any changes in the present system of financing the improvements on, and operation of, our navigation system require very careful consideration.

Such consideration is missing from S. 1739. The industry finds it unacceptable that Title V delegates most of the control over the authorization, appropriations and taxing processes from the Congress to the Secretary of the Army. Most importantly, S. 1739 does not even address the level, type or timing of taxes or other charges to finance waterway projects; all of these decisions are left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Army. A bill that allows a government agency to levy special taxes to support whatever level of spending it chooses, which is the essence of S. 1739, does not make good legislation for the public or the Congress.

We are equally disturbed by some provisions of Title X. This Title would impose taxes on the shallow draft coastal industry for deep draft channels which our industry neither needs nor would gain from in any way. It also contemplates a Board to "study" what level of fees should be charged for operation and maintenance—not whether such charges make any sense. The Board purports to be user-oriented, but its proposed make-up belies that claim.

At hearings following the reporting of the bill, our industry joined with representatives of the shipping community to announce opposition to the bill's abdication of Congress' traditional responsibilities and prerogatives. Both before and after those hearings, we met repeatedly with Committee members and staff in an attempt to find common ground. Unfortunately, despite our best efforts, we have been unable to reach a workable compromise with advocates of S. 1739.

We certainly do not agree that the solution to this problem is beyond the will and capability of the Congress, and we intend to continue our efforts to work with the Senate to devise a proper solution. In the meantime, we must make clear our opposition to S. 1739, and we ask for your help in assuring that this fundamentally flawed bill does not become law.

Very truly yours,

William E. Timmons, on behalf of The American Inland Waterways Committee, Louis B. Susman, Counsel to The American Inland Waterways Committee; Joseph Farrell, President, The American Waterways Operators, Inc.; Walter H. Evans III, Counsel to The Pacific Northwest Inland Waterways Association; and John D. Geary, Chairman, Water Transport Association.

IMPORT QUOTAS ON JAPANESE CARS NOT TO BE RENEWED WHEN THEY EXPIRE

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, the Washington Post today carries on its front page the news that the President's Trade Representative, Ambassador William Brock, said yesterday that the voluntary import quotas on Japanese cars will not be renewed when they expire next March. Mr. Brock's stand is correct and I support it enthusiastically.

Citing the fact that General Motors paid 5,807 executives $181.7 million in bonuses last year, and that Ford paid 6,035 executives bonuses totalling $80.6 million, exclusive of salary and stock options, Mr. Brock correctly asked why this industry needs protection from imports.

The unfortunate fact is that the fourth year of the voluntary Japanese auto import restraints has just begun in April. We have a full year to go. And this at a time when the industry is predicting profits as high as $10 billion for 1984.

Mr. President, I am pleased to see that the auto industry has rebounded, that it is now profitable. But this is a false prosperity as long as import quotas are in place. Why should the industry not use its new profits to reduce the price of cars, so as to compete more effectively, and let the American consumer share in the good times?

Even more troubling is the inevitable effect of management's generosity to itself on wage negotiations. Management effectively is sending a loud, clear signal to unions to demand wage agreements that will raise industry costs.

Mr. President, I believe that the auto quotas are a serious mistake. I commend highly Ambassador Brock's firm stand, and I applaud his determination not to ask the Japanese to renew the quotas next year.

I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the article referred to be included in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BROCK: AUTO-IMPORT QUOTAS TO END

(By Hobart Rowen)

The Reagan administration's chief trade officer, angered by big bonuses paid to U.S. auto executives, served notice on the industry yesterday that the "voluntary" import quotas on Japanese cars will not be renewed when they expire next March.

U.S. Trade Representative William E. Brock said in an interview that the industry will discover "that our reluctance [to extend the quotas] is a mile wide and a mile deep."

To continue the limitation on imported Japanese cars, now in its fourth year, cannot be justified in view of "unbelievable new management bonuses," Brock asserted.

Asked why the administration does not send such a message directly to the industry, Brock smiled and replied, "I thought I just did."

General Motors Corp. recently announced it had paid a group of 5,807 executives $181.7 million in bonuses last year—an amount that Brock said averages out to more "on a one-shot basis than the average worker in one of those plants makes in a year." Ford paid 6,035 executives bonuses totaling $80.6 million. Those figures are exclusive of salary and stock options.

If the industry is healthy enough to pay such compensation to its executives, "then why does it need protection?" Brock asked. "Do the American people really want to subsidize as much as $5 million or more in bonuses for one manager?"

Ford Chairman Philip Caldwell received $7.3 million last year in salary, bonus and stock options.

"It's hard not to feel a little bit 'had' at this point," Brock said of the quota deal, which for the first three years limited the number of imported Japanese cars to 1.68 million units annually, and to 1.85 million units in the current year, plus a small number of station wagons.

The quotas were established on a "voluntary" basis by the Japanese government under pressure from the U.S. government to relieve the impact on the American industry of heavy Japanese imports.

Some companies had already begun to lobby for continued quotas, arguing that with no limits on the number of Japanese cars that can be imported, and a cheap yen in relation to the dollar, Japanese companies will be able to cut prices and extend their penetration of the market from the present 25 percent level to 40 percent or more.

Several administration officials, including Secretary of Commerce Malcolm Baldrige and Economic Council Chairman Martin S. Feldstein, had earlier questioned the wisdom of continuing the quotas. Many independent analysts agree that quotas have sharply boosted prices for both Japanese and American cars.

But Brock's language was the most definitive so far that the Reagan administration, if returned to office, will let the quota system expire next year. When pressed, he said he was expressing his own point of view, but added: "I don't know of anyone in the administration who will disagree with me."

The administration engaged in the quota exercise with some reluctance and after strong internal debate because it ran counter to its general free-market philosophy. But it concluded that the U.S. industry needed a breather to enable it to retool and recover some of its lost market.

Although the numbers of cars sold in the past year were far below the volume records for major companies, modern equipment and sharp reductions in the auto labor force helped churn out record profits. The Japanese exporters, meanwhile, upgraded their models sold here, a process that boosted sticker prices—and profits per car—all around.

GM and Ford spokesmen have said that the large bonuses paid to executives are only fair rewards for officials who led the industry out of its deepest depression to a record $6.3 billion profit year, a figure that may bulge to $10 billion for 1984.

But some others in the industry have begun to wonder about the ultimate costs of this generosity. At a meeting last week with Washington Post staff members, American Motors President W. P. Tippett predicted that the bonuses paid by GM and Ford will "cost hundreds of millions" in the form of higher wages that the unions will now be able to demand in contract talks this summer.

Brock pointed out in the interview that "this will be a cost to [all of] us," because higher costs ultimately are passed on to the consumers. "If wages and salaries and bonuses all go up, with U.S. cars already $1,500 to $2,000 over the competition's cost of production, then the industry will be here, saying, 'We need another four or five years of protection.'"

He made clear that the Reagan administration will oppose continued quotas even for another year or two. "Protectionism becomes addictive," Brock said. "It becomes tantalizing to ask for more and more. But it doesn't deal with the problem."

He contended that in the first three years of the quotas, the American industry "made an enormous effort to get competitive, and I think labor played a significant role. . . . I know they're producing a better quality product over what we saw three years ago."

Management, Brock added, "has sunk about $50 billion of new investment into modernization and new technology. But that doesn't say that we've solved the problem. It does say that we're doing the things that will lead to a solution, if continued."

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I congratulate the Senator for his remarks. I read that piece in the paper this morning also, and I took the liberty of calling Mr. Brock to tell him he was doing a good job and that he had my enthusiastic support.

Mr. CHAFEE. I want to say to the majority leader that sad though it is, the fourth year of the import quotas just started on April 1 so we have another year to go. I think that is regrettable, but, nonetheless, we are locked into that. But, thank goodness, they are going to end next March.

MEMORIAL TRIBUTES FOR FRANK CHURCH

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, on April 10, the friends of Senator Frank Church gathered in the National Cathedral for a memorial service to one of the best friends and colleagues we ever had. The tributes delivered to Frank Church are witness to our affection and respect for a great Senator and dedicated public servant who loved his native Idaho and who touched all Americans with his eloquence, his brilliance, and his compassion.

I believe that all of us who served with Frank, and many more across the country who knew this wonderful man and admired his work, will be interested in these tributes. I ask that they may be printed in the RECORD.

The tributes follow:

READING BY SENATOR CLAIBORNE PELL FROM I CORINTHIANS 13 OF THE BIBLE

If I speak in the tongues of men and of angels, but have not love, I am a noisy gong or a clanging cymbal. And if I have prophetic powers, and understand all mysteries and all knowledge, and if I have all faith, so as to remove mountains, but have not love, I am nothing. If I give away all I have, and if I deliver my body to be burned, but have not love, I gain nothing.

Love is patient and kind; love is not jealous or boastful; it is not arrogant or rude. Love does not insist on its own way; it is not irritable or resentful; it does not rejoice at wrong, but rejoices in the right. Love bears all things, believes all things, hopes all things, endures all things.

Love never ends; as for prophecies, they will pass away; as for tongues, they will cease; as for knowledge, it will pass away. For our knowledge is imperfect and our prophecy is imperfect; but when the perfect comes, the imperfect will pass away. When I was a child, I spoke like a child, I thought like a child, I reasoned like a child; when I became a man, I gave up childish ways. For now we see in a mirror dimly, but then face to face. Now I know in part; then I shall understand fully, even as I have been fully understood. So faith, hope, love abide, these three; but the greatest of these is love.

TRIBUTE BY GEORGE MCGOVERN

One Saturday morning a few weeks ago when Eleanor and I went to visit Frank and Bethine, I said to him: "I'm really sorry about what is happening to you; it's a lousy piece of luck."

"Oh," he said, "It's not really all that bad. It happens to all of us. It's just coming to me a little earlier than I had expected."

And then he flashed that marvelous ear-to-ear smile that was his trademark.

If there was ever anyone in the Capital City endowed with a more infectious smile and a more engaging laughter than Frank Church, I have not met that person. Although I must confess that Forrest is so much like his father that I find myself glowing inwardly every time I hear him speak.

In any event, Frank wanted to talk that day last winter not about illness but about the current political campaign. Ordinarily we politicians, like other mortals, are envious if not resentful about the success of a contemporary.

As Aeschylus observed twenty-five centuries ago: "It is in the character of very few men to honor without envy a friend who has prospered."

Frank is one of those very few men who did "honor without envy" the prosperity of his friends. He spoke about a friend who had experienced a political regeneration of sorts and he could not conceal his joy.

He had read a piece by David Broder—a columnist whom he greatly admired—in which David had written some kind words about his friend. If that friend had been his brother or his son, he could not have been more delighted about that column.

I think he himself experienced a profound spiritual and personal revitalization even as his physical life ebbed away. He spoke and wrote in his closing days with a sharpened perception and an informed wisdom that is a precious legacy to history. He saw clearly the underlying historical forces that are now convulsing Central America, Africa, Asia and the Middle East.

Since the early 1960's, he was distressed that this great nation which he loved with such pride and passion should sometimes be on what he believed to be the wrong and losing side of today's revolutionary struggles.

He believed, for example, that the late Ho Chi Minh was not a stooge of Moscow or Peking seeking to extend Soviet and Chinese power into Southeast Asia. Rather he saw Ho Chi Minh as the dedicated leader of a legitimate nationalist revolution against French and Japanese colonialism in Indo China.

Frank and I came to the Congress on the same day twenty-eight years ago—both of us having been elected the first time in 1956—he to the Senate and I to the House.

When I joined him in the Senate a few years later, we soon found ourselves as allies in many battles over American foreign policy in the turbulent 60's. Without any discussion between us, we had both prepared major Senate speeches on the same day in mid-January, 1965, calling for a U.S. effort to negotiate an end to the Vietnam War instead of sending in U.S. forces. Three weeks later we were back on the Senate floor again with speeches written independently but amazingly similar in their diagnosis of the Vietnam struggle. From that day forward we stood together on issue after issue affecting the foreign policy and national security of the United States.

Once after a lopsided Senate vote against one of our joint ventures, I saw Frank ambling across the Senate floor with an amused expression on his face.

"George," he said, "I've learned two things about this partnership of ours. We're always right, but we always lose!"

It is perhaps appropriate that having been first elected on the same day in 1956, we were defeated on the same day in 1980—a quarter of a century later.

Whether in fact we were right or wrong, history will decide, but I shall always feel that Frank Church was a witness to the world for what is decent and just in human affairs—one of the great Senators in American history. In Lincoln's phrase, he always appealed to the "better angels of our nature."

I saw him briefly for one final goodby Thursday afternoon as he lay dying—too weak to speak more than a word or two—but still attempting to smile. I have always felt awkward in embracing another man. But I found myself leaning over to hold him for a moment in my arms believing that he was asleep, but he whispered in my ear: "You are a dear man."

I could not speak at that moment but I would like to say now: "Frank, you are the dear man."

God bless you and may God sustain dear Bethine, Forrest and Chase. This remarkably brave and cheerful family holds the love and admiration of us all.

TRIBUTE BY CECIL D. ANDRUS

Seldom do we have the opportunity to stand in the shadow of a truly great man.

Frank Church was such a man.

A world class leader of peace.

A strong and enlightened leader in foreign affairs.

A sensitive leader in protecting the environment in which we live.

A compassionate leader when dealing with the matters of aging.

Frank Church served his state and nation with distinction—with dedication and with unwavering integrity. Yes, he was truly a great man.

But Frank did not occupy a throne. He was human, warm and caring.

He could take a senior's hands in his and give them strength and hope—And he did.

He could take a small child in his arms and make her smile and laugh—And he did.

He instinctively knew when people were in need of help—and he was there.

When he stood at Robinson Bar, at the Middle Fork, or on the Selway, he understood that future generations had a right to see portions of their land unspoiled—the way it was created.

He was a rare man. A true Idaho son—strong independent and loving.

Bethine, Amy, Forrest and Chase have lost their husband and father. We have lost a friend. The world has lost a statesman.

We will miss him, but thank God he was here for those too few years. Our world is a better place because of Frank Church.

TRIBUTE BY SENATOR EDWARD M. KENNEDY

Last week, on the last morning I saw Frank Church, he opened his eyes, looked up from his bed, and asked me if I would say a few words on this day. "I think it's coming soon," he said—and smiled. And I think I know why he flashed that famous smile at that moment. It was not only that Frank had the courage to face this fate as he had all his life—as a resolute and happy warrior. And it was more than affection for a friend. I believe Frank chuckled that morning because he knew that the best orator of our time in the Senate would not be available for this service—so he was asking some of the rest of us to do the best we could.

Few in any generation speak with true eloquence; fewer still speak from heart and conscience to the soul of the whole nation. Frank Church was a prophet in this democracy—and so we gather here now to honor the meaning of his life as well as the man who lived it.

He was skilled, which a political leader must be—and his talent took him to the Senate, as a progressive candidate from a conservative State, at an age so young that he was at first mistaken for a Senate page. Yet his ambition was not merely for office, but for the ideal that power had a higher purpose.

He was one of the youngest Senators in history, but one of his deepest concerns was for older Americans.

His greatest interest was foreign relations, but some of his greatest contributions were also the protection of civil rights—and the preservation of America the beautiful—the natural gifts which were for him so wondrous in his own State of Idaho.

When he was twenty, he served as a soldier during World War II in China, Burma and India. And when I think of him in that conflict, of his friends George McGovern and John Kennedy who fought in those same battles long before they met each other, I am convinced that it is the men who are brave in war who are also bravest in the cause of peace.

Frank Church was among the first lonely voices of dissent raised in the wilderness of warmaking in Vietnam. He was a Senator from Idaho; but he was also a voice for those half a world away who had no votes to cast against the bombing and devastation of their own land. He loved peace so much that he became a founding father of the War Powers Act—one of the constitutional landmarks of our time. He loved this country so much that he took the lead in exposing the abuses of the C.I.A. and the F.B.I.—and in calling us to a higher standard. His own sense of patriotism would not let him declare for the Presidency in 1976 until that investigation was done—and so he lost the nomination he very well might have won.

He understood that he stood often at the brink of defeat for re-election to the Senate; in 1968, he realized his opposition to Vietnam meant fierce opposition in Idaho—but he would not be moved. Yet even Frank could not beat the political odds forever. Four years ago, this man of reason lost his campaign by the narrowest of margins to the negative forces of reaction and extremism. He ran as far ahead of the Democratic ticket as he was so frequently ahead of his constituency and the country. And what were the charges against him in 1980? That he was for peace, for civil liberties and social justice. He had fought for the Panama Canal Treaty with a clear vision both of its merits—and of the political danger. And there was more honor in his defeat than in most victories.

For the remarkable fact is not that Frank Church was finally defeated, but that he was elected and re-elected four times. His quarter century in poser left a rare mark upon the world. He made his compromises, as every politician does; but he was pre-eminently a man of principle and commitment.

So much was still ahead of him. He might have been—he should have been—the next Secretary of State in a new Democratic Administration. Now he is gone, but he has left his words, his record, and his wisdom to guide us.

As war rages in Central America, we need to hear his challenge that: "America must become the breadbasket of the world, not is cannon factory."

We need to heed his call to "reject the counsel of the compulsive interventionists"—and to restrain "an irrational arms race which continues at an unabated pace."

In his last months, Frank Church was still a tireless apostle of arms control and the nuclear freeze.

Perhaps he lived so much at the cutting edge of history and his own beliefs, no matter what the political risks, because he had come so close to dying at the age of twenty-three, when he was given six months to live. And so the thirty-six more years he had seemed a specific gift, a grace of time. He made all the moments count for all that he cared about—for Bethine, the wife who shared his live, his politics and his laughter; for his family and the friends he cherished; and for the causes that were his deepest concern.

A defeated opponent once said of him: "he really had guts."

And Frank Church wrote his own truest epitaph when he spoke of the passing of his friend, my brother Bob. I remember what Frank said then: "Too often men who would win elections tend to be followers, not leaders. They are inclined to go along in order to get along. They are specialists in telling the people what they want to hear. They are animated mirrors, styled to the fashion of the moment, bent to reflect current opinion . . .

"Robert Kennedy," said Frank Church, "was a shining exception to that rule. He was no ordinary, garden-variety politician. He scorned conformity, insisted on being himself, and he sought to prod the conscience of America."

So it was with Frank Church. He was a shining exception—and he is a shining memory. He was true to himself—and he was true to America. He was extraordinary—as a public leader and a friend. For each of us, his life will endure as long as our own—and as long as our country lives.

TRIBUTE BY F. FORRESTER CHURCH

This morning I speak on behalf of the family.

First, let me thank Senator Pell, Senator McGovern, Secretary Andrus, and Senator Kennedy for sharing with us in this celebration of my father's life. Each of them, and so many of you, have comforted my mother and father over the past few difficult, yet memorable weeks. Your friendship is a gift that will never be forgotten. On behalf of my mother, I wish particularly to thank the Senate wives, who delayed their annual luncheon with the First Lady to be with her and all of us today.

Looking out over this gathering, recognizing so many of you, colleagues, friends, neighbors and soul mates of my father, I am reminded once again of what really matters in this life. Each of us is here only for a short while. We all have special things to offer, to one another and to this precious, fragile world we share. Before I thank my father for what he gave to us, I want to thank you for the love and care and affection you have shown to my parents over these many years. You are boon companions. You know what the word companion means. A companion is one who breaks bread with another. In the final analysis, the bread we break with one another is the bread of life and death. My father lived well and he died well. Above all, he was fortunate, throughout his journey to have you with him.

Today I am speaking for my brother, Chase, as well as for myself. As we look back upon our upbringing, one really quite extraordinary thing strikes home. Never did we sense that we were growing up in the household of a great man. We grew up in the household of a great father. He was present. He was kind. He was generous. Above all generous.

Two brief illustrations. My wife, Amy, and I were married in 1970. It was the spring of the invasion of Cambodia. We were less aware of my father's own relentless efforts to end the war, than we were of our disaffection from the entire establishment that had allowed that war to come about. Today I am a minister. I have performed more than 500 weddings. Never have I had to suffer through as lengthy, inflated and sanctimonious a set of vows as I myself inflicted upon the guests at my own wedding. Vows perhaps is the wrong word. It was more in the order of a proclamation or manifesto.

Well, my parents arrived, hard upon the debate over the Cooper-Church amendment, and my mother, who is perhaps the most talented politician I have ever known, was, understandably, and I must admit, volubly, appalled. My father simply got a little quieter than usual. "Forrest," he said, "there is nothing you might wish to say that I would ever censor. I have only one request. Speak your piece, but please don't release it to the press."

The second illustration has to do with my brother. Chase, unlike me, is a spontaneous, natural and gifted outdoorsman. We are nine years apart in age, and when I left home for college, my father and mother sensed and responded to Chase's passion for open spaces by renting a cabin every weekend in Pennsylvania. There was no phone. Dad and Mother declined social engagements that surely would have advanced his career. They walked the mountain paths. They fished. They shot skeet. And they reaffirmed a sense of priorities that most of us lose track of.

What it comes down to is not that our father was not a member of the club. It's just that he was a member of a different club. It wasn't exclusive. A lot of you were in it. And it was good.

One last thing. And this is the hardest thing for me to say, because there is so much pain in it. It is the kind of pain we would pray for, if we had any sense, for that is the way love is. The more you love the more you risk to lose. My father and my mother together were one of the great American love stories. As great as most of us will ever know. He is gone now. I really don't have to say anything more.

Thank you so very much, and God bless you all.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is closed.

MISCELLANEOUS TARIFF, TRADE, AND CUSTOMS MATTERS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will now resume consideration of the unfinished business, which the clerk will state.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 2163) to amend the Federal Boat Safety Act of 1971, and for other purposes.

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill.

Pending:

(1) Baker Amendment No. 3027, to further reduce deficits by including reconciliations and appropriations caps for defense and non-defense discretionary spending for fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987.

(2) Grassley Amendment No. 3043 (to Baker Amendment No. 3027), to freeze budget authorization levels for certain Federal programs at the fiscal year 1984 level.

AMENDMENT NO. 3043

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is amendment No. 3043, offered by the Senator from Iowa (Mr. GRASSLEY), for himself, the Senator from Kansas (Mrs. KASSEBAUM), the Senator from Delaware (Mr. BIDEN), and the Senator from Montana (Mr. BAUCUS), to amendment No. 3027.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DOMENICI. Is there any time agreement on the pending amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no time agreement on the pending amendment.

Mr. DOMENICI. Have the yeas and nays been ordered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have not been ordered.

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield the floor.

Mr. GRASSLEY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, from time to time I am going to add cosponsors to this amendment. At this point, I would like to add as cosponsors the Senator from Washington (Mr. EVANS), the Senator from Montana (Mr. MELCHER), the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS), and the Senator from Iowa (Mr. JEPSEN) as cosponsors of this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, last night the amendment offered by Senator KASSEBAUM, Senator BAUCUS, Senator BIDEN, and myself was laid down and is now the pending business before the Senate.

This matter of dealing with the budget deficit is the most important matter we will deal with this session of Congress. It is the one important thing that we are going to do that is going to signal to the business community and to the people of this country at large whether or not we are serious about getting the deficit under control, thereby reducing the pressure on interest rates, thereby solving the unemployment problem, and thereby keeping the recovery going. Anything short of dramatic action on our part I think is going to turn this economic recovery, this economic boom, into a fizzle.

We owe it to the American people to take dramatic action. We owe it to the American people not to do business as usual. It is because of business as usual that we are in the trouble we are in today.

I hope that my colleagues, both those on the floor and those who are listening elsewhere, will be cognizant of the importance of what we are talking about because we are trying to put a trend into Government that signals a new direction, new ideas, and to abandon the business as usual practice that has brought us $200 billion deficits that we see now and in the outyears, as far as we can see.

In conjunction with the overall discussion of whether or not we are going to reduce the deficits, I think we have to look beyond just what immediate matter, and look at the problems that have brought us to the situation where we are today; where we have in the past 4 or 5 years always expected things to get better, and, in fact, they have gotten worse.

We may fool ourselves, as was stated by the chairman of the Budget Committee yesterday, by thinking we are in a boom, that we really do not have much to worry about, that there are all sorts of signs and signals that the economy has turned around.

I do not disagree with the signals. But most of what will be said by us in 1984, as true as it might be, serves no purpose other than to help us as the majority party and the President of the United States look good between now and the November elections.

What we have a responsibility to do here is to look beyond the November elections in the actions we are talking now, and consider the impact, good or bad in the years ahead.

I say now, as I have just said, that if we do not do something dramatic about these deficits then we are going to turn this economic boom—which is in fact a boom, and one that I am proud to speak of—into a fizzle.

We need to look beyond the next election and see what is the impact we are making today on the future. If we do not learn anything else out of this debate, we ought to remember that the decisions we are making are going to have a long-range impact, not only upon this generation of politicians, but upon this generation of young people who have to pay for the mistakes that we make. So each one of us ought to look to the young people who are employees of this Senate as pages and their generation of people as we consider the decisions we are about to make, and consider whether or not we do not have to be overly concerned about $200 billion deficits; and concerned about not only what impact our decisions have on the near-term political impact in the 1984 election or the near-term impact on this economy, but also the impact on the burden of young people who have to pay the interest on the national debt.

Part of the information I am going to present is, quite frankly, relates to a need for better planning. If we are only off 1 percentage point on interest rates, or 1 percentage point off on the growth of the GNP, we can be talking about $120 billion deficits greater than what we otherwise anticipate for the fiscal year 1989 baseline deficit as we use the rosy figures that come out of CBO and OMB.

In regard to this, I have passed out for the benefit of all Members a series of charts measuring the planning competence of this Congress since the origin of the Budget Reform Act of 1975.

For those of you who were here in 1973 and 1974, as this Budget Act was passed, I do not know what sort of solution to the problems you had then with the budget deficits before you at that time, how you viewed this Budget Act might help to solve those problems. But I think as we look now we can only conclude that the Budget Act was not and end-all for the planning problems that we had then and which we still have.

These charts will show you the results of our budget plans over the last several years.

They basically show that the planning competence of the Congress has not been very good. I have provided each of these charts for the benefit of my colleagues.

For those who are not in eyesight of these charts, I would like to describe them.

The charts tell the relationship between plans for future budgets versus what actually happened. These charts tell the relationship between the real versus the unreal.

The easiest way to describe these charts is to say that reality goes in exactly the opposite direction as what we planned for.

The mismatch is becoming more and more severe.

The mismatch is true of actual deficits, as one chart will show. Another chart shows it is true of baseline deficits; The GNP; unemployment; revenues; outlays; tax expenditures; and I can go on and on to develop charts in almost every area of statistical gathering that we use in our planning for the future during the budget process. Its occurrence is systematic, it is predictable, and it has always been wrong. Yet it is the basis upon which we plan our budgets every year. To borrow a phrase, something is amiss.

These charts shine a bright spotlight on our planning incompetence. We fail to understand the long-term consequences of current decisions. Even more accurately, we cover up and hide the long-term consequences of our current decisions. The data shows a systematic underestimation of costs and spending, but more severe is our constant overestimation of resources, or revenues—the income of the Federal Government. By overestimating our resources, we make undisciplined spending decisions seem very disciplined. We mislead ourselves.

When the revenues fail to come in as optimistically projected, what do we do? You know what we do, Mr. President: We add to the deficit from year to year. That is how we have added to the deficit until we have gotten ourselves up to $200 billion deficits for each of the years as far as we can see into the future.

We have reached a very critical point. We have become overextended and the baseline deficits for this year are going to be, once again, $200 billion. Meanwhile, interest rates are rising. Just within the last month, we have seen the prime go up 1 percentage point. If interest rates just stay at the level that we have projected over the next 5 years, we must add over $100 billion to the $300 billion baseline deficit that we have projected for fiscal year 1989. And, of course, if interest rates keep rising, that 1989 baseline deficit would approach $500 billion and maybe surpass it.

These figures were given to me by OMB Director David Stockman. We are talking about just a little movement in the interest rates upward. We are talking about interest rates just staying constant, where they are now—because we have projected them to go down in the next several years. If they just stay constant, the cost of interest on the national debt is going to be such that the young people I referred to are not going to be able even to produce enough to pay the interest on the national debt, let alone support the programs that we now have.

The Congressional Budget Office figures would also lead us to the same conclusion. CBO projects real growth from fiscal year 1983 to fiscal year 1989 to average 3.8 percent. That covers seven consecutive years of growth at 3.3 percent or greater. This kind of sustained growth has never happened in post-war America. I think we have to emphasize that we are projecting a rosy future as we develop fiscal year 1985 budgets that show a sustained growth rate that has never happened before in the history of our country. Yet we are making decisions today based upon those rosy projections that have never happened and, based upon the charts I have shown, never will happen.

CBO predicts that if GNP averages only 2.8 percent instead of 3.8 percent, 1 percentage point less than those rosy projections I have talked about, the 1989 deficits are going to be $120 billion higher than we anticipate they will be.

Not only is the average 3.8 percent assumption unrealistic, it is obviously an absurdity as a baseline projection. It is a fact of political life that recessions are never predicted, despite the fact that recessions do occur; 28 of them since 1855, when we started keeping track of them—and of course, nine since World War II. So boom-and-bust cycles are part of our history. They are predictable. We ought to be working them into our equation. But we do not.

Why are not recessions predicted? They are not because politicians, like each of us in this room, do not like to talk about recessions. It is that simple. Consequently, what we have been doing for the last several years is making policy decisions in ignorance and avoidance of reality. It is no wonder, then, that as demonstrated by these charts I have passed out to each Member of the Senate, plans and realities move in inverse directions.

I raise these facts to make two points. First, deficits are not the real problem. I am guilty of talking about deficits all the time. I have already stated in my remarks this morning that they are a problem. But the fact of the matter is that deficits are not the real problem. They are only symptoms of the problem.

The real problem that we ought to be dealing with as 100 Members of this body is our planning incompetence, fed by a narcotic of planning optimism. We always plan for an optimistic future that never materializes. We always plan wearing rose-colored glasses. In time, the rose in the glasses wears off and then we see the real world in front of us. Somehow, in 1984 on May 2, as I stand here, shocked about the fact that we have $200 billion deficits projected, the fact of the matter is the symptoms will only get worse. We need to be attacking right now the real underlying problem head-on: That is, our planning assumptions.

The second point is that until we have a better idea of what we are getting ourselves into, we should abandon outyear budgeting. We try to project the future so we can make some long-range planning. But unless we change the way we do our planning the second and third year and the fourth and fifth year, it is just a waste of time, we do so poorly.

There is one and only one binding year for the Federal budget each year. Our track record demonstrates an utter inability to even come close to projecting reality beyond 1 fiscal year. This is the best case I know for arguing a 1-year budget. In light of these points, let us contrast the deficit-reduction plans before us.

The plan that was announced in the rose garden, referred to as the leadership plan, reduces the fiscal year 1985 deficit by $16 billion. In it is only $5 billion of spending reduction. The bulk of those savings are in the outyears. Those happen to be the same elusive, nonbinding years that I have already talked about. And as I mention the mistakes of the past, there is something about this plan that ought to sound very familiar to us. This rose garden, leadership package would be the next installment in that pathology on the deficit chart that I referred to.

All you have to do is extend each one of these charts that I gave you just one more year and we will not have to wait until next year to find out how wrong our approach is. Our plans would show declining deficits, but of course in reality they would grow.

By contrast, this bipartisan budget freeze, Grassley-Kassebaum-Baucus and Biden, is a 1-year freeze. Everything is upfront. It is a response to our planning disarray. We are giving, through our budget, an opportunity to get at the real causes of the problem. It neither indulges in the narcotic of optimism nor engages in outyear uncertainties. All savings are real savings. They are right there. They are going to be determined by this body of U.S. Senators. It is not going to be left to the future. Also, these savings are evenly distributed among defense and entitlements. No other budget comes close to doing that. Budget savings in fiscal year 1985 equal $27 billion compared to $5 billion in the rose garden leadership plan.

Most important, the freeze represents a shared sacrifice. All elements of the budget are treated equally. A 1-year freeze will give us a momentary handle on a moving target. It will provide us time to analyze the extent and causes of our planning shortcomings, and it might provide us with a glimpse of direction for further policy savings.

It gives us time. We need time. We have never found the time in the past. Of course, the greatest obstacle that we have in the path of sustained recovery is the absence of consensus on the direction of tax and budget policy. We never really take time to think about that. We are all united in the goal of reducing the Federal budget deficit. I would not accuse a single Senator of not being sincere in his own individual way that he, first of all, believes we ought to reduce the deficit and, two, he has a sincere and workable plan for doing it, at least for the first year. I am not so sure I could say that for the second or third year. But the problem is finding a combination of budget elements that will fit into a significant deficit reduction box.

We have seen the combination agreed upon in the rose garden. The goal there was to preserve the budget elements, not lower the deficit. May I say that again.

What was decided by leadership and by the President was to preserve the budget elements, as if those elements were ends in themselves. Their decisions were not to deal with the deficit, and more important not to deal with the underlying problems. That is a coalition approach. It was a coalition of those who want higher defense spending, higher domestic spending, and a few tax increases. The resulting budget package that was developed by the leadership shows little or no budget savings—only $5 billion in spending in the first and only binding year.

I have to explain, for those who might take offense at what I said, that the leadership budget shows little or no budget savings because, by constitutional law, we are not going to bind any succeeding Congress. The only real gain as far as budget savings are concerned is what we are going to save this year. And more than twice the amount that the leadership plan would save to reduce the deficit is going to come in tax increases. Not only are budget savings scarce but they are also ill-balanced between defense and entitlements, and in the remainder of the budget.

If real restraint and deficit reduction is to be achieved by this Congress, a consensus for doing so must be built among the public. We must earn the moral support of the American people. A prerequisite of that support is for the Congress to provide moral leadership so people will understand the nature of the sacrifice each one of us must make. Without moral leadership there can be no consensus, and without consensus there can be no solution to the economic and fiscal problems facing our country.

Too often we think in terms of the economics of the situation we are dealing with today, what it does to interest rates. We approach it merely from a materialistic standpoint. But there is a morality involved: Whether or not it is right for my generation of policymakers to live high on the hog, to build up the Federal budget deficit, not curtail programs out of control, have a high standard of living today, and put off the paying of that bill to the young people, young people such as those represented here today as pages of the U.S. Senate. We ought to go into this discussion today with some sort of guilt complex about the burden we have put on the shoulders of the young people of this Nation, and we ought to do what we can today to change the symptoms—and the deficit is only one of those symptoms—of the underlying structural problems so we will not continue to load debt upon debt upon debt on the young people of this country.

Now, debt is legitimate in times of war and national crisis when the preservation of the Nation is at stake, but in times of peace and prosperity, as we have right now, they are not a demonstration of a moral approach by our country's leaders.

Many of you have been listening to me talk about a budget freeze for 3 years. This is in fact the third consecutive year. This is the first year this issue has reach the floor of the Senate, even though I have brought it up each year in the Budget Committee. But it has reached the floor of the Senate this year because our situation has not gotten better, though all the time we were led to believe it would. And more people now are waking up to the necessity for taking dramatic action to get the budget deficit under control.

But from the very beginning I have perceived that this approach of a budget freeze enjoys widespread public support—it is probably less necessary to build public support for this deficit reduction package than any other one we will be considering. Today, that support has grown in leaps and bounds in the grassroots.

Our biggest failure has been to not recognize the willingness of our grassroots constituents to sacrifice for the good of the country. We in Congress have become hostage to the stale perception that no one will tolerate a cut in this benefit or a cut in that program.

It is my belief that the way to create a moral bond between the people and Congress, to accomplish meaningful change, is to present the people of this country with solutions that are fair and equal. But no budget is fair unless it deals with all programs on an equal basis. That is truly the only way we will reduce the growth of Federal spending.

Three years ago, when I initially proposed a budget freeze, the one area I lost support for was the defense budget. So last year I set out with a vengeance to prove that the defense budget can and should be subject to a freeze, the same as any other budget.

To my own satisfaction, to the public's satisfaction, and to that of many Members of Congress, we uncovered a planning nightmare in the Pentagon which has been producing a systematic reduction in our Armed Forces, at ever-increasing costs.

I wonder if my colleagues understand that because of this planning problem in the Pentagon, we are actually getting less for our money—that is, reducing our Armed Forces—and it is costing us more while we do it.

The Pentagon problem is not unlike our own budget problems here in the Congress. In Congress, our planning incompetence produces massive deficits. The Pentagon's planning incompetence produces less defense more expensively.

No one who has looked at the evidence we have uncovered over the last year and a half can have the slightest doubt that a freeze should apply equally to the defense budget and the rest of the budget. Believe me, there are structural problems in the Pentagon which would make even the most conservative Members of this body, myself included, eager to make sweeping changes. And it is critical that we do so, or we face the danger of losing the moral support of the people.

If you do not think that a closely-knit social fabric in this Nation is as important to the defense of this country as how many tanks and planes we have, then I say you are not looking at the real defense strength of this Nation in its totality; because a strong nation defense-wise is not a strong nation if the people of this country do not feel a part of it, if they are not a group closely knit in the defense of our Nation. There must be staying power behind each effort we make defense-wise, and the moral support of our people is a necessary part of that.

Right now, I have a feeling, as I go around our country, as I travel in my own State, that our people have doubts about whether their money is being spent wisely in the Defense Department.

Also, there tends to be a growing acknowledgement of the fairness of an across-the-board freeze approach to reduce deficits. The freeze proposal now before the Senate has received strong endorsement from the business community. With the four of us from the very beginning in our efforts have been business executives for National Security, the National Federation of Independent Business, and the National Taxpayers Union. I should like to acknowledge the efforts and credibility these groups have contributed to the evolution of this proposal, both procedurally and substantively.

Recently—right now—at a time when their support was critical, our proposal has received strong endorsements from the National Association of Manufacturers, the American Farm Bureau, the National Grange, and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. We have also received a strong endorsement from former Treasury Secretary William Simon, one of the country's most noted and respected experts on financial and fiscal policies.

I know that particularly on my side of the aisle there are many Members who respect the judgment of William Simon, who served as Secretary of the Treasury during the Ford administration. He probably has even grown in tremendous respect since going back to the private sector, because of his writings and his speaking out. Perhaps those who have some doubts about the Senator from Iowa would look to the leadershp of William Simon over the last 3 or 4 years, in getting this budget deficit under control, and decided whether or not they really should be on the side opposite that of Bill Simon.

We also are endorsed by the Council for a Competitive Economy, and we have received qualified support from the National Association of Home Builders and the National Association of Realtors.

These endorsements represent a far-reaching cross-section of the Nation's most productive sectors, as well as representing the views of their membership at the grass roots. It is an indication of broad support across the country, support which many of our colleagues have failed to recognize.

I should like to draw the attention of my conservative Republican colleagues to a letter signed by 30 of their conservative colleagues on the House side in support of the freeze. A copy of this letter has been placed on the desk of each Senator.

I should like to thank Representative DENNY SMITH of Oregon for coordinating this letter and for all his support and effort in this issue.

I hope my conservative colleagues in the Senate realize that this is as much a conservative budget as will ever come before us with a chance to pass. Most important, this support is an indication of the desire to take a very dramatic step right now, this very year, toward reducing the Federal deficit. It is an indication that we are not going to make any more of those mistakes that we made in 1982 and 1983 and that we might make in 1984.

Such widespread support for this freeze gives us the opportunity to do what we have been telling our constituents all along we want to accomplish: to reduce deficits and interest rates.

Mr. President, if we allow this opportunity to slip through our fingers, this opportunity at real deficit reduction, we will regret it. I fear that the unfolding fiscal disorder may reach unmanageable proportions.

Surely, if we fail to freeze this year, our decisions next year would have to be drastic, and perhaps imprudent.

I urge my colleagues to support this freeze now, so that we can get busy on long-term structural changes needed to sustain this economic boom.

Mr. President, I thank my colleagues on both sides of the aisle for their support and hard work in making this bold approach a viable alternative for this year's budget decisions.

I thank Senators KASSEBAUM, BIDEN, and BAUCUS for their leadership from the outset in this regard and Senators EVANS, MATTINGLY, MELCHER, and TSONGAS for their efforts now.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the "Dear Colleague" letter, dated May 1, 1984, to which I referred, urging support for this budget plan.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, May 1, 1984.

DEAR SENATE REPUBLICAN COLLEAGUE: As Republican Members of the House extremely concerned about the giant projected federal deficit, we are writing to urge you to vote for the Kassebaum-Grassley-Biden budget plan currently under consideration in the Senate.

The Kassebaum-Grassley-Biden budget plan calls for a one-year, across-the-board budget freeze. It is a plan that is fair. It is a plan that is fiscally responsible. And it is a plan that has our complete support.

We are cosponsors of House Resolution 468, a bill calling on all House committees to apply an across-the-board budget freeze in their formulation of the FY 1985 budget. We are convinced that a one-year budget freeze at FY 1984 authorization levels is the most significant first step the Congress can take to address the deficit problem.

A vote for the Kassebaum-Grassley-Biden budget plan is the strongest signal you can send to the American people that Congress is serious about cutting the huge projected federal deficit.

The Congress must make a substantive effort to cut the deficit now. Next year is too late. Please cast your vote in support of the Kassebaum-Grassley-Biden budget plan.

Sincerely,

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I thank you, and I am happy to yield the floor at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas is recognized.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Mr. President, I only wish to briefly comment on a couple of things that have been said about the 1-year freeze.

I greatly respect the leadership of the Senator from Iowa (Mr. GRASSLEY) on this issue, to which he has devoted much time and effort not only this year but in the last several years.

It has been said that this is unrealistic, that this approach is simplistic, that we cannot accomplish it this year, but its time is coming, we are a year ahead of ourselves on this.

Mr. President, I say to you that the public is ready to see us do something responsible now. It is not easy for any of us, because we are all concerned about various aspects of the budget. How do we and can we effectively assure those who are on retirement income that they will not be hurt? How can we assure those who care about the strength of our defense system that it will not be undermined by capping the budget authority for defense to last year's funding level?

These are questions I think that we have answered and we will continue to answer during the course of this debate.

But, Mr. President, let me assure you that the public as a whole feels very strongly about the need to do something now and they are willing to accept what reductions might occur if they feel it is equitable and it is across the board.

I do not think any of us would prefer to take an approach such as this which in many ways is somewhat simplistic, but we have reached a point where I am not sure we can deal with it any other way.

I only wish briefly to comment on defense spending. The defense budget under this proposal will be $264 billion, the second largest item in our budget.

I think many of us who have studied the defense issue closely and who feel strongly about a strong defense system realize that what this simply does is say we have to look to the priorities of our defense spending. The day of reckoning is here upon us now.

Everyone realizes that at some point this will have to be done because in many ways our elaborate systems that we have voted for and projected out are underfunded and at some point we are going to have to be realistic and drastically increase the spending or we will have to force ourselves into making decisions about the priorities that we feel are important and when they are important.

It is a case of just good, sound efficient management.

Many of us feel that actually the strength of our Nation does rest on sound fiscal policy. It is not only for our own domestic programs and the protection of the elderly and the young from increasing interest rates, from escalating inflation, but it is also our trade relationships with the rest of the world. Third World nations have enormous debt burdens which can only be significantly improved and strengthened in their relations of strategic importance in the world if indeed we lead the way on this type of budget approach which guarantees, I think, a real shot in the arm for the economy and interest rates will go down or remain steady.

I feel, Mr. President, this is the best time for us to take this type of action. It is 1 year. But it is at a time that we can say hold a minute and let us analyze where we are going. It is at a time that the inflation rate has remained low. It is at a time when there is a lot of vitality and confidence in the country that indeed we have turned the corner.

But there is a lingering doubt if we have the will and the commitment to really govern here or if we will continue to do business somewhat as usual.

I applaud those who worked long and hard on the leadership efforts to get a budget which they feel does reflect a wide variety of interests. But there are a great number of people not only here, in the House of Representatives and the Senate, but in the country who think it is not enough, that indeed we need a major boost in our economy at this time.

I cannot tell you, Mr. President, how important it is for a Senator from a farm State to address what is really an extremely crucial concern to farmers. It is one weak spot in the economy, and farmers do not know how they are going to get out of the crunch they find themselves in if they cannot see some relief in interest rates and some future ahead for being able to stay alive in the marketplace. This is true for many small businessmen as well.

As I say, it is not an easy step to take and each of us will have to ask ourselves if we can, as a matter of fact, for one more year manage an efficient budget on the same moneys that we have over this past year.

I think we can, Mr. President, and I think the signal it would send would be immediate, and dramatic and give the country a great deal of confidence that we can continue what has been started, and that is major change in fiscal policy and in good governance.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, we have been in a quorum call for 15 or 20 minutes. I just have some brief remarks to make on this matter myself. I do not know whether the Senator from New Mexico has any remarks to present. I wondered if anyone else wanted to speak.

Now that I have the floor, I think I might go ahead and make a tabling motion. But if anybody else desires to speak——

Mr. BIDEN. I would like to suggest the Senator make the tabling motion and I will make a tabling motion immediately upon the offering of his amendment.

Mr. DOMENICI. I think that would be fine.

Mr. CHILES. The Senator from New Mexico likes that.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BOSCHWITZ). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, I have not and will not make a practice of quoting my own remarks which I previously presented in this Chamber, but I think it is appropriate under the current circumstances to make this one-time exception.

Last week I presented a statement in strong support of the bipartisan, 1-year freeze as the only balanced and equitable proposal, which results in substantial and immediate budget deficit reduction. As part of that statement, I suggested, "For our elderly citizens, immediate actions to reduce the deficit should result—and I strongly believe will result—in lower interest and lower inflation rates. That has a direct, decisive impact on the cost of the food and energy and shelter, which are the major elements of these persons' incomes.

"Lower inflation rates, incidentally, when you think about it, are nontaxable benefits. No tax is taken from the benefits accuring from lower prices. This benefit then spreads to all sectors."

To further quote, "We are constantly hearing requirements for substantial real growth as opposed to current dollar growth in defense expenditures. But that comes in two ways: from budget dollars which are appropriated, but also from the purchasing power of those dollars.

"What we can buy for our military establishment as well as all other functions of the Federal Government is as much determined by future rates of inflation as by new budget authority."

Mr. President, let me digress for a moment on the question of defense spending.

During my term as Governor, we lived through periods of economic boom followed by substantial and immediate economic distress. During that period of economic and budgetary distress, I directed all agencies of State government to prioritize programs as to their importance to their departments, but moreover to the citizens of Washington State. In turn, each agency was to live within the resources available.

I moved from that experience to this Washington and find myself frustrated with discussions that suggest that the Department of Defense cannot prioritize its spending, saying, "We need everything that is requested." But this bipartisan, 1-year freeze—and let me emphasize the 1-year nature of it, 365 days—will force the Department of Defense to do just what they suggest is impossible: To prioritize, to live within a reasonable level of committed resources.

We can no longer afford to give any department of this Government a blank check.

Let me return to a discussion of economic concerns.

Econometric models suggest that a reduction in the deficit will provide for decreased rates of interest and inflation. Beyond the academic exercise of predicting what economic factors will result, we are all aware of the psychological influence and message of confidence that Congress will send by substantially reducing the Federal deficit. I believe with all my heart that if the job is done well, we will move inflation and interest rates downward.

I think there is perhaps no better judge as to the future direction of interest rates than the controller of money supply in this country. Federal Reserve Chairman Volcker, during February 10, 1984, testimony before the Joint Economic Committee, urged swift action on cutting deficits, saying, "You take increasing chances with the American economy" the longer deficit cuts are deferred.

Mr. Volcker urged cuts of $50 billion in fiscal 1985, saying that that would cause interest rates to drop by 2 full percentage points. He is making a prediction like anyone else can make a prediction, but he sits in an unusually sensitive position of authority.

The freeze which has been suggested, coupled with the revenues which have already been adopted by this body, will save $48 billion, or reduce the Federal deficit by $48 billion from the modified baseline which other Members are using.

That is close to the $50 billion that Chairman Volcker suggests is appropriate. Moreover, it is substantially more—substantially more than the proposal of the leadership and of the President.

I have said before that I will vote for that package if it is the only alternative remaining, but I do not believe it is sufficient. Chairman Volcker apparently does not believe it is sufficient. I think it is important for us to take bold enough action to insure that the results really occur.

Figures on rising employment, real income, production, consumer and business confidence, productivity and progress against inflation all "go a long way toward setting the stage for a long period of greater prosperity—I believe we now have a rare opportunity to set in train a long period of growth and stability."

With the level of interest rates playing a major role in insuring continued economic growth and continued containment of rising inflation, we have the opportunity to present to our citizens a dollar that purchases programs that range from a strong defense to that which provides stable payments to those recipients of social security.

It allows us to purchase more with each budget dollar for the many programs of our domestic as well as foreign responsibilities. I firmly believe in the bipartisan 1-year freeze and hope that some of my questioning colleagues will join me and other supporters in this commitment: A 1-year commitment, an immediate commitment, a substantial commitment, and one which I believe will bring results.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, it may be that the concept of the freeze is too new in some respects for Members of the body to consider. I think we have established a case for why it needs to be done at this particular time. We have already instituted, just within the last month, a freeze on one aspect of the budget and one very large segment of the American economy. That is in regard to farm programs. I wish to point out to the Members of this body the mini farm bill that passed here just before the Easter recess. In that bill, we froze 1985 target prices for feed grains and wheat at the 1984 level, even though things are very tough in the agricultural areas and income there is not very good because of drought and particularly because of high interest rates. But it has been received generally favorably in the farm community, and I think that is evidence that a very large segment of our economy is, right now, showing self-sacrifice and willing to go along with the concept of a freeze. I am sure, though, that they would expect all of us to share in that. That means all Government programs, defense and nondefense. As a matter of fairness to the agricultural sector of this economy, those of us who voted for a freeze on target prices ought to consider whether or not we can go home to our farmers and justify a freeze there without also going home and saying, "You know, we adopted a very dramatic budget; we really took dramatic action to get the budget deficit under control, and even though it was very dramatic, all sections of the Federal budget and all segments of the economy bore a fair share; it was fair and equitable."

I wish to have my colleagues think about that as they go about the rest of the day analyzing what they want to do in regard to this.

I am sorry also, Mr. President, that I did not get a chance before he left the floor to say that Senator EVANS of the State of Washington just delivered a brilliant statement on the subject of the freeze. As a cosponsor of this amendment, he has been very supportive of that effort.

I think, too, that what we do not often think about is that the laboratories of government are State governments. They have had to take even more dramatic action than we are doing here. I am sure that maybe even when Senator EVANS was then Governor EVANS, he indicated in his remarks that he had to take fairly dramatic action in an instance or two. I know in my own State of Iowa, not only have budgets been frozen, in many respects they have been reduced several times in the last 3 or 4 years as further evidence that if governments must do something, it can be done.

States are different from our Federal Government in the sense that they have constitutional requirements for a balanced budget that we do not have. As I stated in my remarks, what happens when our projections do not work out as we anticipated? We just add to the deficit. State governments cannot do that. That is an argument not so much for my freeze as it is an argument for a constitutional requirement for a balanced budget.

It does show that it can be done there, if we have the experience. Senator EVANS stated it from experience better than others can, and I understand 10 to a dozen Members of this body are former chief executives of their respective States. We ought to be willing to bite the bullet as people at other levels of government have to do and are willing to do.

Mr. President, I only add one additional point to comment on something that Senator EVANS stated. He referred to Chairman Volcker's response to the Rose Garden leadership proposal that everybody is trying to find some excuse to vote for. He said that it really would not help much with the problem of interest rates. I, myself, did not hear Chairman Volcker say that, but rather his general statement that we have to do something about the deficit and particularly the long-term trends of deficit if we are going to get interest rates down.

But I can say that last night at a reception I had an opportunity to have a short conversation with another member of the Federal Reserve. I shall not state his name, but he is a member that I have had occasion to have some conversations with often the past couple of years. His comment was that what is going to be done by this Congress if it follows the direction of the Rose Garden proposal is not enough—not because, collectively, it might not be enough, but because so little is happening in each one of the years and because there is not anything dramatic being done up front, in fiscal year 1985. So I wish to add one other person's reaction from the Federal Reserve to what is considered to be the leading proposal around here for budget reduction. I would like to tell my colleagues that for most of those who support the leadership plan and think it is the answer to our problems as an effort to get interest rates under control, there is ample evidence from the economic community, the best of it coming from the Federal Reserve Board, that it is not going to do the job.

I think at this point, it just reemphasizes what so many of us have previously said, that we need to do something very dramatic. We need to send a signal and the rose garden proposal is not sending any signal at all.

From that standpoint, Mr. President, again, I urge consideration by my colleagues of a more dramatic proposal, a 1-year across-the-board freeze, something that is fair and equitable.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I take the floor to compliment Senator KASSEBAUM, Senator GRASSLEY, and Senator BIDEN on offering this amendment. I am proud to be a cosponsor of the amendment.

The reason we are offering this amendment is very simple. In a nutshell, it is because we believe that the other budget proposals before Congress, particularly those before the Senate, are inadequate.

The other budget proposals before the Congress are good-faith efforts and good-faith attempts to reduce deficits. The budget proposal proposed by the President and the majority party, the plan proposed by the House Democrats, and third, the plan proposed by the Senator from Florida (Mr. CHILES) are all very laudable. They all, as much as they can, strive to reduce deficits. But still, the fact is that these plans do not go far enough. That is the sole reason why Senator KASSEBAUM, Senator GRASSLEY, Senator BIDEN, and I are offering our 1-year budget freeze.

Mr. President, I do not have to dwell on figures and statistics in order to demonstrate the difficult position we are in, how difficult it will be for our country to continue recovering, how difficult it will be to get interest rates down, unless we bring deficits down more quickly than we seem to be doing.

In the first 208 years of our country's history—that is, from the birth of America to today—our country has accumulated a total national debt of about $1.5 trillion. Contrast that with the accumulated debt that is projected for the rest of the 1980's: During the next 7 years, our total accrued national debt will virtually double. In 1990 it will be close to $3 trillion.

Federal deficits are increasing exponentially. The national debt is already much bigger than anyone would have predicted several years ago.

What does all this mean? No one knows for sure.

To pay this debt off all at once, every American would have to contribute $13,000.

These deficits hurt us dramatically:

They take money out of the pocket of each working man and woman.

They inflate the value of the dollar.

They make U.S. exports more expensive.

They make foreign imports cheaper.

They drive up interest rates.

They rob us of jobs.

Over the next few years, the Federal Government will borrow more than half of our net domestic investment capital to finance the deficit.

There would not be much left for people who want to build a house, a factory, or a shopping center.

That will send interest rates through the roof.

And that will end the chance for a sustained recovery.

And, worst of all, these deficits mortgage our children's future.

We will force them to pay for our mistakes.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. President, let me just talk for a few minutes on how high interest rates are hurting one sector of our economy: agriculture.

It was not too long ago when the interest rate that most farmers paid on loans was about 7 percent. That was the common rate in 1970. What is it now? The rate has doubled, to 15 and 17 percent.

We all know, Mr. President, that farmers have to borrow. Most businesses have to borrow. Small businesses have to pay whatever the market rate is.

Today some would have us believe that interest rates have come down a little compared to what were a few years ago. In fact, real interest rates are today at an alltime high. The real rate of interest, the difference between the interest rate and the rate of inflation, is at an all time high.

In addition to the cost of borrowing money for this year's operations, today farmers are paying about $20 billion interest on loans that they have outstanding. That is equivalent to the net income of America's farmers. The $20 billion of income farmers are earning this year is offset by $20 billion in the interest payments farmers have to make. And this is not just a problem on paper—in my State of Montana, 51 percent of all farmers who have Farmers Home Administrator loans are delinquent on those loans.

In addition to hurting important sectors of our domestic economy, high interest rates threaten our ability to export American products.

Let us look at the international side of the equation.

In 1977, America exported about $20 billion in total agricultural exports. The European Economic Community in that same year exported about $12 billion in agricultural exports. Thus in 1977 we had about a 2-to-1 advantage.

What is the situation today? Look at the 1983 totals. The United States has exported in 1983 about $33 billion in total agricultural exports. What has the EEC exported in that same year? In 1983, alone $33 billion in total agricultural exports.

While the United States had a near 2-to-1 advantage in 1977, we have now a 1-to-1 ratio in total agricultural exports with the European Economic Community.

So it is clear that the United States is losing out in agricultural exports.

Mr. President, you might ask why. What has happened? Well, in part, the problem is high interest rates in America which are caused by high budget deficits.

High interest rates push up the value of the American dollar. The American dollar is now highly overvalued compared to other countries' currencies.

What does this mean? Well, for one thing it means that American exporters have to add on a surcharge to the price of the products they are trying to sell overseas. Most economists say that the differential between the U.S. dollar and other countries' currencies average between 20 to 30 percent. That is, the U.S. dollar is now overvalued by about 20 to 30 percent compared to other countries' currencies.

That means that we in America, we who are trying to export, have to try to compete in international markets despite a 20- to 30-percent surcharge on the products we are trying to export overseas. It also means, correspondingly, that we Americans—and this is the good news—find that we are subsidizing imports to the tune of 20 to 30 percent.

It should be no surprise that American agricultural exports have declined, and that we are losing jobs.

We are exporting about 2 to 3 million jobs overseas because of high interest rates and a highly overvalued dollar.

What worries us, the cosponsors of this amendment, is that unless this trend changes, next year and the year after our economy is going to be in much worse shape than it is today. Any problems we are suffering this year will pale in comparison with the economic devastation we will probably experience in future years.

In fact, Mr. President, these are not only my views. They are the views of a lot of people who follow these matters much more closely than I do. One is Paul Volcker, the Chairman of the Federal Reserve System. It is his view and it is my view, and I think it is the view of most Americans, that the longer we postpone the day of reckoning, the longer we postpone significantly getting these budget deficts down, the more likely we are going to experience, some kind of severe economic dislocation.

On February 24, 1983, over a year ago, Paul Volcker, Chairman of the Federal Reserve System, testified before the Senate Budget Committee about the deficit threat. I ask unanimous consent that a portion of his remarks be entered in the RECORD at this point:

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXCERPT OF REMARKS OF MR. PAUL VOLCKER

The most obvious obstacle to sustained recovery is the prospect of huge federal deficits even as the economy expands. In the last fiscal year, the Federal Deficit was a record $111 billion. The President's new budget report projects a deficit in the current fiscal year nearly double last year's figure and further growth into the foreseeable future in the absence of determined action to alter that outlook.

The members of this Committee, of course, are aware of the enormity of these projected deficits, but there may be a danger that numbers in the $200 billion range have been cited so frequently as to make them seem almost comfortable and familiar. No matter how readily $200 billion slips off the tongue, the hard fact remains that deficits of that magnitude would preempt an unprecedented share of our net savings, keep "real" interest rates high, and divert funds from the investment and the housing we need and want.

To be sure, a substantial part of the current deficit—projected at about 6.5 percent of the GNP—reflects the impact of the recession on the budget. Slack economic activity and higher unemployment have cut deeply into revenues and boosted outlays for unemployment benefits and other automatic stabilizers. At a time when investment is weak and private credit demands have slackened, these cyclically induced deficits have helped support spendable income and buoy the economy. They have not, in the midst of deep recession, been inconsistant with declines in interest rates—but interest rates have, as you know, remained high relative to the current rate of inflation.

As the economy recovers, the cyclical portion of the deficit will recede. But as things now stand the deficit itself will not. Higher revenues from economic growth and reduced spending for unemployment compensation will be offset by—and possibly more than offset by—growth in other spending programs and the effects of earlier tax changes. In other words, through the mid- and late-1980s, a huge imbalance would remain even if the economy were operating at much lower levels of unemployment—and assuming inflation remains under control.

All that is familiar to you—and it is equally familiar to the financial markets, where the prospect of a major structural imbalance in the government's finances has an impact on current interest rates. It is not just the direct demand for funds to finance the Treasury that is of concern but the fear that ballooning federal borrowing needs will, in effect, bring extraordinary pressure on the Federal Reserve to monetize the deficits, with implications for inflation itself, for inflation expectations, and for inflation premiums in nominal interest rates.

One implication is that, to the extent the budget deficit appears to be intractable, the burden placed on monetary policy to demonstrate the government's resolve to follow a non-inflationary course is intensified. The converse is equally true: meaningful action to demonstrate the government's economic discipline on the fiscal side would reinforce confidence that monetary policy over the years ahead can do its job in maintaining a course consistent with price stability without intolerable market pressure.

It is tempting for some to suggest that the budget problem and its consequences for the performance of the economy could be solved by monetary policy. But excessive money creation to meet the needs of the government would only reinforce and validate the fears of renewed inflation, and sooner or later, higher interest rates. In the end, excessive monetary growth would put us in an even more unsatisfactory situation, with still more deeply ingrained inflation expectations and greater skepticism about the ability of our nation to manage its economic affairs. Nothing real would be gained for long, and hard-won ground in the battle against inflation would be lost.

In concept, any inflationary impact from the budget can be contained by appropriate monetary policy. But the harsh implications of excessive deficits for other credit-dependent sectors of the economy would clearly remain.

I don't want to suggest there is a simple trade-off, as sometimes suggested, between future budget policy and current monetary policy. Reducing the threat of these large structural deficits stretching out to the end of the decade in and of itself should have favorable effects on current interest rates and in damping concerns about future increases. In that real sense, budgetary virtue will provide its own tangible reward.

But those benefits would ultimately be lost if monetary policy were to abandon its continuing and necessary concern with restoring reasonable price stability. That point remains central.

What can be said is that a better fiscal outlook, with all it implies, would certainly provide a better environment in the financial markets today, reduce concern about future inflation and an early rebound in interest rates, and moderate preoccupations that the Federal Reserve itself might somehow be forced to retreat from its basic anti-inflationary course. As things stand, with monetary policy assumed to be the only bulwark against renewed inflation and a high degree of sensitivity to the past failures in efforts to contain inflation, every twist and turn in the monetary aggregates or short-term policy actions interpreted as "easing" is closely scrutinized as a sign or symbol of intentions over a longer period. Clear progress in dealing with the budget could, in that sense, somewhat enhance our operating flexibility, so long as we succeed in reinforcing the basic point that the effort to sustain the progress against inflation is intact.

As you know better than I, the process to cut down those future deficits must start now, and with energy and force. Basic budget trends take time to change, but the knowledge that they will be changed will affect markets now. The amounts involved are large, but certainly not beyond our capacity.

It is obviously beyond my competence, or the province of the Federal Reserve, to deal with all the particular priorities that must be balanced. The Administration has set forth its program in that respect. The general order of magnitude seems to me appropriate, although some of the measures proposed would, in my judgment, be more effective if brought forward in time. Others have proposed different specifics, and I am sure they will receive consideration.

From the standpoint of general economic policy, the more that can be done in restraining expenditures the better. You, of course, have to reconcile that with other priorities, and the basic point is that the sheer arithmetic of the problem does suggest that changes will be necessary over a broad range of programs—both on the spending and revenue side. I believe recognition of that fact is becoming increasingly widespread both in and out of Washington.

Your Committee is in the critical position of converting that wide consensus on generalities into a specific program, and I have some idea how difficult that is. But I also have some idea how important it is to our future.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, several months later, on November 30, Martin Feldstein, President Reagan's Chief Economic Adviser, addressed the deficit issue in a speech delivered to the Tax Foundation. I ask unanimous consent that a portion of his remarks appear at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXCERPT OF REMARKS OF MARTIN FELDSTEIN

Despite the revolutionary reduction in government spending and the fundamental improvement in the character of our tax system, the economy still faces the serious problem of a long string of budget deficits. Solid economic growth can eliminate the cyclical component of the budget deficit by 1988 but the structural deficit is likely to grow just as fast as the cyclical deficit shrinks. The Administration's economic forecast implies that the budget deficit will remain roughly $200 billion a year—or about 5 percent of GNP—for the rest of the decade unless there is legislative action to reduce spending or raise revenue.

Of course, a rate of economic growth for the next five years that is sufficiently greater than the growth forecast by the Administration and by virtually all private forecasters could in principle eliminate the deficit without legislative action. But it would clearly be unwise to assume such an improbably fast rate of growth. A prudent policy at this point must assume that it will not be impossible to grow our way out of these deficits.

The likely budget deficits are as serious as they are unprecedented. If legislative action is not taken, a cumulative budget deficit of more than $1,000 billion over the next 5 or 6 years will double the privately held national debt. The annual interest on this extra debt alone would represent a permanent cost of about $180 billion a year, an amount equal to 17 percent of the personal income tax revenue now projected for 1988. This growth of the national debt and of the interest of the national debt show that budget deficits do not eliminate the need for spending cuts or tax increases but just postpone the day of reckoning when extra spending cuts or larger tax increases must take effect to pay for current excesses.

The most important long-term economic effect on the prospective deficits is to absorb a large fraction of domestic savings, thereby reducing the rate of capital formation and the potential long-term growth of the economy. A budget deficit of 5 percent of GNP would absorb about two-thirds of all the net domestic saving that would otherwise be available to finance investment in plant and equipment and in housing. Although the 1981 tax changes and the reduced rate of inflation will direct a higher share of the remaining capital formation to business investment and away from owner-occupied housing, the effect to the budget deficits nevertheless is a lower rate of investment in business and equipment.

In the near term, large budget deficits are also producing a lopsided recovery. The most conspicuous example has been the sharp decline in U.S. net exports to the rest of the world. The projected budget deficits raise our real long-term interest rate, attracting funds from the rest of the world and causing the exchange value of the dollar to rise. The over-strong dollar makes it difficult for U.S. products to compete in world markets and makes foreign products more attractive to American buyers. More generally, key industries in the capital goods sector and in construction as well as in the production of internationally traded goods and services will fail to share fully in the overall economic recovery. The longer that large deficits are expected to persist, the greater will be the danger and the risks to our economy.

That's why the President sent a budget to Congress earlier this year that proposed to cut the 1986 fiscal year deficit nearly in half and to reduce the 1988 fiscal year deficit to only about 1.5 percent of GNP.

There is, I know, some doubt these days about the President's commitment to reducing the budget deficit and in particular about his willingness to include additional tax revenue in an overall budget package that includes domestic spending restrictions. Some skeptics say that it looks like the President has been convinced that deficits don't matter. Frankly, that's nonsense. The President believes that deficits are harmful and that it is wrong to leave an enlarged national debt to our children.

The President's budget plan called for a balanced package with a contingent tax increase and a nearly equal amount of spending cuts over the next 5 years. The President believes that progress in reducing the budget deficit requires strong bipartisan support for significant spending cuts as well as for tax increases.

Mr. BAUCUS. Finally, Mr. President, late last year on December 13, 1983, Alice M. Rivlin, director of the economic studies program at the Bookings Institution, testified before the Senate Finance Committee on which I serve. Her remarks are particularly appropriate as we in the Senate decide whether to act now and what to do. I ask unanimous consent that a motion of her remarks appear at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXCERPT OF TESTIMONY BY ALICE RIVLIN

No one would seriously propose bringing the deficit to zero in 1 year. The problem is too large to be solved immediately. The required increases in taxes and cuts in spending would be too disruptive. What is needed is a firm plan to bring the deficit down substantially over several years and to enable interest rates and the value of the dollar to fall gradually at the same time.

The time to enact such a plan is now. The economy is growing strongly. A phased program of tax increases and spending cuts could be absorbed without risk to continued expansion. Reduction in interest rates and more favorable exchange rates would stimulate investment, housing, and net exports, off-setting the slower growth in consumption and government spending and insuring more balanced and sustained growth.

Waiting until after the election—which realistically means mid-1985—to enact such a plan is risky. No one can be sure that the expansion will continue to be vigorous for another 18 months, especially in the face of high real interest rates. Recent recoveries have tended to be short. One should not have a high degree of confidence in a prediction that this one will still be going strong well into its third year. It seems more likely that, by the Spring of 1985, growth will have slowed substantially, and perhaps even turned negative.

If the economy is sluggish or entering recession, it would be both economically undesirable and politically impossible to raise taxes or cut spending in order to reduce the deficit. Waiting until 1985 to take action on the deficit entails the risk of having to wait until after the next recession.

The deficits in prospect have no single cause and should have no single cure. To blame the deficit problem solely on tax cuts, or defense spending increases, or domestic spending growth is to oversimplify recent history. Over the last two decades, the Federal Government took substantial new spending responsibilities in the domestic arena. Spending for nondefense programs rose from about 9% of the gross national product in 1961 to about 16% in 1976. Most of this increase was for payments to individuals, especially social security and other pensions, and for health care for the aged, the disabled, and the impoverished. For a while we paid for these increases by shifting resources out of defense—outlays for defense declined from 9% of gross national product in 1961 to 5.5% in 1976. But in the late 1970's we began the expensive process of modernizing our Armed Forces and reversed the decline in defense spending. We paid for simultaneous increase in defense and domestic spending by allowing federal revenues as a percent of gross national product to creep up, mostly through the impact of inflation on a progressive income tax. Then we ran out of patience with high taxes and cut tax rates substantially. We also cut domestic spending significantly, but not by enough to off-set the combined increases in the deficit brought about by tax cuts, defense spending increases, and continued increases in entitlement spending and interest charges on the debt. That's how we got the deficits; what can we do about them?

Recent CBO projections suggest that without further action of the Congress, the deficit for fiscal year 1986 is likely to be about 4.4% of the gross national product in that year. My guess is that this is optimistic, but it is as good a starting point as any. Reducing this 1986 deficit to 2% of the gross national product—the ratio that was obtained in 1981—would be an ambitious but not unreasonable goal. It would imply cutting the deficit to about $84 billion in fiscal year 1986, or finding about $100 billion in spending reductions or revenue increases in that year. Such a program is only realistic if the Congress acts decisively early in the next session. It would send a strong signal to financial markets and the voting public that Congress is determined to reduce deficits and it could bring about a substantial pre-election reduction in interest rates.

Such a plan would have to be extremely simple and perceived as fair. It would have to spread the pain over a large number of taxpayers and recipients of government spending so that no one group or type of program bore the brunt. It would have to be perceived as an emergency belt tightening, in which everyone is asked to give up something, and not as an effort to restructure the federal tax system or redesign government spending programs.

I share the widespread view that government spending programs, both defense and domestic, could be made more effective and that the federal tax system could be redesigned to make it both fairer and more conducive to balanced economic growth. With respect to taxes, for example, I believe that either of two types of major tax reform—a substantial shift to consumer taxation or broadening of the base of the income tax with a lowering of the rates—could give us a substantially better tax system than we have now. Over the next several years, I believe we should move in one of these two directions, but doing so will take time, thought, and serious deliberation in this Committee and elsewhere. The deficit crisis is too urgent to be put off until that deliberative process can bring us an improved tax system. Therefore, I believe that it is appropriate to enact a near-term temporary revenue increase in a way that would not involve restructuring the tax system, through, for example, an income tax surcharge or a delay of indexing or both. Let me make clear that I do not regard either of these suggestions as desirable long-run tax policy. They would, however, be legislatively simple across-the-board ways of raising temporary revenue while the more difficult process of restructuring the tax system proceeded.

Similarly, on the spending side, I believe a deficit reduction package to be enacted in the next session of Congress would have to consist of rather arbitrary across-the-board cuts, some of which might be of a temporary nature pending restructuring of major programs. For example, a moratorium on cost-of-living increases in all programs might be combined with a moratorium on medical fee increases in Medicare and Medicaid and a percentage cut in other appropriations (including defense), in which the size of the cut was related to the rapidity with which the program has been growing.

Such a program might seem draconian, but its size should not be exaggerated. According to CBO estimates, government spending will be close to a trillion dollars in 1986. Cutting $50 billion form this anticipated spending level would involve cutting somewhat less than 5% of government spending and would still leave spending at more than 22% of gross national product. Similarly, on the tax side, a tax increase of $50 billion in 1986 would increase revenues about 6% and would bring revenues as a percent of gross national product back up to 20% or still below the 21% reached in 1981.

Enactment of such a program would only be possible if there were a strong will in the Congress to show that the Congress can function effectively and responsibly to solve a serious problem. I believe that the risk of delaying action on the deficits is great enough to justify a maximum effort on the part of Congress. I also believe that the conventional wisdom about the politics of the situation may be wrong. It is just possible that the voters would admire and reward a courageous demonstration of bipartisan determination to get the finances of the United States back on a sound footing.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, the point I wish to stress is this: the sponsors of this amendment are worried about the trend of these budget deficits. We are worried about what will happen in the future if we do not act decisively today.

Essentially, it is our view that not only is an ounce of prevention worth a pound of cure, but a pound of prevention is worth a ton of cure. Because what we are proposing today is a freeze, is to freeze all spending in 1985 for 1 year.

I have come to the conclusion that this is the only way we can build a consensus this year to bring the deficit down.

The plan would freeze all Federal spending for 1 year and raise $10 billion in new revenues. This would lower the deficit by $23 billion more than a plan proposed by the administration and Senate leaders.

This freeze is the most fair and balanced approach to take.

The freeze applies to everyone, it's equally shared sacrifice, across the board. Furthermore, this will give Congress a 1-year opportunity to get our act together.

This 1-year pause will give us time to make realistic, efficient and fair long-term budget decisions to permanently stop the growth of the Federal deficit.

What we are spending in 1984, let us freeze it at that level for 1985—every one, all sectors of the budget: defense, nondefense discretionary entitlements, every one.

Now, why are we doing this? We are doing this because the pending budget proposals do not do enough.

What do I mean by that? I mean that the others are 3-year proposals. They are end loaded. They are not front loaded, they are end loaded. By that I mean they are postponing the problem to future years. They are saying: "Sure, we will reduce budget deficits by a certain amount over 3 years, but we are not going to do much in 1985. We do not want to rock the boat. We do not want to cause any problems." But in a very self-righteous, high, and mighty tone, they will say: "In future years we will start getting budget deficits down."

What is going to happen is that next year we are going to meet here in April 1985 and talk about these same problems. We will have another 3-year budget proposal. It does not do very much in 1985 and 1986, but in 1987 and 1988, again, in high and mighty self-righteousness, we will pledge to get that budget deficit lower and we will get it under control. These budget plans I am talking about, other than the pending amendment, are 3-year proposals which are end loaded. They postpone the problem. They sweep the problem under the rug. That is one problem with those proposals.

In addition, they do not do very much. Their totals are not very high. In the first year, 1985, the Republican leadership plan reduces the deficit only around $16 billion; the Chiles plan cuts the deficit by $25 billion in 1985. Ours reduces it by $38 billion in 1985.

It is a start. It is not a giant step. But it is a step forward. It is a start.

So, not only are the other budget proposals end loaded, not only do they postpone the problem to future years, sweep the problem under the rug, but in addition, they are inadequate. They do not do very much. And that is, I think, a point that has to be very strongly underscored here.

Mr. President, our proposal is also bipartisan. An equal number of Republicans are sponsoring this amendment along with an equal number of Democrats. We have intentionally kept it that way. We think it is important to keep it that way.

Why? Very simply because our country can no longer afford the luxury of name calling. It can no longer afford the luxury of finger pointing, of blaming the other guy for our mutual problem.

We can no longer afford to point the finger of blame at the White House, the President, or the Congress, Republicans or Democrats, Liberals or Conservatives.

It reminds me, Mr. President, of the Pogo cartoon, that essentially made the following point: "We have met the enemy and he is us."

We are all in this boat together. Both sides of the aisle, both House of Congress, both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue. Throughout the country, as Americans, this is our problem. Therefore, this is a bipartisan proposal.

This is not a proposal against the leadership. It is a proposal that provides leadership.

Mr. President, there have been several complaints about our proposal. One is: "My gosh. Do you mean to say you are going to freeze defense spending? Do you really mean that?" That is a question we have all been asked.

Mr. President, the answer to that is yes. We do mean to in this proposal. We also mean to freeze everybody else, too; all Americans for 1 year.

The fact of the matter is, Mr. President, the Defense Department can stand some savings. The first point is that the defense budget has increased about 100 percent since 1980.

How much have other programs increased since 1980? Nonentitlement domestic spending has increased, if anything, zero percent since 1980. There is even a slight decline since 1980.

Second, Mr. President, there is already money in the pipeline. Some say the Defense Department has a budget authority that is already available to the tune of $18 billion.

Third, Mr. President, the Grace Commission talks about waste in the Pentagon, and waste in defense spending. The numbers are high, too; billions of dollars of waste. I think they are close to the mark. There is waste in most other Federal spending, but there certainly is waste in defense spending.

We all know confirm this when we speak privately with members of the military. They will tell us there is waste in the military, and there is significant waste in defense spending. I have talked to generals. I have talked to admirals. I have talked to enlisted men. They all will tell you this and point out where the waste is.

Let me give you one example. It was not too many years ago—2 or 3 years ago—when I was speaking to a group in Montana. It was a local Kiwanis Club. I talked generally about defense spending, and the Federal budget. I stated that there was waste in defense spending, as well as in other Federal programs. When I finished speaking and the meeting broke up, someone in the audience—I did not know who he was—walked up to me and said: "Max, let me tell you something. You are absolutely right." He said: "I was in charge of medical programs in the Navy. When I was in the Navy—I am retired now—we had Congress buffaloed. They did not know what we were doing. We could do anything we wanted to do. We had OMB buffaloed. We had them fooled. We just ran circles around them." That fellow volunteered that.

And as I have said I have had additional conversations with generals and others that confirm that view: there is waste in defense spending.

And let us not forget that defense spending has gone up 100 percent, has doubled in the last 4 years, and second, there is already money in the pipeline, above and beyond the freeze.

Finally, Mr. President, even if this freeze passes—I am not sure that it will—I will say this: I think most Americans and most Members of the Senate know that this proposal is right. We are today with this pending amendment trying to establish the principle that we must stop spending increases for a year to let us get our act together.

There is another reason for this amendment; that is, it is a chance for all America to share together. Nobody is getting cut more than anybody else. Nobody is getting increased more than anybody else. This amendment says no cuts for anybody. It also says no increases for anybody. It is a coming together amendment. It is a sharing amendment. It is a time for all of us as America to come together, begin as Americans to be proud of our country, and to do something which we know we really should do.

Our motto is "E pluribus unum." That is the motto of America. "One out of many." I think too often we accent the "many," and infrequently the "one." Too often we act as if we are separate Americans, apart from each other; different sections of the country, different groups of the country; minority groups, against each other and so forth.

I think it is time to accent the togetherness of America. This amendment helps accomplish that because everyone will know that the other person is not getting anything more or anything less than others.

Mr. President, this is a good amendment. It makes sense. It will also send positive signals. One signal it is going to send is to Government agencies to get their spending under control. It also sends a signal to the country. It tells the country that the Government is beginning to get its act together.

What is going to happen when America thinks Congress finally is getting some control over something? It is going to cause good will. It is going to cause more confidence. It is going to cause more belief and faith in our Government.

I think we need a little of that in our country.

Mr. President, then I think we are going to find the economy doing a lot better, because psychologically Americans are going to be thinking and feeling, "Hey, those guys back there are finally getting down to business."

Mr. President, too, because this amendment reduces the deficit $40 billion in 1985, it will also reduce interest rates. Chairman Paul Volcker has said many times that for every $50 billion decrease in the national deficit, there is probably a 1-percent drop in interest rates.

So if this amendment is adopted, that means close to a 1-percent drop in interest rates. And maybe more. That will help a lot. It will help our country very much. People will be in a better position to buy a home, to buy a car. Businesses will be in a better position to invest in jobs. And what does such a drop in the deficit do to foreign trade? It means we are able to export more products overseas because the value of the dollar will start coming down from its lofty perch. We are going to find a lot more American products going overseas, products going overseas and jobs remaining at home.

With these kinds of positive consequences likely to flow from this proposal it is no wonder many groups and newspapers have endorsed our proposal.

Editorials I have seen on this proposal are all favorable from all over the country.

Mr. President, I believe we in Congress have underestimated the degree to which Americans are concerned with the growing problem of Federal budget deficits.

When I was back in Montana over Easter recess, I found many Montanans were troubled by the deficits, and equally troubled by Congress failure to address them.

This concern is reflected in two recent editorials that appeared in the Montana press. The first is a December 18, 1983, editorial that appeared in the Billings Gazette entitled "Fiscal War Demands End of Petty Fights."

It reads as follows:

America is suffering a hemorrhage of debt, and the two men best able to staunch that wound are avowed enemies.

The story of federal deficits draining the strength of our nation is now a familiar one.

With $1.4 trillion in debt, the government is spending $200 billion more than it receives each year.

The government borrows the difference, taking half the cash available for loans of any kind. Interest rates soar. Industrial growth slows. Unemployment rises. Home buyers are priced out of the market. Loggers are laid off. The chain reaction seems to have no end.

Ronald Reagan campaigned against Jimmy Carter's $30 billion annual deficits.

Now Reagan is sending budgets to Congress asking for $200 billion annual deficits.

The supply siders' grand plan for recovery has proven to be not worth the bar napkin on which the Laffler curve was first drawn. The Kemp-Roth tax cuts will trim federal revenues by $750 billion over five years.

Supply siders claimed that taxpayers given a break would save their money, making it available for industrial growth.

It hasn't worked. Savings have actually decreased.

Meanwhile, the U.S. share of the export market is shrinking and its balance of trade deficit is growing.

The solution is not to be found in Republican supply side magic. Nor does it lurk in a revised Democratic New Deal.

The solution is painful, but it lies within the grasp of two men, two men from opposite sides of the political spectrum—Ronald Reagan and Thomas "Tip" O'Neill.

The President and the Democratic leader of the House are two stubborn men, men married to opposing ideologies.

Both want the deficit reduced.

O'Neill is ready to raise taxes and cut defense spending but not to cut domestic spending.

Reagan opposes a tax increase, demands increases in defenses spending, but is eager to cut domestic spending.

But the deadlock need not be. The two arch-foes could become history's heroes without compromising their principles. The crisis is too great and too grave to admit partisan squabbles. There is blame enough to go around and work for all willing hands.

All areas must be attacked.

Not even Reagan can defend Pentagon contracts that allow a manufacturer to charge the military $200 for a 49 cent wrench.

Not even O'Neill can justify Social Security payments to millionaires.

But no recent American president has ever been in a better position to wage peace aggressively and trim the need for military buildup than the super hawk Ronald Reagan. He, more than anyone else, should want that military machine that is his pride to be efficient.

And few liberals have ever had the political strength to insist that social services must be adquate but rigorously policed for waste. O'Neill has a chance, perhaps a vanishing opportunity, to save this nation's social conscience from fiscal catastrophe.

Senator Max Baucus, D-Mont., said it simply this week. "The problem is too great for partisan politics. We have to act as Americans, not Republicans or Democrats."

If the two most powerful party leaders do not bury the hatchet, they could bury the country.

But there is an alternative. They could be remembered as the great adversaries who delivered their nation from adversity.

The second editorial is an April 3, 1984, editorial in the Butte Standard which was entitled "No Painless Way to Reduce the Deficit."

It read as follows:

If Montana's congressmen look to poll results to guide them to decisions regarding the budget deficit, taxes and federal spending, the latest Montana Poll must be frustrating.

According to the poll, Montanans would like their congressmen to reduce the federal deficit, but not if it means increasing personal income taxes or cutting expenditures for Medicare, Medicaid or Social Security.

Poll respondents did agree that some federal spending should be reduced, primarily in the military budget. And, they agreed that the government should go slow in increasing retirement benefits for federal employees.

But when it comes to personal sacrifices, Montanans apparently aren't interested. And that, according to a national Louis Harris poll, means Montanans are in step with their countrymen. Everyone, it seems, wants the government to be fiscally responsible, but preferably at somebody else's expense.

The Montana Poll is cosponsored by the University of Montana Bureau of Business and Economic Research and the Great Falls Tribune.

A large majority of respondents—61 percent—favored raising business and corporation taxes. Raising taxes on business is often favored as handy way to generate more revenue. But, when asked if they would be willing to see those higher taxes passed on to consumers, respondents had misgivings. Only 47 percent would be willing to do that.

What's a member of Congress to do when faced with attitudes like these? Almost all budget-balanced proposals call for spending cuts and tax increases.

The answer may be to share the misery. Congressman Pat Williams, to his credit, has listed in some detail spending cuts he'd support to help balance the budget. But, since some of the cuts would affect Montana, Williams has attached a condition to his support. Members of Congress from other states, he says, must agree to support cuts that will affect their states, too.

What makes this difficult is that members of Congress from other states have constituents who think just like Montanans. They don't want higher taxes, and they don't want spending cuts that will affect them.

There are growing indications that some sort of bipartisan deficit-cutting plan will be agreed on late this year or early next year. President Reagan also has ordered Treasury Secretary Donald Regan to come up with a tax simplification plan this year. According to reports, the plan will call for a national consumption tax, which would mean higher prices for all consumers. The proposal probably will have tough sledding in Congress.

It's no secret why Reagan wants the tax overhaul plan to be submitted late this year. He wants it to be made public after the election. Similarly, major deficit-cutting legislation isn't expected to be passed until after the election.

What Montanans, and other Americans, will discover when and if a real plan to reduce the deficit is passed, is that they can't have their cake and eat it, too. That attitude is one reason why the deficits have been so large in recent years.

If Congress can summon the nerve to make significant cuts in spending and thus in the deficit, a lot of citizens are going to feel the pinch—through reduced federal benefits, higher taxes or both.

The Reagan economic program has produced the largest deficits in the country's history, and it's going to take strong medicine to shrink them.

Mr. President, these editorials reflect the growing concern in this country with the deficit problem.

More importantly, these editorials reflect a willingness to weather the tough solutions it will take to address the problem.

The bipartisan freeze is stiff medicine, but as the editorials suggest, I am convinced that is just what Americans want.

Mr. President, I see a consponsor seeking recognition at this point and I will yield the floor. Before I do, however, I strongly urge Members to listen to their consciences, to listen to their hearts. Let us adopt this amendment today to send the right signals to the country and do what we know we have to do to start getting our economic house in order.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAUCUS. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUMPHREY). The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I send a modification to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified.

The amendment, as modified, is as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted, insert the following: "Act.

"LIMITATIONS ON BUDGET AUTHORITY

"SEC. . (a) It shall not be in order in the Senate or House of Representatives to consider any bill or resolution making appropriations, if the enactment of such bill or resolution, as recommended by the respective committee on appropriations, would cause the aggregate total budget authority for function 050, National Defense, to exceed $264,100,000,000 in fiscal year 1985.

"(b) It shall not be in order in the Senate or House of Representatives to consider any bill or resolution making appropriations, if the enactment of such bill or resolution, as recommended by the respective committee on appropriations, would cause the aggregate total budget authority for nondefense discretionary activities to exceed $137,000,000,000 in fiscal year 1985.

"(c) For the purposes of this section, budget aurhority shall be determined on the basis applicable for fiscal year 1984.

"(d) The provisions of subsection (a) or (b) of this section may be waived or suspended in the Senate by a majority vote of the Members voting, a quorum being present, or by unanimous consent of the Senate.

"(e) It is the sense of Congress that the unprecedented magnitude and persistence of current and projected Federal budget deficits must be addressed in a comprehensive strategy to moderate increases in defense spending while continuing the effective constraints on nondefense discretionary programs. To assure the success of such an initiative, the foregoing procedural restraints, in addition to the total aggregate spending limitations pursuant to the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, as amended, are necessary on budget authority both for defense and for nondefense discretionary programs for fiscal year 1985.

"MEDICARE FREEZE

"SEC. . (a) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act (or any amendments made by this Act) or any provision of title XVIII of the Social Security Act, the "applicable percentage increase" under section 1886(b)(3)(B) of the Social Security Act for any 12-month cost reporting period or fiscal year beginning on or after October 1, 1984, and before October 1, 1985, shall be zero percent.

"(b) The Secretary of Health and Human Services shall report to the Congress within 45 days after the date of the enactment of this Act with respect to suggested methods for assuring that hospitals will not increase amounts charged to patients who are not entitled to benefits under title XVIII of the Social Security Act in order to compensate for amounts not paid by reason of the limitation under subsection (a).

"LIMITATIONS ON COST-OF-LIVING ADJUSTMENTS

"SEC. . (a) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, no increase shall be made in payments or benefit amounts under any provision of law which would otherwise require such increase to become effective during fiscal year 1985 as a result of changes in—

"(1) the Consumer Price Index (or any component thereof); or

"(2) any other index which measures costs, prices, or wages.

"(b) No person shall be entitled to any increase in payments or benefit amounts under any provision of law if payment thereof is denied by reason of this section.

"(c) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, any change in—

"(1) the Consumer Price Index (or any component thereof); or

"(2) any other index which measures costs, prices, or wages, which would have resulted in any increase in payments or benefit amounts during fiscal year 1985 but for the provisions of subsection (a) shall not be taken into account for purposes of determining any increase in payments or benefit amounts during fiscal year 1986 or any fiscal year thereafter.".

At the end of the matter proposed to be inserted, add the following:

PART B PREMIUM

SEC. . (a) Notwithstanding the provisions of section 901 of this Act, the amendments made by such section 901 shall not become effective, and the provisions of the Social Security Act shall remain as though such section 901 had not been enacted.

(b) Section 1839(e) of the Social Security Act is amended to read as follows:

"(e)(1) Notwithstanding the provisions of subsection (a), the monthly premium for each individual enrolled under this part for each month after December 1983 and prior to January 1987 shall be an amount equal to 25 percent of the monthly actuarial rate for enrollees age 65 and over, as determined under subsection (a)(1) and applicable to such month.

"(2) Any increases in premium amounts taking effect prior to January 1987 by reason of paragraph (1) shall be taken into account for purposes of determining increases thereafter under subsection (a)(3).".

(c) Section 1839 of such Act is amended by adding at the end thereof, the following new subsection:

"(f)(1) If no cost-of-living increase becomes effective under section 215(i) in December of any year, the monthly premium of each individual enrolled under this part for the succeeding year shall (except as otherwise provided in subsection (b)) be the same as the monthly premium (disregarding subsection (b)) of the individual for such December.

"(2) If paragraph (1) does not apply to the monthly premiums for a year, if an individual is entitled to monthly benefits under section 202 or 223 for November and for December in that preceding year, and if the monthly premium for that December and for the following January is deducted from those benefits under section 1840(a)(1), the monthly premium for that individual for that January and for each of the succeeding 11 months for which he is entitled to benefits under section 202 or 223 shall (except as otherwise provided in subsection (b)) be the greater of—

"(1) the monthly premium amount determined under subsection (a)(2) or (e) for that January reduced by the amount (if any) necessary to make the monthly benefits under section 202 or 223 for that January after the deduction of the monthly premium (disregarding subsection (b)) for that January at least equal to the monthly benefits under section 202 or 223 for the preceding November after the deduction of the premium (disregarding subsection (b)) for that individual for that November, or

"(2) the monthly premium (disregarding subsection (b)) for that individual for that December.

For purposes of this subsection, retroactive adjustments or payments and deductions on account of work shall not be taken into account in determining the monthly benefits to which an individual is entitled under section 202 or 223.".

PHYSICIAN FEES

SEC. . (a) Section 1842(b) of the Social Security Act (as amended by section 904 of this Act) is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(13)(A) During the 24-month period beginning July 1, 1984, the Secretary shall monitor physicians in order to determine—

"(i) the proportion of physicians, by specialty and geographic area of practice, whose claims under this part are not pursuant to an assignment under paragraph (3)(ii), grouped as follows: fewer than 25 percent, 25 percent to 49 percent, 50 percent to 74 percent, 75 percent to 89 percent, 90 percent to 99 percent, and 100 percent, of the claims submitted by such physicians, or for such classifications of physicians as the Secretary may deem to be more informative;

"(ii) the average difference between the actual charges and the reasonable charges recognized for purposes of this part, for each classification of physicians referred to in clause (i); and

"(iii) any changes in the per capita volume and mix of services provided to beneficiaries under this part by each classification of physician referred to in clause (i).

"(B) Information on changes in the elements monitored pursuant to subparagraph (A) shall be provided to Congress every sixth month beginning with January 1985 and ending with January 1987.".

(b)(1) The report which the Secretary of Health and Human Services shall submit to Congress on January 1, 1987, shall include recommendations in sufficient detail to serve as the basis for legislative action which Congress can take to assure that any burden of effectively constraining the growth of costs in the medicare part B program, which Congress intends to be borne by providers and physicians, is not transferred (in whole or in part) so as to become an additional burden on part B beneficiaries in the form of increased out-of-pocket costs, reduced services, or reduced access to needed physician care.

(2) Such report shall also include analyses of other methods of payment which might be utilized under part B to constrain the costs of the part B program, including prospective payment systems such as fee schedules (both global and per service), capitation payments, case management, and the use of preferred provider organizations.

(c) In addition to any funds otherwise provided for fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987 for payments to carriers under agreements entered into under section 1842 of the Social Security Act, there are transferred from the Federal Supplementary Medical Insurance Fund such additional amounts for payments to such carriers under such agreements as may be necessary to conduct monitoring of physicians under section 1842(b)(13) of the Social Security Act.

PART B DEDUCTIBLE

SEC. . Notwithstanding the provisions of section 916 of this Act, the amendments made by such section 916 shall not become effective, and the provisions of the Social Security Act shall remain as though such section 916 had not been enacted.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I would like to thank the Senator from Montana for his help in this amendment. He came on very early. This is really a strong stand which the Senator from Montana has taken to get the budget deficit under control. I know that he has many programs in the budget that he would like to see not be frozen, just as all of us do. But he is taking a very sound position. He is doing this because of the necessity for getting the deficit down and for getting interest rates under control.

I have had the opportunity to serve with Senator BAUCUS both as a Member of the other body and also as a member of the Finance Committee since we have been in this body. I have found him easy to work with, a person who, as far as the budget deficits are concerned, has been willing to raise revenue to take care of some of the deficit problems. He has been very brave and forthright in adjusting some of the programs that are under the jurisdiction of our Finance Committee so that they would be less costly to the taxpayers and more sound, particularly as they relate to some of the trust funds which are involved.

All of those are issues that can become politically volatile. I think he has demostrated his willingness to not be narrowminded but to be very broadminded, in fact, as he looks at this problem. I hope that many Members of this body will follow his example as we wind toward a vote on this issue.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I have just a few brief remarks occasioned by the thoughtful comments of my colleague from Montana (Mr. BAUCUS). I find much to agree with in the concern he has expressed about the prolonged, unaddressed deficits and their effect upon the national recovery. To that, I hope every Member of this body could stipulate. I guess what we disagree with has to do with the proposal that is before us, which is a simple freeze.

I have to commend the candor of my colleague from Montana. He has described this proposal as a cover for the weak-kneed. I do not think that is really what we want to encourage, though. When he asks, What signal does this measure send? It tells us that Congress lacks the will and the wit to do the job properly because, quite clearly, we are dealing with a multiplicity of programs which differ in merit, which differ in magnitude, which differ in their importance to the American people. Certainly, people differ with respect to the kind of pruning job or lack of pruning that has been done by Congress. I frankly think that is the job the American people want us to do.

When the Senator says that newspapers in his home State commend this approach, I think what they are commending is an attitude that Congress should do something about the deficit to reduce it, to eliminate the perils which it proposes; but I doubt they would express a preference for this kind of approach which he quite properly calls a cover for the weak kneed. I think they would ask us instead to have the courage and the wisdom to differentiate between programs, to do the hard job of analyzing which are in need of trimming and which really cannot afford the kind of cut this proposes.

It is, in effect, a cut when growth is required, and growth does not occur because of a freeze imposed by this proposal. It is as though, Mr. President, we had a room full of 30 children, half of them grossly overweight and half of them much too thin, and we announced that we were all going on a diet and all going to lose 20 pounds. That might be a very salutary thing for those who are overweight, but it might seriously impair the health of the thin children who are, in fact, in need of gaining weight.

I admit the metaphor has its limitations. There are few who would find very many thin children in the entire range of Federal programs. But I would say, Mr. President, that this approach has an appealing simplicity about it. It is convenient for the Members of Congress because it excuses us from doing the harder job, the job which really is required of each of the committees upon which we spend so much time.

So I say I think this sends an incorrect signal, Mr. President. It is a signal that, rather than doing the difficult thing, which requires a greater amount of courage and, certainly, a greater amount of analysis, we are instead, in order to achieve what is a desirable goal, going to do the kind of thing required by a simple freeze.

I say to my colleague from Montana, if admirals and generals who have now retired had come in and told him of waste and abuse, then the thing to do is make specific proposals attacking the specifics of that waste and abuse and not simply impose an overall cut which will penalize beneficial programs, needed programs, in defense or elsewhere. The attitude that we should have, Mr. President, is that we should ferret out the specific waste and abuse and also, very frankly, admit that the thing that is difficult about this job is not choosing between good and evil but, rather, weighing comparative goods and choosing those that have priority.

That is why we are here, Mr. President. Frankly, this proposal is a default on our responsibility.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILSON. I am happy to yield to my friend from Montana.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I am not saying I am disagreeing with the premise of the distinguished Senator from California. I wish we could do the things he talks about.

I have been in this body now practically 6 years. I was on the other side for 4 years. That is roughly 10 years in the Congress. For some of those years in the House, I was on the Appropriations Committee. I tell the Senator from California that it is my experience as a practical matter that it is very, very hard, if not impossible, to do what the Senator from California wants done. I wish we could do it, but it has not happened.

It has not happened for various reasons. The fact of the matter is that, in a representative democracy, because different groups come to different Members of both the House and the Senate for their programs as a collective whole, we in the House and the Senate, on Capitol Hill, have a very difficult time resisting.

This amendment that the Senators from Iowa, Kansas, and Delaware and I are offering, is really a statement that the usual ways are just not working; we have to try something else that is different.

This, in many respects, is a pragmatic amendment. We call it the pragmatic amendment, the realistic amendment, the nonpartisan, get-the-job-done amendment. It is a recognition that the usual way of trying to attack appropriations and budget matters does not work very well.

I'm not blaming anybody. I am not blaming Republicans, Democrats, the White House, Congress. I am just being descriptive. That is why we have come to the conclusion that we have to do this.

Let me share with the Senator an experience I had in 4 years on the other side of Capitol Hill, when I was on the Appropriations Committee in the House.

We on that committee were charged with the budgets of various agencies. We spent our time trying to understand various programs—for example, HUD, EPA, NSF, the Department of Agriculture. These were some of the Federal agencies that went through the jurisdiction of the subcommittee of which I was member.

I can tell the Senator there are thousands of Federal employees who spend their time game planning budget proposals to OMB and to the Congress. That is their job, their job description.

Compare that with our resources in the Congress. We in the House Appropriations Committee had one or two computers. I was entitled to one staff person to try to dig into these budgets to find where the fat and waste was.

What I am saying is that it was a mismatch between the Appropriations Committee and the agencies.

Everybody wants power. Lord Acton said, "Power tends to corupt; absolute power corrupts absolutely." Every Federal agency wants more dollars. I have never seen one that did not. It is their responsibility to figure out how they can get more dollars. I suppose we would try to do the same thing if we were in their shoes.

But what I am saying is that because of all this, "business as usual" does not work very well. Sure, we should try to find the fat and the waste, but as a practical matter, that is not enough. I am not blaming anybody. I am just describing the process and the system and what really goes on, and that is why the Senator from Iowa and myself and the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Delaware and others who have joined us, propose a freeze.

I know that really it would make more sense if each of us sat down and worked together and agreed where the fat and waste was. The Senator from California is absolutely correct; that is the preferable process. But as a practical matter, as a pragmatic matter, I submit we have to find something else and something different. President Truman once said:

> Try something. If it does not work, try something else. If that does not work, try something else again.

Well, we are trying to do something else.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I am entirely sympathetic to the goals expressed by my friend from Montana as well as those of the cosponsors of this proposal. There is no argument as to what it is they are trying to achieve or the rightness of that effort. While I sympathize as well with the acute frustration which understandably my colleague from Montana has experienced over the years at the process and its failure to produce the kind of setting and keeping of priorities of which political discussions so often speak, notwithstanding that frustration I think this proposal, well intended though it may be, is not the proper way to address it.

He says it is the result of that frustration, the result of a realistic assessment, a pragmatic assessment that the process of authorization and appropriation simply does not distinguish between the deserving and the less deserving in a sufficiently effective way to remove the peril in which we find ourselves, that of a growing deficit.

There is a way to avoid that, and I agree entirely with his not at all unfair assessment of the process. It has not worked well. It is right he and other serious-minded Senators address that process. I suggest to the Senator from Montana that shortly we may have not only the opportunity but, indeed, the obligation when the States end their frustration with the process and send us not just a message but a mandate that we either act ourselves or convene a constitutional convention to amend the Constitution to bring about a balanced budget so that the Federal Government, like other public agencies in this land, is compelled to operate within a balanced budget and spend no more than we take in as revenue.

I assume that many who are cosponsors of this measure and those who will vote for it probably will support that effort by the States. I know some have voted for it in the past in the Senate.

On that day, Mr. President, when there has been an amendment to the U.S. Constitution to require the Federal Government, like other public agencies in the United States, operate within a balanced budget, my friend from Montana and I will behold a change in the process because then, whether anyone likes it or not, all of us with our differing priorities will be compelled to live with the reality and the requirement that we set priorities; that we either raise taxes or cut spending in a way which will balance the budget.

I am not suggesting that when such a day comes perfect equity will be done, but at the very least the peril that we now address, that of deficits, will be made unconstitutional. It will have been removed from us because of our own collective inability to come to an agreement upon the setting of priorities. It will remove from us the failure of the week-kneed having the courage to make that analysis, to set priorities and keep them. But I do not think in the interval, as faulty as that process is, we should simply default upon our responsibilities and take the easy way out by making a cut across the board that works inequitably, inevitably in the cause of what is a desirable goal, the elimination of the deficit.

So my friend from Montana and I agree upon much. We simply are disagreed on this proposal. While it is proper that the Congress spend a good deal of its time addressing this deficit, the real question which should concern us long term is the solution to the problem. It will not be solved, in my view, for precisely the reasons the Senator from Montana has eloquently described, until that day when we are compelled to live within a balanced budget.

That will require, in my view, the amendment of the Constitution, which can be done, focusing exclusively upon that subject. I think the Senator from Montana, the Senator from Iowa, the Senator from California, and the Senator from Washington will find constituents in our States who will applaud that effort and urge we, indeed, allow the States to have the privilege of ratifying such an amendment so that never again will Congress be troubled with this problem of an unbalanced budget or how we right the ship after yielding for so long to the deficits.

Mr. GRASSLEY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa is recognized.

Mr. GRASSLEY. I have listened to everything the Senator from California has had to say. I have two or three comments I should like to make at this time, not in total disagreement with what he said; in fact, in some instances, in total agreement with what he said—for instance, his support for the constitutional amendment requiring a balanced budget, changing the basic thought process by which we arrive at expenditure figures and the discipline that comes with a constitutional amendment.

To add to some of the things he said and to get him to think in terms of what our amendment is really all about, it is not just a set of figures here for 1 year, in which we are reducing the budget's deficit by $23 billion more than the rose garden proposal. There is a lot more to it than that.

I should like to have the Senator from California answer the question as to how he cannot be for our proposal, which is going to get the deficit under control, if he is for a constitutional amendment requiring a balanced budget. Those of us who anticipate a constitutional amendment requiring a balanced budget know that it has to pass Congress, and then it will be before the State legislatures 2, 3, or 4 years before it actually is ratified by three-fourths of the States and becomes a part of the Constitution.

We have to do something very dramatic right now to prepare ourselves for the day when we are going to be able to meet the mandate of such a constitutional amendment. It the Senator from California is not willing to take this dramatic action now, all I can say is that when we get down the road to the point where we do have to meet the mandates of the balanced budget amendment, we will have to make such horrendous adjustments in the budget that, instead of talking about freezing, we will be talking about actually cutting programs below levels that exist for that specific fiscal year.

So anybody who is for a constitutional amendment requiring a balanced budget has to be farsighted enough to know we have to meet that commitment someday; and now is the time to prepare ourselves for that.

However, more important than that point is this: As I listened to the Senator from California, I heard him say something to the effect that this excuses us from doing a harder job. Those are his words.

If you look at the figures that are in the budget and look at what we are doing to the level of expenditure for 1985, I think I would have to agree with him. But if that is all he is looking at, or if that is all he heard the Senator from Montana and me say about this, then he has missed the main point of the amendment.

The main point of the amendment is not just to reduce the level of expenditure, but to give us a breathing spell, a period of time in which we will have an opportunity to step back from the programs, take a look at them, much as a doctor trying to diagnose the illness of a patient: step back, put the patient to sleep for a while, make the diagnostic interpretations of the situation as it exists. That is what we would do for that year with the various Government programs; operate and make the changes that need to be made, and then go back to the process of doing the job as we have been doing it—but, of course, doing it differently.

The difference would be this: We have the Federal budget for the last 20 years out of control. Much of it is on automatic pilot. Nobody can stop it. For 3 years we, as Republicans, have known there is a problem and something should be done about it. But we kept looking through rose-colored glasses, we always saw a rosy future out there, and we always said growth is going to take care of the problem.

However, as I pointed out this morning, and as I should like to emphasize to the Senator from California and other Members who have not had a chance to look at the charts, if you look at the charts, you can see that every year we expected things to get better, and every one of the statistics we used as a basis for making budget judgments always looked rosy for the future. But what happened? You can look at every page of these charts, and in each instance the situation deteriorated from what we anticipated. We just added to the budget deficit.

We did not take any contrary action, or at least took very little contrary action, and what was done, such as in the recent year, was basically timid, particularly on entitlements and defense. The situation just kept getting worse.

We are on automatic pilot; we are out of control.

31-059 O-87-20 (Pt. 8)

The budget freeze has several purposes: To get the deficit down and to give us an opportunity to stop the moving target. In each of the last 3 years, we have been shooting at a moving target, and we have not been hitting that target. It has been getting away from us. This is an opportunity to stop that target so that we can see what we are shooting at and bring about the necessary reforms that need to be done. It is not only in defense. It is across the board.

There is still another problem and this speaks to the basic, practical problem that the Senator from California addressed: How do you accomplish this? He says, and rightly so—the Senator from Montana even agreed to that—that we should make these necessary changes, that we should not have to freeze the budget in order to accomplish it.

The Senator from Montana addressed his experience with that, and correctly so, and I associate myself with his remarks. Let us look at it from a strictly political standpoint.

The Senator from California is a Republican, as I am, basically in support of the general direction this administration has taken in a large share of its programs, but now disagreeing on what is being done on the budget. But that is a small aspect. Most of it has been in agreement. We wanted a lot of the changes that have been brought about. But we have a President who says that defense is a sacred cow and it cannot be touched. So 29 percent of the budget is off-limits so far as the President of the United States is concerned.

Then we have the second most powerful person in Washington, the most powerful Democrat, the Speaker of the House, who says that entitlements and social programs are off-limits. So he carves out 42 percent of the budget that is off-limits.

Then, we all know the inability to borrow money to pay the interest on the national debt. That is kind of determined by the marketplace. So there is 13 percent of the budget that is off bounds because of the way the free market works.

So you have 42 percent and 29 percent, which is 71 percent, and then you have 13 percent, which is 84 percent of the budget. We have only 84 percent of the budget that we are willing to deal with and have dealt with. But we even have supporters of those programs who consider those programs sacred cows. The Senator from Connecticut, on our side of the aisle, has been very eloquent in defense of those programs.

We have a situation in which we have so many sacred cows that we have become overpopulated with cows, and nobody is willing to make changes.

The House of Representatives will not do anything because TIP O'NEILL does not want to touch entitlement programs, and that has been the situation for 3 years. President Reagan does not want to touch defense, and that is the way it has been for 3 years. That is why nothing dramatic has been done. The President's program has been labeled as unfair and inequitable.

So in an attempt to deal with this problem, the Senator from Kansas, the Senator from Montana, the Senator from Delaware, and the Senator from Iowa have been trying to address the practical political problems as well, I wish to tell the Senator from California, and that is that we have to draw the line on sacred cows. There cannot be any sacred cows.

We have to say that there is no part of this budget that is off limits for reform and for bearing a fair share of the budget reductions.

It is from the standpoint of fairness, equity, and understanding the history of the past 3 years of attempts to get the budget under control, the last 3 years looking at rosy projections, and having them not materialize, learning from past experience.

And if you and I as human beings cannot understand from history, then who can? And if we cannot learn from the mistakes of the past, then who will? And if we do not do something in learning from the mistakes of the past, are we bound to repeat the mistakes of the past?

Mr. President, I say to you that that is exactly where we are headed unless we take this opportunity of making a dramatic change in the level of expenditure and also we buy time to stop the moving target, to get the budget off of automatic pilot, and step back and look at the patient and try to operate on that patient and to cure that patient.

We need a "wellness" program in the Federal budget. All we have been trying to do is practice medicine on the budget, the same way as the medical profession of the United States practices medicine, and that is trying to cure an ill patient. We should be looking at the budget the same way that we should be practicing medicine in America. We should be practicing preventive medicine. We should be making the necessary changes that should be made so that we prevent the mistakes of the past from recurring.

I do not know how many more times we are going to have an opportunity. We thought we were doing it in 1981. We thought we were doing it in 1982. We thought we were doing it in 1983. And each time the situation got worse.

Here we are in 1984 and it looks as if we are headed right down that same road, really not doing anything dramatic to entitlements, still going with a rate of growth of defense expenditures that is going to put us at the highest level in constant dollars since the Korean war. We are going to continue going right down the same road of the same coalitions in both bodies of this Congress that have wanted to spend unlimited amounts for entitlements and unlimited amounts in defense and then come back here a year from now and realize we should have done something last year.

As Americans, we have been a people who have learned to a considerable extent from history. That is why we have gotten to 200 years as a Nation. There are not very many powerful societies and nations that have lasted that long in the history of mankind, and it has to be because of our form of government and our ability to respond.

I plead with my colleagues to listen to the mistakes of the past, study them themselves, and ask if they want to repeat those mistakes.

I think we are about to repeat them if we do not take dramatic action as through this proposal, the only one that is really going to get this deficit down, the only one for sure, regardless of the level of expenditures, that is going to give us an opportunity to take this budget off automatic pilot, study what the problem is, and make the necessary changes.

VOICES FROM THE PAST—ON NATIONAL DEBT

Today our coalition behind the bipartisan budget freeze has presented endless economic data documenting the economic tragedy we court if we refuse to take decisive action on the deficit.

If we have failed to convince you that we will doom this Nation with our own lack of decisiveness and courage without drastic fiscal reforms, perhaps some voices from the past may better build a case. I quote from a best seller, which I believe most of you can pull from your own shelves.

That ancient sage and political wonder, King Solomon, warned that debt enslaves those who fall into its trap. Indeed, our own people are economic slaves, with their security and prosperity severely jeopardized by $200 billion deficits which will soar much higher without decisive action now.

Solomon's father had even harsher words for debt: King David said those who borrow money they refuse to repay are wicked. Our children may well agree with him someday, when they find themselves crushed by the national debt we bequeath them.

If you will indulge one more such reference, hear the moaning and groaning of Nehemiah's contemporaries. He reported a "great outcry of the people," who said, "we have borrowed money to pay the king's tax on our fields and on our vineyards * * * now * * * we are forcing our sons and daughters to be slaves * * * we are helpless because our fields and our vineyards belong to others."

The plight of his people, confessed Nehemiah, made him furious with an irresponsible government, and he held a mass protest against politicians of his day. * * * There is, indeed, nothing new under the Sun. We should beware lest we find our own people making their own mass protest at the polls next November.

Mr. President, if no one else seeks the floor, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I gain the floor at this time to ask unanimous consent that Senator PRYOR and Senator HUMPHREY be added as cosponsors to our amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COCHRAN). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, is there any time agreement on this bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no time agreement.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I will be brief. Incidentally, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to join as a cosponsor of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, yesterday I spoke and voted for the Hollings amendment. At that time, there were some charts over here in this corner of the Chamber that showed the differences in the propositions that are being submitted to the Senate.

Now, it seems to me that we are taking these things in the order that will determine the courage of the Senate. The Hollings amendment was the most Draconian of the propositions we are going to have an opportunity to vote on, because it would have made a dramatic reduction in the deficit in 1985 and beyond. It has now been defeated, having received 38 votes, which incidentally is 22 more than almost precisely the same amendment received last year.

Now we are on the KGB amendment originally offered by Senators KASSEBAUM, GRASSLEY, BIDEN, and BAUCUS. And I intend to support it and I am going to cosponsor it because I consider it the next most drastic deficit reduction plan. If it fails, and I fully expect it to, then I will support the amendment of the Senator from Florida, Mr. CHILES, the distinguished ranking member of the Budget Committee. And if it fails, which I fully expect it to, I may support the President's proposal simply because it is the only thing left to support and not because I have any enthusiasm for it.

I said yesterday, and I say again, this is an election year and Congress is paralyzed by fear. Fearful of alienating a constituency, fearful that their opponent, whether he be Democrat or Republican, is going to pick out one or more sections of any one of these proposals and say, "Why, my opponent even voted against social security," or "My opponent voted to cut medicaid so that the poor people of this country would not receive health care."

I heard an interesting story the other day—I will share it with you—about the fellow who was running for office. He said:

> I want to say at the outset, I am going to run a clean, positive campaign. I want to say now that my opponent is an intelligent, articulate man. I have no quarrel with him. We are going to talk about the issues. And his wife is one of the most beautiful, charming, intelligent women I have ever known. As a matter of fact, I do not know what he sees in that other woman he is running around with.

[Laughter.]

And so it goes in this business.

But when I think about that famous question about "Are you better off now than you were 4 years ago," 4 years ago there was a resounding no. Everybody in 1980 decided that they were worse off than they had been in 1976. And everybody on this side of the aisle lost about 10 points in the polls from that magic moment until the day of the election. And this is one of the Senators that lost about 10 points.

But if you were to ask the same question today on national television, there would probably be a pretty large number that would say, "Yes, I am better off than I was 4 years ago, because the stock market is up and the economic growth rate is running along at 7 percent, one of the hottest rates in the history of the country." And so, as of this moment, if you belong to the "me" generation, you would say, "Yes, I am better off."

But what you are literally saying is what we used to say in the Marine Corps, "Pull up the ladder, Jack, I'm on board." Because if you follow that question with a much more sobering and relevant question, "Do you think what has happended in the past 4 years has provided a more secure future for your children and your grandchildren, and my yet unborn grandchildren?" I believe there would be a substantial number of people that would say "No."

How can you possibly say, by increasing every man's, woman's, and child's share of the national debt in 4 years by $3,000—from $4,400 to $7,700—is going to be good for my children and future generations?

And despite that, despite these dramatic predictions, not by partisan Democrats who want to kick the President, but by no less an authority than the chief economist for the President, Martin Feldstein, no less an authority than Prof. Milton Friedman—who seems to have considerable credibility in certain quarters in this country—and Paul Volcker, who may not be perfect but whom I think is trying to walk the line as best he can and maintain that delicate balance between the amount of money necessary to keep interest rates from going up or going down, we are not serious about reducing the deficits. When Henry Kaufman says that interest rates are going to go up, the stock market goes down 20 points. And Henry Kaufman is saying that obviously Congress is not serious about reducing the deficit.

I presume that at some hour of this day we are going to vote. The KGB amendment is going to be defeated because everybody is waiting to vote for the President's package, which is no downpayment on the deficit at all. The distinguished ranking member of the Budget Committee, Mr. CHILES, who sits on the floor at this moment will tell you that and he is simply quoting CBO figures. CBO is the nonpartisan group whose figures are tested and tested and which has no political ax to grind, and which say that when we adopt the President's plan the budget deficit in 1985 is going to go up another $10 billion to $21 billion.

What in the name of all that is good and holy are you going to say to your constituents this fall, if you are running for reelection—or right now, if you are not—about Congress interest and seriousness about budget deficits?

No politician wants to incur the wrath of his constituents. I am not up for reelection this year, happily. But, if you think you are going to deal with the budget crisis and these deficits without raising taxes, you are deceiving your constitutents. We cannot get this deficit under control by cutting out social spending.

You can take all social spending, from food stamps to child immunization, everything from student aid to the National Cancer Institute, and eliminate every single function of Government except about five, and you will still have a $50 billion deficit. There are about 500 governmental functions in the budget. Eliminate 495 of them and you still have a $50 billion deficit. That is how serious this is.

Everybody raves about the recovery. Recovery from what? Recovery from the depression, and they say: Is it not wonderful? The economy is really moving along. Listen, I can move this economy any time you will let me write $200 billion worth of hot checks every year. There is no trick to that.

People love to kick the so-called Keynesian theory of economics. Lord Maynard Keynes was not a great genius. He simply said what the Bible says: Store up in the good years, so that you have something for the lean years. When the economy is down and out, spend money you do not have to stimulate it. But once you get it stimulated, stop the deficit spending. Increase taxes and do whatever you have to do to bring the deficit into line.

Here we are with a 7-percent growth rate, the hottest growth rate since 1962, one of the hottest growth rates in the history of the country, and next year when every economist worth his salt says the economy is going to turn downward if you cannot keep $200 billion deficits from occurring. When we are growing at one of the fastest rates in history, I invite anyone in this body to tell me what we are going to do next year when the growth rate drops to the area of 2 to 4 percent.

We are spending $600 million a day that we do not have. I hate to even repeat these figures. They have been said on this floor so many times, that I know they are sickening to all of us. It is not an easy chore. I have never met a politician who did not want to be loved. I have met a very few that do not want to be carried out of the U.S. Senate in a pine box.

All I am saying is that I have not known very many politicians who were beaten because they demonstrated a little courage and statesmanship. It is not easy, I admit, to make people like it when you are dealing with something that is very precious and important to them.

I spoke to a couple hundred small businessmen at breakfast this morning from mostly the Midwest and Northeastern part of the country. Small businesses are on the endangered species list in this country. One of the reasons they are is because the Government is not enforcing the antitrust laws any more. The antitrust laws are designed primarily to protect small business. The bankruptcy rate among businesses, as of this moment and all during 1983 when the recovery was so hot, was greater than it was in 1932 during the Great Depression, and we still have a staggering unemployment rate in this country.

This morning the Energy Committee reported a bill which sets aside 117,000 acres of land in my State in a national forest as wilderness area. I can tell you that 50 years from now somebody will look back and say: I am so glad somebody had the foresight to set aside a little of the very best of this country for us. I never go to New York and look at, or walk through, Central Park that I do not think: Is it not wonderful that somebody had the foresight to set aside these thousands of acres of land right in the middle of Manhattan. Think of the endless pleasure Central Park has given millions of people through the years.

I remember taking my daughter to Boston Children's Hospital in 1966. I had never been there. My brother was educated there. I could not help but wonder to whom the people of Boston, and Massachusetts, and this Nation are indebted for having the foresight to set Boston Common aside? Why, Boston would not be Boston without the Common, would it?

One time when I was Governor of my State, I was seated by Lady Bird Johnson. She said, "You know, Governor Bumpers, I was in your great city of Little Rock just the other evening. I stayed in a hotel overlooking the Arkansas River."

She said, "You know, Little Rock is the only city I have ever been in on a major waterway with no park of any kind on the river." I want Lady Bird to come back now and see the magnificent park we built right behind that hotel where she stayed. We take great pride in that in our State.

Is it not interesting that we take pride in all of these areas that we have set aside and they are usually controversial originally. But I can tell you that those things are not going to amount to much if we do not deal with two things in this country: One is the threatened nuclear holocaust. We can intensify the rhetoric, harden our position, and be tough. But the truth of the matter is the arms race is going at a pace that is unprecedented. And the nuclear holocaust threatens civilization every second of our lives. You have seen the bumper sticker that says: "When you've seen one nuclear war, you have seen them all." The other major problem, of course, is the economic apocalypse. I do not see how we are going to avoid it much longer. I cannot believe that what we are doing here is saying this is a terrible issue, it is one of the most difficult issues Congress has ever confronted, but we are not going to deal with it until after November 1984.

That is where the Senate is headed.

But I am going to take my stand here on this amendment because I do not want my children or yours to say that in that fateful year 1984 when we still had a chance to save this great system we did not do it.

Let me make one final statement. I am always making a statement talking about how much taxes we pay in this country. If you were to walk down the streets of Washington, D.C., or Little Rock, Ark., and you tell somebody that the President has just submitted a $925 billion budget to the U.S. Congress for 1985, $925 billion, and then ask, "How much of that do you think we are going to collect in personal and corporate income taxes?" Most people would say, "Well, I assume all of it."

Do you know what? In 1985 it will be about $400 billion. Way under half of the $925 billion will be collected in personal and corporate income taxes. About $404 billion in both next year. We collect another $100 billion or $100 billion in oil royalties, timber sales, excise taxes and so on. But about $400 billion will be personal and corporate taxes.

Do you know how much interest we are going to pay on the national debt next year? In 1985 it will be $125 billion. About 28 percent of all the personal and corporate taxes collected in this country.

I am going to give you another theory, one you do not hear very often, about what the deficit does. We all go home and speak to the chamber of commerce and the Rotary Clubs and say, "These deficits are terrible. You are going to have this terrible crowding out. Here is the Government borrowing $200 billion. The savings rate is at an alltime low. And the business demand for money is just now picking up as a result of the so-called economic recovery. And when Government and business start competing for the limited savings, interest rates are going to go up. It is going to stop housing, automobiles, and the recovery is going to come to a screeching halt."

Well, I will tell you something worse than that. When the American people who have money to invest realize that Congress does not have the will to raise taxes and continue to spend $200 billion a year it does not have, and that in 1988, 45 percent of all the personal and corporate taxes collected in this country is going to go for interest on the national debt, it is not going to be a question of crowding out. It is going to be a question for the institutions and people of this country who buy Treasury bills, Treasury bonds, and Government obligations. Are they going to want paper representing debt from a government which is only collecting twice as much money as is necessary to service interest on the national debt? No, they are not. They are going to want something they can kick the tires on. They are going to buy land. They are going to buy diamonds. They are going to buy art work. They are going to buy gold and silver. They are going to buy anything except Government obligations because Congress does not have the courage and the will to deal with the problem.

When that unhappy day comes, we are going to have to say to Paul

Volcker, "Nobody is willing to buy this paper any more so you start the printing presses and do not quit until I call you." That is the only way we will be able to finance the deficits in the future. It will not be by borrowing but by printing money. There will be nobody to borrow from. The American people will have lost confidence in their own Government.

And where will we be? Not in an unprecedented situation, but precisely the same situation Germany found itself in the 1920's when it took a wheelbarrow full of money to buy a loaf of bread.

Mr. GRASSLEY. And the people would steal the wheelbarrow.

Mr. BUMPERS. The Senator is absolutely correct.

Mr. President, I do not know of anything else I can say. A lot of what I have already said is old hat.

I do want to repeat one thing for my colleagues. If there is anybody listening, I want to tell them this story:

The other day most of us in this body went out to the National Cathedral for the memorial service for our departed former colleague, Frank Church. Frank died at the age of 58 from pancreatic cancer.

But I remember Senator McGovern was one of the eulogizers. There were five people there who delivered eulogies in remembrance of a truly great man. Senator McGovern talked about how Frank Church was one of the first people in the Senate to resist the Vietnam war, and he comes from one of the most conservative States in the Nation—Idaho. But Frank Church said he did not understand the war, he thought it was wrong, and he tried to stop it.

Senator McGovern said one time that Frank Church put his arm around him after they had just lost another battle in the Senate. He said, "George, isn't it interesting, we are always right but we always lose."

Finally, it was the American people, not the people in the Congress but the American people, who demanded an end to that war. That is the reason it stopped.

Congress never had the will to deal with that war.

But he went on to say that Frank Church introduced the first wilderness bill, and was the first person to oppose the Vietnam war, always fought for nutrition programs for children, nutrition programs for pregnant poor women, health care for the elderly.

As I sat and listened to that, I could not help but think of the difference between the value system we live by on a daily basis and the value system we want our eulogizers to talk about at our memorial services.

Frank Church apparently told George McGovern a long time ago about how he had cancer when he was a 23-year-old student at Harvard Law School, and how he realized for the first time as a young man how fickle and transitory life is and how senseless it is to shave and hedge and avoid the truth and responsibility.

So, it was good for me. I got a great deal out of that memorial service, more than anything else in a very long time, and I renewed my own vows to try to do the best I could for the country. One of the vows is that I am going to vote as responsibly as my intelligence allows me, and in this particular case it dictates to me that I do the very best I can to protect the greatest country on Earth from what I know is going to be the abysmal failure if we do not do something responsible.

Mr. President, I see no other Senator who wishes to speak. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I listened with interest to the remarks of the Senator from Arkansas. Before he leaves the floor, I wonder if he would think out loud with me a minute.

I heard him speak of taxes. I heard him talk about the need for courage, and I applaud the Senator from Arkansas; he has never been short of that quality.

I know that he supported the Hollings freeze amendment. I wonder, when the Senator from Arkansas looks at the proposal we have before us now which is more drastic in the cuts it makes in domestic programs, certainly more drastic in the cuts it makes in defense, I wonder if he has looked at the revenue side of this proposal.

This proposal, as I understand it, would include $10 billion in unspecified, additional revenues—not telling us why, not telling us how. It freezes programs; assigns no new funds to them. But there is no other mention of revenues—beyond the implied $10 billion—in this plan.

I assume somebody is holding a Finance Committee bill that raises some money. I remember hearing the White House insist all the time there would be no new revenues without further spending cuts. But I look at this plan, and I see what it cuts on spending, and I see what it raises on revenue, and I can tell you, Mr. President, I can quickly understand why the telegrams are coming from the National Chamber of Commerce, and the National Association of Manufacturers. This plan is certainly in keeping with the idea that everything ought to happen on the spending side while nothing happens on the taxing side; $10 billion is in the finance bill. It says nothing more than that in the way of revenues.

Is that fair, Mr. President, to go and tell the people—the aged, the halt, the lame—it was necessary for us to do something? I have been preparing them for that. When I was running for election last time, I said "We have tried to protect you, but if there is a chance to do something overall about inflation, we are going to have to do it and everybody is going to have to share some pain."

I wish the Senator would tell me if this is a fair sharing of pain, when those people who get over $80,000 a year get the big tax cut while that is where the deficit has come from. The Senator from Arkansas has talked about that so eloquently over a period of time. We passed the "10-10-5" tax plan, all the additional shelters, the increased depletion allowance, accelerated depreciation, the investment tax credits—all of those were heaped in, and the top 3 percent of high-income people get $9,000. Are we asking them to share any pain in the plan?

Will the Senator tell me, where is there any pain for the people in the top 3-percent income level when they get $9,000 a year?

Maybe there is some pain if they are defense contractors, because some military spending is trimmed. Maybe there is some pain if they are on social security and they are over 65, because they will suffer just a little bit. They will lose a few hundred dollars in social security. But when I look at people who are at the bottom of the ladder, who are disabled veterans, 100-percent disabled—in this bill, that veteran is going to take a $2,000 cut over 3 years.

To get the deficit down, to see that inflation does not start again, I am ready to tell that man he has to take some kind of pain. But I am not ready to tell him that he deserves to take a $2,200 cut over 3 years when there is not going to be anything done to the guy in the upper 3 percent, nothing except the reward that we give him—the reward I say—by the fact that we put all these tax cuts in.

Mr. President, if that is the kind of fair plan we are talking about, I think we better consult a different dictionary. I would like to have the views of the Senator from Arkansas on that.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I appreciate the remarks of the Senator from Florida. I think the Senator knows that I agree with everything he has said. The reason I like his proposal, at least in one respect, much more than I like this KGB proposal is, first of all, he postpones indexing. That is worth $51 billion over the next 3 years. That is a very significant cut.

The reason I preferred the Hollings amendment yesterday is that it postponed indexing. The reason, I assume, that the postponement of indexing is not in the KGB amendment is that there is absolutely no chance of its passing, if that is in there.

Let me say to the Senator, if I could have everything the way I would like it, I would do what he urges and more. I am going to support a 15-percent surtax, a corporate tax, provided we can get about a $250,000 exemption for small business. I will support a reasonable surtax on personal income taxes. I did my very best last year to cap the third year of the 1981 tax cut at $720. I am one of three Senators in the Senate, along with Senator HOLLINGS and Senator BRADLEY, who voted for the President's first reconciliation bill that cut $56 billion in spending and voted against the tax cuts.

Mr. CHILES. The Senator had a little of that once. He is usually a person who only has to have a lesson taught to him one time. We passed reconciliation, but we got the tax cut, too. The tax cut gave to those at the top, and the reconciliation took from those at the bottom. The Senator has had an opportunity to read the CBO report, I believe.

Mr. BUMPERS. I have, Mr. President.

Mr. CHILES. It shows the disparity out there now between those people at the top and those people at the bottom. We have already had that once. What he is telling me is we are going to go in this trap once again. He knows it will not pass. He is going to vote for this and maybe give it enough to pass, but he is telling me he does not think the corporate tax is going to pass, either, and some of those others. I am surprised he would walk into that trap again.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, it is not easy, and based on the logic, which I inescapably conclude from what he said is, since we cannot have indexing, let us do nothing——

Mr. CHILES. No, sir, not at all. As the Senator said, we have a more balanced plan coming up after this one that we will have a chance to vote on.

Mr. BUMPERS. I am going to support the Senator and I fully expect to have the opportunity, because I do not think this amendment is going to pass.

I will say one other thing. I was cosponsor of Senator CHAFEE's amendment the other night where indexing was brought up singly, by itself. I am not all that opposed to indexing. I think there is a good case to be made for it. But, as Senator CHAFEE so eloquently said, we cannot afford it.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Mr. President, I would like to ask a question of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CHILES. I shall be happy to answer.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Being a member of the Budget Committee and sharing that responsibility with him, I am very cognizant of the interest on both sides of the aisle in trying to bring fiscal responsibility to this country. The country needs it, we need it, to show, as a matter of fact, that we are aware.

I am confused by what I hear on the floor, that we are cutting with this particular budget proposal. That is almost an Orwellian term of rhetoric, because what we are doing is simply holding the line. We are not cutting, we are just saying, let us hold it for 1 more year at the same funding level at which we have already been operating.

As I said earlier, I find strong support for this particular approach from those who want to do something and who are very worried about the future of our country and our inability to take some really strong, meaningful action and are supportive of it, even the elderly, who do have to struggle with the income, if they see it as equitable across the board. But I would only ask the Senator if he views this as cutting when, indeed, it is simply holding the line?

Mr. CHILES. Well, you can certainly characterize that two ways. When I look at a program like drug enforcement involving the Coast Guard and the Justice Department, a freeze with no allowance for inflation tends to sour the position of the proponents. What you are saying is they have to lay off personnel and when you lay off personnel, you diminish the extent of the program. I call that a cut.

Now, you can say they are getting the same dollars they got 2 years ago, but I would say to the Senator, if there are fewer agents out there in the field, if there are fewer hours that the Coast Guard can patrol, if there are fewer dollars allowable for the Coast Guard cutters, then to me that is a cut.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. I would say, Mr. President, to the distinguished Senator from Florida, as he knows, we do not cap according to particular line item. We simply cap, as I believe the Senator's budget recommendation does, as well as the chairman's recommendation, the discretionary amounts of funding in total to last year's. What it would do would be, of course, essentially a decision of whatever department, whether it is Justice or Transportation or Treasury, to decide the priorities within their departments. I think the Senator would share, as I, a desire to see some funding levels increased over last year because it would be my choice or the Senator's to see certain priorities given an emphasis in funding. But what we have always attempted to do but really avoided was making some of the hard decisions. I think that time has come, and I think the public wants it. It then becomes a responsibility not only of the Appropriations Committee and its process but, more importantly, other departments and agencies. I share the concern of the Senator about the need to increase enforcement because it is exceptionally important that we have increased personnel for drug enforcement.

Mr. CHILES. The argument I was making to the Senator from Arkansas is that if you attempt to impose this kind of freeze, I am going to fight for those programs that I just mentioned, Coast Guard, and DEA, and Justice. Somebody else is going to fight, and I will probably help, for the veterans functions to see that they are not cut because a freeze means a reduction of doctors or nursing staff. If someone else is going to fight for one area, it is not going to work without somebody being cut when you have this limited amount of money.

I am saying that if wits are necessary—and I am prepared to say that they are—my plan requires some wits, too. But is it not fair, and should we not be closing the gap with revenues as well as spending cuts?

Mr. President, 18.9 percent of the GNP is going for taxes, 24½ percent is going for spending. That is our problem. We have that gap.

Now, this plan sure takes a whack at bringing the spending down, but it does not do anything to bring the revenue up. If I am going to invoke the kind of pain this plan is going to invoke, I want to be able to look the people in the eye and say we shared that pain. We did not absolve the upper 3 percent that get $9,000 a year as a result of a tax cut. We put a little burden on them, too. We let them pay a little something, too.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. I agree with the Senator on that point. That is almost past history because we have adopted the tax portion of this package already. So, of course, we assume the work has been done for which we have already voted.

Mr. CHILES. Well, that may be past history, but then I guess the Senator is saying that she is satisfied that the revenue we have raised is fair, and that it matches. If I look and see the amount raised by that and the amount of spending cut in the Senator's plan, I do not think it is fair.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. It does match.

Mr. CHILES. The Senator from Florida in his plan has a 2-year freeze on indexing that provides another $31 billion. That is not a heck of a lot of money, but fairer, I think, in saying there is going to be more of a sharing of this burden than saying we are going to make a drastic cut on the spending side but we are not going to pick up any money on the revenue side.

Mr. PRYOR addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas is recognized.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I rise at this time to support the Kassebaum-Grassley-Biden amendment which is now before the Senate. Mr. President, my remarks will be very short, but I compliment the very distinguished Senator from Kansas (Mrs. KASSEBAUM), the very distinguished Senator from Iowa (Mr. GRASSLEY), and the very distinguished Senator from Delaware (Mr. BIDEN) because they have basically taken the lead and brought this issue to the forefront in the Senate at this moment.

Mr. President, I think that an unprecedented deficit is going to call for an unprecedented remedy. I think what we are considering this afternoon may well be an unprecedented remedy. I do not fear an unprecedented remedy at this moment to deal with this deficit because I believe that if a poll could be taken of the American people as to how they might or might not vote should they be in the well of the Senate this evening or tomorrow when the amendment's fate is resolved, I truly believe we would see a vast majority supporting this concept of a budget freeze. Not only last May of 1983 did I support the Hollings amendment to freeze the 1984 appropriations at the 1983 levels—if I am not mistaken, I was one of 16 Senators in this body to support the Hollings amendment at that time—but I also was one of 38 Senators who supported a Hollings amendment which was offered last night. I think we can see, Mr. President, there is a growing concern and certainly a growing worry about not what we would call a troublesome deficit any longer, but an astronomical deficit which is going to take this country under unless we do something now.

I also feel, after visiting in 22 different counties during the Easter recess period in my home State, when I not only held town meetings but also coffees, meetings with retirees and senior citizens, just about every type of group imaginable in our State of Arkansas, I can report without a great deal of reservation that the people of our State—and I think this is true in this country—are worried sick about this deficit. But the greater worry, I think, is their worry about us. They are worried about our inability and our unwillingness and our lack of commitment to address this issue.

I predicted for the last several months that we would not deal with this issue until after the election. I have always said in those public statements that I hoped this would not be the case. But my fear is that we are headed to have a lameduck session of Congress that can be convened on December 1. At that point, unless we do something in the nature of what the distinguished Senator from Kansas and her colleagues have asked us to do, we will be on the brink of going over the cliff; and at that time, my fear is that it will come too late.

We still have an opportunity, we have a window of opportunity, to do something that is not only fair and timely but also something that is right. It is correct.

I believe, very respectfully, that our people back home want us to do something, and they want us to take dramatic and drastic steps to do something about a deficit which all of us in this Chamber know is totally out of control.

I think that, first, our people would like us to consider something that is fair, and this is one reason why I rise in support of the proposal of the distinguished Senator from Kansas. It is fair because all of us are going to share equally in whatever happens. That applies to the President's salary. It applies to each agency and department of Government. It applies across the board.

I know that a lot of people say, "My goodness, what are we going to do about the Federal retirees? What are we going to do about the social security recipients? What are we going to do about the military?"

I know it is easy to take a simple freeze resolution such as that offered by the distinguished Senator from Kansas and pick it to pieces and find little areas of concern where it might be troublesome to us, as politicians, to vote in an election year for such a sweeping amendment as the distinguished Senator and her colleagues have offered.

Mr. President, I think today is a grand opportunity for this body to demonstrate not only our will but also our commitment to recognize a problem and do something about it before it is too late.

If there is one observation I have after 5½ years of serving in the Senate, 6 years in the House, 4 years as Governor, and 6 years in the State legislature, it is that our political institutions, especially those parts of our political institutions that are under what we call the legislative branch, very seldom act. We react. We react to crisis after crisis; and from 1 week to another we see that crisis talked about, whatever the case may be, on the floor of this great deliberative body.

I think this is a grand opportunity today for all Members of this body to recognize the fact that this is a golden opportunity not to react further. It is an opportunity to act before it is too late.

I believe there is something else our people want to see us do, and that is to do something immediately. This can be an immediate addressing of this problem of the deficit. It will be unprecedented, and it will be, in my opinion, a very pleasant surprise for the American people to wake up tomorrow and read on the front page of every newspaper across this country that the U.S. Senate, finally, in its wisdom and its courage and whatever, resolved to do what was necessary to meet the task.

Whatever is necessary sometimes means doing what is unpopular and what might be misunderstood and to do what, in my opinion, might not be good politics. But I truly believe that we have to put politics aside. We have to put partisanship aside.

I have never been one who has gone along and blamed the President, this President, for the deficit we have now. I think there is enough blame to go around for all of us. I truly believe that in this bipartisan approach, in a fair and equitable approach, we have at least a partial solution to an immediate crisis that we must address at this time.

Yes, we can pick this legislation to pieces. We can bring up arguments about it that might deflect the basic argument. We can bring up those concerns that apply in our own States, such as agriculture, and right down the line.

Mr. President, this is a larger problem than just part of the whole. We have to look at the whole picture, and the whole picture right now is that we are in deep trouble. We are in deep trouble because we have allowed this situation to linger, to fester, to become malignant. It is now time to address this problem, and it is time to address it in the freeze as proposed by the distinguished Senator from Kansas, the distinguished Senator from Iowa, and the distinguished Senator from Delaware.

Once again, I compliment these three fine Senators for addressing this issue in a fair and bipartisan approach, dealing with a deficit with which we must be concerned. Not only must we be concerned, but also, we must be careful this afternoon that we send the right signal to our people and to the financial markets.

Finally, Mr. President, I also compliment the distinguished Senator from Montana (Mr. BAUCUS), who also has been a prime mover of the amendment which is before the Senate this afternoon. His work and his leadership in this area have been absolutely tremendous. As a member of the Finance Committee, Senator BAUCUS recognizes definitely the problems we face, and he recognizes what we have to do in dealing with this problem at this time.

So I say in closing, Mr. President, let us give the American people a pleasant surprise in the morning. Let us do something they do not expect of us. Let us do something that is going to take all our will and all our courage, and try to summon up whatever efforts we can, in order to make certain that the people have credibility in our action and to make them realize that this body considers the deficit the No. 1 problem in this country at this time, and that we are willing this afternoon to address it head-on and to do something about it.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. PRYOR) for his very thoughtful remarks and his support of this proposal, which is not easy for any of us.

I have to wonder how much people care. We have been in this debate since 10:30 this morning, and very few of our colleagues have been on the floor. Maybe nobody really does care. I think the public does. But I wonder where my colleagues are.

I have heard a lot about capping defense and how we simply cannot live with that, that it would damage our defense system; that, as the Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER), the distinguished chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said, it would be unilateral disarmament.

I would appreciate someone coming to the floor and moving this debate along. I think we very much need to be able to hear some of the reasons why this is going to be such a terrible plan, and I am certainly looking forward to engaging in that debate.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, if the Senator from Kansas will yield for a question on the issue of defense, it is my understanding that even should this particular freeze proposal be adopted at this time and be adopted in the other body and be signed into law by the President, this freeze would still entitle a $16 billion growth in our defense outlay. Am I correct?

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. The Senator from Arkansas is exactly correct. That is outlays which already have been appropriated and passed, which will be there as an outlay increase in 1985.

In the defense cap, of course, as in all caps, it is just a reflection of budget authority. So it does not stop any program midway. It does not stop a ship that is half built, for example. But it will require some tough decisions of that outyear spending.

Mr. PRYOR. I have one final comment in response to the distinguished Senator from Kansas. I was not on the floor yesterday afternoon when the distinguished Senator from Mississippi, Senator STENNIS, was speaking. I think the subject at that moment was the Hollings amendment then pending before the Senate. But it was my understanding, and I certainly do not want to misquote my colleague and dear friend, Senator STENNIS, but it was my understanding that in some areas Senator STENNIS, who I do not think has any equal in the Senate on armed services matters, stated some of these procurements of the DOD could be postponed without jeopardizing our national defense. Once again I do not know whether he was speaking directly to this point—I am not saying he is a supporter of the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, but I think generally I understood his statement to be that some of these procurement items could be postponed without jeopardizing our national defense posture.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Not being a member of the Armed Services Committee I would not want to comment. I certainly believe so. Many thoughtful analysts of the defense budget, as a matter of fact, feel very strongly that they should be actually in order to strengthen our defense posture, that we only weaken ourselves if we become so flabby, so to speak, that we have a technology and systems that have outran manpower to operate those systems, or vice-versa.

I think actually what this simply does for 1985 is focus on some of those very important decisions that will have to be made by the Department of Defense, and none of us want to see our defense posture weakened. As a matter of fact, I think good arguments can be made, if there were those on the floor who disagree with this plan, that this strengthens our defense system.

Mr. PRYOR. I thank the distinguished Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ABDNOR). The Senator from Colorado is recognized.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, in the Middle Ages persons who were accused of witchcraft were bound hand and foot and the veracity of the charges of witchcraft against them were proven by throwing this person bound hand and foot into the nearest lake or stream.

It was believed that if the person so bound sank and drowned, it was deemed to be proof that the charge was baseless and the person was innocent of the charge of witchcraft, but if the person floated, then it showed that the person was in fact a witch and was plucked out of the water and burned at the stake.

Senators, I believe, as they consider this amendment, may have some difficulty trying to figure out whether they want to float or sink, because we are presented with really a choice which is at best unpalatable on either side and really quite risky from a political standpoint and which, in fact, from a deeper sense than how it may affect the fortune of any political party or any candidates really has an element of risk. Whether we pass or defeat this amendment, it has an element of risk for our country as well.

I think most Senators understand the issue very clearly and so I am not trying to persuade anyone, but I wish to explain how I am going to vote and how I decided whether I wanted to float or sink.

I have decided, and I did so not easily, I must say, but after very careful thought and reflection of the risk on both sides, that I am going to support the proposal brought forward by our colleague, Senator KASSEBAUM, and Senator GRASSLEY, Senator BIDEN, and Senator BAUCUS, and I wish to at the outset——

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I am happy to yield.

Mr. GORTON. Does that constitute a sink or a float?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I invite the Senators and others who may be tuned in to stay tuned in and judge for themselves.

I wish, before I explain the basis of my vote, to congratulate my colleagues for the initiative that they have taken. They have succeeded, whether it passes or not, in bringing to the Senate the most persuasive, most serious alternative to the so-called Rose Garden plan that has been presented or that is likely to be presented.

Starting so far as I know with just three or four Members of this body, it has now assumed the proportions of a nationwide movement, enjoying the support and endorsement of some of the most thoughtful and influential organizations in this country, membership organizations with millions of members in agriculture, business, the professions, the arts, in every State and many communities across this country.

I think to bring that kind of issue forward, particularly something as basically difficult as an alternative budget and something which shows as much courage as a budget freeze, to bring it from ground zero to the kind of support it is going to have here today I think is an extraordinary achievement, and I congratulate them for it.

I do not know whether this thing is going to pass or not. I hope it does pass. But whether it does or not, they have succeeded in bringing into focus for the first time really the seriousness of this issue.

Mr. President, I also wish to acknowledge especially my colleagues from the Democratic side of the aisle who have stood up to be counted on this issue, and I say so as a lifelong Republican and a loyal member of my party and a person who has stumped, I think, in practically every State of the Union as well as my own State of Colorado for the candidates of my party, and I will bet on 500 occasions I have criticized the other party for being irresponsible in the treatment of taxpayer funds and in the failure of the Democratic Party to balance the budget, but I must say that within the last month I have seen greater signs of true statesmanship from the other side of the aisle than at any time I can recall. I listened with great interest to the presentation of the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS) a day or two ago on this freeze proposal when he spoke so eloquently about this issue, and I must say I found it very persuasive. Indeed my own decision to support this measure came during the deliberations of the Budget Committee when I heard the presentation made on this matter by Senator BIDEN and, as he reeled off all the reasons that he was supporting as someone who has not been previously deeply associated with drastic budget cutting efforts, it just came to me if he could take that kind of step of faith as a Democrat to come as far as he is comming toward balancing the budget, then Republicans should be able to do at least as well, and I personally will be very much embarrassed if there are not at least as many Republicans who stand up to be counted on this issue on this day at this moment in the history of our country as there are Democrats. I do not know how it is going to turn out. I have not seen the whip check. But I will just tell you that I believe that the Democracts in this Chamber have done a great service to their country and to their party by the thoughtful and responsible way that they have approached this, and I intend to approach it with what I hope will be a similar degree of responsibility and thoughtfulness.

Then briefly just to explain why I am going to vote for this, it is very simple. I think we have reached such a desperate situation in this country that the risks of voting for this and even of adopting this, of enacting it into law, are far less than the risk of adopting a lesser measure of budgetary restraint.

I do not want to cut defense. I do not even want to freeze defense. I think we live in a very dangerous world which is made safer to a measurable degree by the defense buildup of the last 2 or 3 years. I do not happen to think that the security and peace of the world hinges solely on U.S. defense preparedness. It also depends in large measure upon our strength of purpose, on our adherence to the highest ethical and moral traditions of our country, upon the persuasiveness and ingenuity of our diplomacy and indeed upon the strength of our economy which is so greatly threatened by the budget deficits but, nonetheless, after everything else is said and done talk about the war of ideas and about diplomacy in the United Nations, and so on, I still think the cornerstone of peace in the world is U.S. military preparedness. That is essential, and I am loathe to restrain the growth of defense spending, particularly since we went through a decade in which defense was, as the Senator from Texas loves to say, and properly, when defense was underfunded, and we have just had a couple of years now in which we have begun to make back some of the gains that were needed to make up for losses that we suffered during the 1970's.

We are beginning to modernize the fleet. We are beginning to bring on line new weapons systems in the Air Force that we need. We are deploying the new M-1 tank, which has proven to be enormously capable in its deployment in Europe. We have given the troops a long overdue pay raise and have restored a degree of fair treatment for them. And I am loathe to do anything which would undermine our efforts in that respect.

Yet I am willing to make a big sacrifice on something I think is important by freezing defense spending in order to get the other freezes in this bill.

I do not like to see us freeze some of the domestic programs, either. There are some that I do not have much trouble about freezing. There are some that I would not have any trouble abolishing; some that I think are obviously wasteful and extravagant.

But, for the most part, that is not the case. Most of the programs, even the ones that are not particularly near and dear to me, are useful, are meritorious, do some good for somebody. Probably every program in the budget, even those that I might think are foolish or ill-considered or extravagant, are important to somebody.

But I am just convinced that there is a certain point at which you cannot try to fine tune, that you have got to make a gaged policy decision of how important do you think it is to balance this budget. Is it important enough to take some chances? I think it is. Is it important enough to make some compromises? I conclude that I am ready to compromise almost anything. I am ready even to restrain the growth of defense. I am ready to vote, as I did last week, for the tax component of this package. It is just a matter of how important I evaluate the problem.

Now, why is it so serious that we do something more about the deficit than is suggested by the Rose Garden budget or the leadership budget, as it is called? The reason, I think, is very simple and certainly does not require any explanation from me.

Our economy is in very shaky shape. Business is good; employment is good around the country. There are a lot of favorable straws in the wind. But there is also evident, in conversations with businessmen and women, investors and economists, a growing realization that this thing could unravel very quickly; that, indeed, with the enormous deficits that are in prospect—$200 billion this year, next year, and the year after that—that if we do not do something to get those under control, increased interest rates are inevitable and with that there will surely come rising inflation, rising unemployment, and perhaps a prolonged period of economic stagnation. Indeed, that process is already well underway.

You know, interest rates today are not the same as they were 6 months or 1 year ago. As a matter of fact, they are about 2 full percentage points higher than they were 12 months ago. I am talking about the prime rate; I am talking about mortgage lending rates. And it appears to me that we have had the last uptick in interest rates that we can stand before this thing really begins to fall apart, the last uptick in interest rates that we can stand before homebuilding just comes to an absolute stop, automobile sales really begin to fall apart, and we see a serious rise in unemployment which, indeed, already haunts many areas of the country. That is why it is so serious.

The second reason why I am in favor of a different plan than the rose garden plan is not just that I think we need to do more in the way of deficit reduction than is suggested by the Rose Garden budget, but because we need to do something which is effective at once. Now, one of the features of the leadership plan, which was narrowly recommended by the Budget Committee, is that it is heavily backloaded; that is, most of the real savings and deficit reductions occur not now, but after the next election, in the second and third year of the projected plan, at a time when many people suspect that the savings will be undone.

The plan brought forth by Senators KASSEBAUM, GRASSLEY, BIDEN, and BAUCUS does not work that way. It makes the savings now when they will do the most good from an economic standpoint and when they are the most credible.

In my opinion—and you can all make your own judgment—but in my opinion, anything which happens in the way of budget savings before the election is about 500 times as credible as anything which is scheduled to take place after the election.

Up on Wall Street and out on Main Street, frankly, they are laughing at our efforts to control the Federal deficit. And all this talk about how brave we are going to be after the election, about all the budget cuts that are going to go into effect after the election, that does not impress anybody.

I guess I do not want to overstate it, and I certainly do not mean to give offense to my colleagues, but all of this agonizing over making large budget cuts that do not go into effect for 2 or 3 years does not enhance the reputation of this body, either for economic horsesense or credibility. They are laughing at us out in the country where decisions are being made about interest rates and investments and the things that are the economic future of this country.

So, in summary, that is why I like this plan, because it is bolder than what has been proposed, because it acts sooner, because it is before the election, and because it affects virtually every program of Government. It does not exempt any of the ones that are the most sensitive.

Now, it would be so tempting to say "Couldn't we carve out this particular program because it is so sensitive? The dollars are not very big. It affects millions of people. There is an election coming up." On that basis we could exempt practically every single spending function in this budget, because to somebody everything is sensitive. I could do without any more bus depots in Miami, but I doubt if the Senators from Florida could. And maybe they could say let us do away with something out in Colorado, and I might find that hard to do. Indeed, that is how we got into this mess is by horse trading for increased spending for every category and function of the Federal budget.

What our four colleagues have done is brought us a budget proposal which, for the first time, gets us into a horse trading process for budget restraint in which I have to put on the table things that are near and dear to my heart in order to get other Senators who have pet projects that they feel keenly about to come to the table and say, "I am willing to make a sacrifice in those." I think that is about the only way we are going to do it.

Now, I wish to comment briefly on the defense issue from the standpoint of how it will really affect our ability to cope with our adversaries, especially with the Soviet Union, or other threats. I am very much concerned about that.

While I do not share the belief that some have expressed, particularly the distinguished chairman of the Armed Services Committee, that this constitutes unilateral disarmament—indeed, I would hope, upon reflection, that he would not so characterize it—nonetheless, I do think freezing the budget, even freezing it at the highest levels we have ever seen in peace or war, nonetheless, is a serious step. And before I was ready to take it, I sought advice from people whose judgment I respect.

I want to tell you what one person who served in the President's Cabinet—he does not presently serve in the President's Cabinet—who served in the Pentagon, who has a lifelong association with the defense establishment of this country, who is an authority, who is a graduate of one of our military academies, and who, I stress, has served in the position of cabinet level responsibility, told me about defense spending. He told me everything except, "Go ahead and quote me directly."

He said:

> If you went through the Pentagon and fired half of the people over there, the result would be to strengthen, not to weaken our defense. The reality of it is we have got so many people running around shuffling papers, creating priorities, monitoring these programs, that they are impeding, not enhancing, the defense capability of this country.

Now, I do not know whether this is really true or not. I sense that it is. I have been through a few business reorganizations. I once had the unhappy job 25 years ago of taking over a company that some people had driven right to the brink of bankruptcy. And, like a darn fool, I stepped in and said, "Well, I think I can straighten this thing out," and finally I did.

But, out of that experience, and some others I have had, I am convinced that, in many cases, a leaner staff is a stronger staff; a leaner staff is a more effective staff, not just more cost effective, but actually more mission effective.

I believe that there is at least a possibility that large savings can be made in the Defense Establishment in a way that would not only not harm but might actually enhance our defense preparedness. But, even if I did not think that was true, I would still vote for this budget because I think at this point the overriding consideration is to avoid the kind of financial catastrophe which I believe is in prospect.

Mr. President, I was thinking as I walked over here of that soliloquy of Hamlet where he said, "To be or not to be." And I cannot quote it. I have not looked at it since I was in school, but I remember one of the lines out of that was the question of whether it is nobler in the mind to suffer the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune or whether to take arms against them, or something to that effect.

And the point it comes down to—and I see the Senator from Washington, who is an authority on such matters, is on his feet—but does the Senator not recall that Hamlet summed up by saying something to this effect:

> Thus does conscience make cowards of us all and rather we bear the ills we have than fly to others that we know not of?

That is really the issue in this amendment. Shall we just keep going on down the road we have been on? Shall we just bear the ills we have? Shall we leave this thing on autopilot? Shall we have deficits of $200 billion or $300 billion every year out into the future? Or is it at long last time for us to do something that is bold enough to really make a dent in this?

Now, 5 years ago, I got up on this floor and I argued as forcefully as I could that it was time to start getting this thing back on track. And I could not persuade a majority then. And I did it 4 years ago, and I was joined by the Senator from Iowa and many who are in the Chamber. And, time after time, many of us have warned, including, I note, the Senator from Washington, who is the acting manager of this legislation, have warned that we would finally come to the point where the situation would be truly desperate.

And, unfortunately, Congress had declined to deal with this problem when it could have done so easily, and relatively without pain. Now we find ourselves with what may turn out to be the last chance to cope with this before we drive the Nation's economy off the cliff. Maybe this is not the last chance. Maybe there is one more chance in the debt. Maybe there is one more opportunity. Maybe we can put another band-aid on it, and come back in 6 or 8 months after the election when it is alleged we will have a lot more courage because we will all have been reelected, the President will have been reelected and there will still be time to save the country from permanent damage as a result of these horrendous deficits. Maybe—I do not think there is any dead certainty that is true.

Personally, I say as one who is a candidate for reelection in November, I do not think the Senate is going to be any more courageous after some of us have been elected than now because there is going to be another crop of people running for reelection in 1986. There is also an election coming up. The best course and the best politics for the country is to do the best we can; that, in my opinion, is to vote for the freeze amendment.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I yield the floor.

Mr. TOWER. I would be happy to ask the Senator a question. The Senator quoted a reliable source. That is what the press does all the time. I wish we could know the names of the person quoted because, quite frankly, I find some of the reliable sources quoted by the press from time to time are not very reliable.

Did this reliable source tell the Senator how much could be saved by cutting the civilian bureaucracy in the Pentagon in half? Incidentally, I would like to do that. The Armed Services Committee is undertaking quite a massive study which will be released pretty soon. It will indicate there is some reorganization that needs to be done. But he specified a saving that could be achieved over 3 years by cutting the civilian bureaucracy in the Pentagon in half.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, let me make it absolutely clear that the point which I was making—and I was quoting a source which I am not privileged to name but I may call him on the phone, and ask if I may not only mention him publicly but in fact insert in the RECORD——

Mr. TOWER. I have been trying to get him on the phone all morning. He is out of pocket——

Mr. ARMSTRONG. A letter which he has written me. But his point is not that we would make large dollar savings. We might do that. His point was that we would improve the effectiveness of the Pentagon and the military operation. Here is his reasoning. His reasoning is that we have layered in so many additional points of reference, points of approval, checks and cross-checks, so many bureaucratic imperatives that it becomes impossible to produce new weapons, to develop new strategies, to organize and reorganize, or even to fight a war, if it should ever come to that. I do not know whether that is true. I am not an authority on that. I do not claim it is true. But it sounds true.

Mr. TOWER. I do not necessarily disagree with everything the Senator said, but did he make reference to how much of this is congressionally mandated?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I did not.

Mr. TOWER. Congress has gotten into the micromanagement of the Defense Department. The Congress created the Assistant Secretary for Reserve Affairs position.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. If the Senator would yield, let me tell the Senator from Texas that I am in the process of writing an article on this subject because it is evident to me that an enormous part of the extra cost of running the Pentagon has been mandated by the Congress of the United States, by people who have bases in their States or districts which they do not want to see closed, and by people who have manufacturing operations in their States or districts which they want to continue in operation. I am turning over in my mind the propriety of mentioning specific examples of weapons systems which year after year have been recommended for no funding by the Air Force which somehow show up in the budget year after year, specifically in the appropriations bills as they come over from the House, and airplanes that continue to be built long after they have been recommended for disapproval by the Air Force, and other weapons as well. The point that is made by the Senator from Texas is absolutely right.

I say that as one who in his own State military installations which I would not like to see closed. But I would say to the Senator, and to my colleagues, if there are military functions or other functions in my State which we can do without, or missions which can be more effectively or more economically performed elsewhere, I say close them down in Colorado. Put them in where this could be best done for the country.

Mr. TOWER. That is what the Senator from Colorado says. I know him to be a man of his word, that he would perhaps vote to shut down all the commissaries, would vote to permit the Department of Defense to close bases with no notice to Congress, to shut them down and walk away from them; he would be prepared to vote to eliminate Davis-Bacon as it applies, and he would be prepared to eliminate the restraints of contracting out. There are a number of things that I am sure the Senator from Colorado would be willing to vote for, including voting against all the congressional add-ons on the defense budget, and all the congressionally mandated waste. But what assurance can he give me that the majority of the Congress will do that? Can you realistically assume that Congress is going to eliminate all of the congressionally mandated waste? The Congress will not, I can assure you. If you make the Draconian cuts in defense, you can bet your bottom dollar that everybody is going to be protecting his own interest. That will make sure that the cuts do not come out of his hide.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, if the Senator would yield, I would be happy to respond to that. I will do so briefly. It is very possible that the Senator from Texas is correct. He is among the most experienced Members of this body in the process he has described. He has personally seen it over and over again. He has been a leader in trying to bring some degree of coherence, commonsense to our defense requirements, and to preclude the kind of log rolling that he has just described. I honor him and congratulate him for it.

I will admit there is a good chance the kind of cynical approach that he has describe would prevail. But let me urge him to consider that there might be another outcome: that a new day could be dawning, even in this Chamber. The amendment, which our four colleagues bring us, may in fact be the evidence of this. If this gets as big a vote as I think it is going to—I do not know whether it is going to be passed, and I would be amazed if it did not get 30, 35, or maybe 40 votes—it will be a turning point, whether it passes or not, of extraordinary significance. It will mean a truly bipartisan group is sticking their necks out in a way that Senators to my recollection have never previously been known to do. If an impossible dream can come true on this bill, perhaps an impossible dream could come true in the kind of process that the Senator from Texas describes.

Mr. PRYOR. Will the Senator yield? I hope the Senator from Colorado takes note that this Democratic Senator has crossed over the aisle and has joined his rank over here temporarily to say how much——

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Could we strike that "temporarily" from the RECORD?

Mr. PRYOR. It was temporary. Maybe my colleagues do not like the temporary part on my side. I say sincerely to the Senator from Colorado how very much I appreciate his statesmanlike approach to this issue, and laying partisanship aside. Getting where we must go to pass such a resolution or such an amendment as this is going to take a bipartisan approach. The Senator from Colorado has so well set the stage, as have the four cosponsors of this legislation, to bring it to the Senate's attention at this time. I truly believe this is one of the most statesmanlike addresses or speeches that I have heard in this body for a long time. I am deeply appreciative of the Senator from Colorado for making that statement.

If I could just add this: As I go home and talk about this deficit, as I know all of us do, the thing that rings the bell more than anything else with any audience is when I say let us put partisanship aside and let us approach this on a bipartisan nature. This deficit, this issue, and this concern belongs to all of us. The blame is on all of us.

I want to thank the Senator from Colorado. I will return to my side of the aisle. I wanted to come over here and make that statement.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I say thanks to the Senator from Arkansas and tell him that I hope his brief visit to our side of the aisle has been something which he found rewarding, that he felt at home here, and that he will come back often. I thank him for his leadership and statesmanship as well.

Mr. BAUCUS. Would the Senator yield?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. My intention is to yield the floor. May I do that?

Mr. BAUCUS. I want to congratulate the Senator, too, on his statement. I know, as has been stated by the Senator from Arkansas, what a difficult decision this was for the Senator from Colorado. I can tell from the statement the Senator from Colorado has made that he has spent a lot of time thinking about it. I want to thank the Senator for taking the time; and I want to compliment him for joining us in a very bipartisan way, in a nonpartisan way to try to get the ball moving in the right direction. All of us as Americans have to make the sacrifice. I want to compliment the Senator.

The second point I would like to make is in response to the statement made by the chairman of the Armed Services Committee. I think in some sense all of us in this Chamber appear to agree with a large portion of what the chairman said. Many Members of the Congress will be tempted to keep their local commissaries open, their local bases open. Many Members of the House and Senate would be tempted to propose add-ons for home consumption purposes. However, Members of the House and the Senate would be much less inclined to vote for those add-ons, much less inclined to try to keep their own local pork barrel, if for a greater goal and a greater purpose they wanted a stronger national economy.

What I am saying is that the days of pork barrel are over, or almost over. I say that because we can no longer afford those excesses as much as we were able to. We cannot do that any more.

I submit that most Members of the House and Senate will be much less inclined to support pork barrel proposals in this new era.

I want to underscore what the Senator from Colorado has said. This country wants to maintain our national security. But the country also wants us to attack the budget deficit. And therefore Senators will become less inclined to vote for frills and appropriations that are not essential. I thank the Senator.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Montana for his kind words. I congratulate him on his leadership and statesmanship, and tell him what a tremendous encouragement it is to me to tell him that there is at least one more man from La Mancha in this Chamber. I think the Senator is right. I think times are changing. There are going to be a lot of Senators who will be coming through. Some are starting now.

My guess is when the world sees the vote we are going to get on this amendment, a lot of the old attitudes he has referred to will begin to crumble and today or some day soon the attitudes in this Chamber and country will change very much on logrolling, on porkbarrel projects.

Mr. GORTON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I have had the privilege of floor managing for the proponents of the bill, the opponents to the present resolution, for a period of something more than 2 hours at this point. I have listened to the eloquence of the Senator from Iowa, I may say before I mention anyone else, also to the magnificent point he made about sacred cows, about those things which the President tells us we cannot touch, about those things which the Speaker of the House of Representatives tells us are beyond limit, to the point at which there is practically nothing in the budget which is not a sacred cow.

I have listened to my very good friend, the Senator from Kansas, who was a spearhead in reaching the pattern of this amendment; to the distinguished Senator from Montana and the distinguished Senator from Arkansas. And now, perhaps most eloquently of all, to the Senator from Colorado.

I guess my reaction has to be that I agree, for all practical purposes, with everything they say about the condition of the country and the necessity for a sharp, decisive and perhaps an overwhelming attack on budget deficits.

As each of them know, I have been a part of just such attacks myself, including the authorship of the budget resolution which was ultimately successful last year.

I regret to say, however, that I cannot follow them to the conclusion which they have reached, that this specific amendment should be supported.

I say to the Senator from Colorado that he referred to two sections of Hamlet, I believe the third soliloquy. The first part of the quote was whether in the mind it is better to suffer the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune, and at that point he lost the drift of it. The next line, as I understand it, goes "or to take arms against a sea of troubles and by opposing end them."

I must say to him despite his statement about a secret source as background in the Department of Defense, more than anything else the concern I have with this amendment is whether or not should it pass we will have arms to take against that sea of troubles.

Generally speaking, I have been something of a thorn in the side of the Senator from Texas since I have been here, at least since 1981, and have consistently voted——

Mr. TOWER. Only a very small one, like a rose

Mr. GORTON. I thank the Senator from Texas. That was not the way I was described by him last year, however.

In this case, it seems to me that there are two overwhelming effects to this budget resolution as it relates to defense.

The first is there is not a Member of this body who has not given at least lip service to having some kind of plan which goes for a period in excess of 1 year with respect to our defense priorities, our planning, even 3, or 3 years not being truly long-range planning. And yet year after year, starting long before I became a Member of this body, we have vascillated from one extreme to another, a panic which has caused us to increase the defense budget at a rate which at times may be too much to be efficiently absorbed by the economy, or for that matter by the Defense Department, to one in which the defense budget seems to be the symbol of all that is wrong with budgeting in the United States, at which point we freeze it, or drop it, or increase it slightly, very little from the mark of zero.

Even the Senator from Colorado would be forced to admit that this is just another chapter in exactly that kind of process.

Second, it seems to me that while I cannot subscribe to everything which I suspect the Senator from Texas is about to say, that some, at least a very significant portion, at least, of the savings proposed in this amendment are likely not to be realized by reason of liabilities pursuant to contracts which have already been signed.

As a consequence, I have labored long and hard to find it in my heart to support this amendment because it does very dramatically attack budget deficits. But I do not think that with respect to the defense of the United States, or with respect to the national security of the United States, which, after all, must be the most fundamental of all the concerns with which we deal here as Members of the Congress of the United States, that this is a responsible proposal, that is to say a proposal which can appropriately become part of the law of the United States.

There is a second area of criticism about this proposal made by the distinguished Senator from Florida, the ranking minority member of the Budget Committee. That is that it seems to me that when we attack seriously these budget deficits we must look at both sides of the equation.

The President's proposal, which I believe to be inadequate, nonetheless is reasonably balanced among tax increases, domestic spending cuts, and cuts in the defense budget. Because there are no additional revenues in this proposal, it is disproportionate enough so that it seems to me highly unlikely that it can be passed or accepted in its present form by the Congress or the President of the United States or, for that matter, that it would be just to do so. As a consequence, it is with great regret that I find myself unable to vote for a proposal which is backed by a significant number of the Members of this body whom I most significantly, most greatly, respect.

I have to say one other thing, Mr. President. It seems to me that, in the deepest and most profound sense, this amendment is a confession of frustration and failure. Not a single Member here, whether he or she favors the amendment or opposes it, believes that the proper way to deal with a budget deficit is to deal in an identical fashion with every single spending program of the United States. Important and unimportant, social and defense, infrastructure-oriented, education-oriented, or the like, the proponents of the amendment say, "Well, we would like to evaluate each program. We would like to treat each of them differently, but we cannot; there are too many sacred cows. The only possibility of passing anything is to freeze everything." I have gone through the same experiences during the course of the last 3 years that they have. I am not yet, however, ready to admit that we simply have to throw up our hands, that we can no longer make value judgments of any kind.

I believe—I firmly believe, Mr. President—that there is a way much more significantly to reduce budget deficits than would be the case should the rose garden package be accepted and adopted by the Senate, but one which, nevertheless, treats different categories of expenditures in a different fashion; one which, nevertheless, at the very minimum, meets our treaty obligations to the North Atlantic Treaty Alliance with respect to defense, which deals decisively with entitlement programs, which deals somewhat differently with nondefense discretionary expenditures, and which deals with the very real need for some additional revenue. I have worked on such a proposal. I cannot even tell the Members of the Senate at the present time precisely what it is going to include, but I must say that I do not believe that this body, this body elected by the people of the United States to make value judgments, to take hard votes and make difficult decisions, need throw up its collective hand and simply say the only thing we can do is freeze everything, vital and unimportant, essential to the future of the United States and to social justice in this country or totally irrelevant to those ends.

I believe that even though it may take us a little longer, we must struggle on, that we must find a way to do more than the proposal which is before us and than the Baker amendment may do, but which nevertheless does more carefully evaluate the various programs and the varied responsibilities of the Members of this body.

It is for that reason, Mr. President, with great regret and having been exceedingly tempted to support this proposal, that I must say that I do not think it is the best of which we are capable and that I am afraid that it should be defeated.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, the so-called Rose Garden proposal was the product of a series of meetings in the Cabinet room which, I can assure the Senate, would in no way have resembled a rose garden. That was a hard-headed negotiation dealing with all aspects of the national budget. The result of that was that the President agreed to come down substantially in his request for defense expenditures. It was not an easy agreement to make, and I want to comment a little on that.

The effect of the amendment that is before the Senate now would be to freeze defense expenditures at the level of appropriations to date. The cap that is in the amendment does not include $1.2 billion for the 1984 pay raise or the other pending supplemental requests that are before us. The cap before us does not provide anything for inflation. So it is not a cap. It is an $11 billion program cut, or even more, depending on how you want to deal with inflation.

Beyond that, it would foreclose the savings that would be brought about by such procurement initiatives as multiyear contracting. It would require the termination, for instance, of the current B-1 bomber contract. That termination would cost the taxpayers $1 billion in liabilities, penalties, and lost savings—nearly more money than the increase needed to continue it. The impact of this, to say the least, would be that, while it might appear to make a savings for 1985, it would actually increase the cost of this program for defense.

I remind the Senate that the defense portion of the budget bore 50 percent of the reduction that came to the Senate by virtue of the so-called rose garden proposal. This would add considerably to the reductions in the availability of money for defense.

One of the things that it would do would be to prevent our complying with agreements we have made with our NATO partners—the cruise missile deployment, for instance. In my judgment, the passage of this amendment would require the withdrawal of substantial numbers of troops from Europe.

Mr. President, I have been one of those arguing against the increase in troops, in Europe, but I have never advocated the immediate withdrawal of troops. This would start the process of withdrawing troops at a level the Senate really cannot even contemplate. The reason is that we would have to fold into this budget the cost of inflation, cancellation of contracts, and other expenses. Some 50 major systems would be affected by this freeze, but military personnel will also be reduced.

In the process last year, Mr. President, we dealt with a budget limitation of growth of 7 percent. By virtue of the appropriations process, the final growth in 1984 is 3.7 percent. What I am saying is that the budget limitations have been ceilings. Congress has never exceeded those ceilings.

Last year or the year before, I argued against the battleship, I argued against ramping up to the four attack submarines, I argued against increasing the tanks from 720 to 840. I argued against several other increases in procurement under existing programs. I did not categorize the decision of the Senate or the Congress as wasteful or as some sort of congressional giveaway; it was a judgment of the Nation that was made here that the next battleship should be brought out. Each ship will cost $100 million to operate. I ask the sponsors of the amendment, did they vote for the battleship?

When we went into the fourth attack submarine, we increased the cost of the submarine program. I warned that by doing so, we would reach a point where we would vote drastic reductions in future years. Did the sponsors of the amendment vote against the fourth submarine?

What about tanks? We had the request to increase from 720, to ramp up the production. Again, we warned that the increased cost would strain the budget. Again, I ask those who might want to vote for this, did they vote for increasing the 720 tanks to 840?

This amendment will now require us to go back and, as a ceiling, set a 1985 limit that is $36 billion below even the Rose Garden figure. It is $50 billion below the President's budget. That impact will be substantial. It will be substantial, and I do believe that the Senate must address it. I know my friend from Texas, the chairman of the Committee on Armed Services, will address some specifics.

I am concerned about the impact of this amendment on the appropriations process primarily. That is a process that requires us to adopt some forms of savings such as multiyear contracting. We have argued about that in this Chamber, and we adopted multiyear contracting which will bring about significant savings on some of these major weapons systems. This amendment destroys multiyear contracting.

I hope the Senate will take a look at it from the point of view of what it will do. Look at the Black Hawk helicopter and the F-16 fighters. Those are stable, ongoing production programs. Together they offer more than $600 million in savings if we proceed in 1985 under multiyear procurement. If we put on ceilings such as this we cannot afford the front-end investment for multiyear. If we are going only year by year, we cannot make multiyear contracts without incurring these cancellation charges that would come from an amendment such as this, we will be forced to go year by year by year and the cost of these systems will go up and up and up. The only way to achieve modernization is through the savings of multiyear procurement, fixed price contracts, and other practices, and through a constant program which does not ramp down in accordance with whether it is an election year.

I appreciate that there are heavy pressures on the defense budget. We have already conceded a severe reduction. The President has twice indicated a willingness to reduce the original programed level of the budget for defense.

In my opinion, the defense of this Nation ought to be foremost in our mind. Look at the Constitution. It requires us to provide for the common defense and then to think about the general welfare. If we are to follow our constitutional duties, we must think about defense. I hope that everyone will think about the impact of a ceiling which is totally unreasonable from the point of view of ongoing programs. If anyone wants to talk about them after my friend from Texas has completed his statement, I would be pleased to go into some of the systems that will be affected by this amendment.

I am first and foremost, however, worried about manpower. Manpower is still right around 50 percent of the budget. If we mandate a $50 billion reduction in the budget for defense, there is no way that manpower can be exempted. And we cannot achieve any sizable reduction in manpower expenditures without reducing the commitment of forces that we have to NATO and other areas overseas.

Now, this proposed freeze as we interpret it would cut some $5.6 billion from military personnel in the first instance. That does not take into account the redundant costs which must be absorbed if we have to pay the cost of contract cancellation. It will create an unfunded shortage in retirement costs. It will reduce the personnel change-of-station type of move which takes place annually. It will eliminate the pay raise entirely for the military forces. We now have seen the House wishes to keep that to a 3.5-percent level equal to the proposed civilian increase.

Now, I urge the Senate to consider very carefully what it is doing with regard to this concept. We are prepared to come before the Senate and defend each weapon system individually. We know we are going to face attacks on each one of these systems. Let the Senate be the judge of which systems it wants to cut out, which systems it wants to reduce. And does the Senate really want to vote no pay increase for the military for 1985?

There are many other things we could talk about, but I do not think we should afford ourselves the luxury of saying well, we might be willing to take a base closure in our State or someone else's State. That is not the important thing. The effect of this amendment is so drastic that it would require a drawdown of our troops committed to the defense of our interests abroad. Having just returned from a meeting over the weekend with the Senator from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS) and others dealing with some of our English friends, Members of the Parliament of Great Britain, and facing some of the questions that they have asked us concerning our intentions on NATO. I think it is very unfortunate the first thing we face is an amendment that would undermine our NATO support.

They were asking us if we were going to allow the funds for increasing the stationing of personnel to man the cruise missile sites and to support other NATO modernizations that have been committed to Europe. We assured them that at least we felt there would not be any serious reduction in forces. If this amendment passes, I tell Senators in my judgment it could not have any other result than to mandate a withdrawal of troops in sizable number from our NATO strengths, because the effect would be to reduce our military strengths all over the world.

Now, I urge the Senate to deal with the question of these programs on a basis of the ceilings that have been established under the leadership amendment which incorporates the agreement reached with the President and to deal with each one of these systems individually. I will say again to my friend from Texas, who I see is on his feet and I do want to listen to his remarks, we have reached an understanding that there will be no vast differences between the authorization process and the appropriations process this year so far as the Senate bills are concerned. We are going to work these out in accordance with the agreements we entered into representing our respective committees in the meetings which took place with the President and the Secretary of Defense. The cornerstone of the whole concept we were dealing with in the rose garden proposal was savings in the defense area and we have committed ourselves to those. But to be mandated to make cuts that we know are going to cost more than they will achieve in the long run I think would be improper. I urge the Senate to take a look at this and to listen to my good friend from Texas as he outlines even further the impact of this amendment on the Nation's defense.

Mr. TOWER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GOLDWATER). The Senator from Texas is recognized.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, what has been done in preparation of this plan is to not give proper attention to national security considerations. Now, it is suggested that we must spread the misery equally, so to speak. That is to say they talk about fair shares of reductions in spending. There is nothing fair about this. I will get into that matter later on. I think we make a great error when we think just purely in terms of short-term budgetary considerations, short-term political expediency because what we are talking about now is something that is politically expedient.

I have talked to some who say that nobody wants to cut defense this much. They have tried to cut these things and failed, and therefore they are going to cut defense. That is expediency.

First let us note what this plan will do. This would freeze the defense function at a level of $264 billion, which represents a 6-percent—to be accurate, a 5.9-percent—reduction in real terms. In other words, we are reducing defense spending this year.

We are talking about sending signals. This is a magnificent signal to send to our NATO allies and the Japanese, whom we have been urging to increase their real defense expenditure. Some have done it, but not as much as we would like. The British, in a far worse situation than we are, have increased their defense spending in real terms.

This would place enormous political pressures on those governments to reduce or at least not increase in real terms their defense spending. So we are having an impact on the total military capability of the Western World.

The plan allows 5 percent real growth in fiscal year 1986 and 1987 over a spending level in 1985 which is less in real terms than was provided in 1984.

This is not a 1-year plan. Everybody says it is a 1-year plan. It is not a 1-year plan, because outyear spending is calculated on a drastically reduced fiscal year 1985 baseline. Defense spending will never catch up to the levels contemplated by the President and, may I say, will never catch up to the levels contemplated by Congress itself over the past 3 years.

We have underfunded the Presidential request over 3 years by $41 billion. In any case, we increased it over the previous year in real terms each time.

What we are doing is retreating from the original position of Congress established over the past 3 years, that we have to build up and modernize our defense capability. This is a 180-degree turn for Congress. We are changing national security policy in the name of trying to control the budget. So we will not catch up. We will not even catch up to the levels anticipated by President Carter. We will be well below what the Carter administration's projections were for requirements for defense in this period.

Over the 1985–87 period, the KGB plan cuts $179 billion in budget authority and $118 billion in outlays. This compares with $57 billion in budget authority and $40 billion in outlays for the leadership plan. This represented a substantial compromise for the President, who feels very strongly his responsibility to provide for the security of the United States. I know that he will publicly say that if we are saddled with this kind of spending ceiling, the security of the American people cannot be guaranteed, and we have gone well below acceptable risk. And he will certainly be right.

This proposes to cut more in defense this year, below the Presidential request, than has been cut in the last 3 years in the aggregate. I do not know where it is going to come from, but let us look at the first year impact: $49.3 billion in budgetary authority and $19.3 billion in outlays from the President's request for fiscal 1985.

It has been argued that DOD could operate in 1985 under the freeze just as it did in 1984; but inflation, as I noted earlier, will reduce the actual buying power of defense dollars by 5.9 percent, which, translated into dollar terms, will cause a real loss of almost $16 billion in purchasing power. That is what we are taking out of defense—$16 billion less than we spent last year; and last year we spent $5 billion below what the first concurrent resolution permitted us to spend.

Only $14 billion of the first year outlay savings, some $5 billion short of the freeze target, could be realized if the entire fiscal year 1985 procurement budget of $108 billion were completely eliminated.

I have to pause for a moment. I apologize. But when my majority leader speaks, I always listen. (Laughter.)

Now, to take up where I was.

Everybody says: "Let's take it out of procurement, not out of operation and maintenance, not out of readiness accounts. Don't dock the military pay. Let's take it out of procurement." We have a very slow spendout in procurement—about a 14-percent spendout in the first year. So if we eliminate the whole $14 billion in outlays for procurement, by eliminating the procurement accounts entirely, we would still be $5 billion short of the outlay figure. Where does that come from? That would mean no new aircraft, missiles, tanks, ships, electronic equipment, rockets, no spares to replenish supplies.

I might note that the distinguished Senator from Alaska has made a very good point. I do not believe it has been calculated here what the stretchouts will cost us, what program cancellations will cost us. We will have to renegotiate some multiyear funding, and that is going to be costly.

What has not been calculated here, either, is that for every billion dollars you spend on procurement, there is about a $40 million or $50 million return to the Treasury. Has anybody considered the Treasury impact, the revenue impact, of cutting procurement? A lot of that money comes back to the Treasury.

I remind Senators that during the recession, the only area in which there was an increase in spending for capital goods was in defense. So if we are worried about economic impact, let us worry about the economic impact of our failure to capitalize adequately our defense industry. Let us consider that. What is it going to cost in jobs and tax revenues? I do not think anybody has calculated that.

Let us look at the economic considerations. It has been suggested that this plan is a fair one because it spreads the burden of cuts evenly. Well, it does not. The only aspect of Federal spending that probably benefits every American equally is defense, because it guarantees each of us the same amount of security from our external enemies, from those who threaten our vital interests abroad. There is nothing fair about a plan that allows Congress to avoid its constitutional responsibility to provide for a strong national defense.

Where in the Constitution is it mandated that we spend money on some of these other things that are not being cut in a greater amount than defense? Where is our sense of priorities? Is defense to be treated equally with Endowment for the Humanities and Endowment for the Arts? They are worthwhile things, but should it be treated equally?

Actually, defense is a primary function of National Government, and National Government has the sole responsibility for defense. It has no responsibility for a number of these other things.

This differs greatly from a program like education. Education is enormously important, but education is a primary responsibility of State and local government, and it has been assumed, too, by private institutions.

If you cut out all the Federal spending on education, it would be a relatively small percentage of what is spent on education in this country.

I submit, if you cut out spending for some of these other things entirely, somehow someone would move in to fill the void.

But if the Federal Government does not spend money on defense, no one does. Defense is the sole responsibility of National Government, a constitutionally mandated authority and responsibility, and one that we appear not to be taking as seriously as we should these days.

Let us look at this business of fairness. Rather than building up, the United States is just now catching up after the sorry record of the 1970's when defense spending as a percentage of GNP hit a low point of 4 percent.

In discussing fairness, it is important to look at what has really driven the deficit. From 1970 to 1983 domestic spending rose from $111 billion to $544 billion, an increase of $433 billion or 390 percent. Defense spending in the same period rose from $82 billion to $210 billion, an increase of $128 billion, or 156 percent.

If you are going to be fair, if you are talking about fairness, why not take 2½ times as much out of domestic spending as you take out of defense spending?

Look at this: Defense spending went up, from 1970 to 1983, 156 percent. Nondefense spending went up 390 percent—390 percent, 2½ times as much.

So what is driving the deficit? Do we not have the guts really—maybe we do not have the guts—to get at the real problem, get a handle on those things that are driving the deficit in the first place?

This is a meat ax approach. The meat ax approach is a copout. It means we do not want to decide what to cut. So we will just have a freeze or cut across the board and therefore we can avoid making the difficult political decisions involved in where the cuts come from.

The proponents of this amendment do not have to make a difficult decision of where the defense cuts are coming from. That is the Armed Services Committee that is saddled with that one. We get that one on our backs.

But we might come to the floor with some recommendations a lot of people are not going to like.

But the Senator from Colorado frankly said a while ago that he could give me no assurance that congressionally mandated waste would be dealt with by this Congress. I wonder if the sponsors of the amendment would amend their amendment or their proposal to provide that Davis-Bacon could be repealed as it applies to military construction, that all statutory restraints on contracting should be removed, that the Department of Defense would be authorized to close a base within 30 days notice to Congress without having to go through environmental impact statements or economic impact or anything like that, that all commissaries would be shut down? Would the sponsors be prepared to add that to their proposal?

That seems to me to be reasonable. It means that the proposers are serious about eliminating some of the congressionally mandated waste. So I challenge them to do that.

Looking again at the period from 1970 to 1983, the economic burden of domestic spending rose from 11.2 percent of GNP to 16.4 percent of GNP; while defense's share fell from 8.2 to 6.3 percent of GNP.

If you are talking serious economics, why not look at the economics of nondefense spending and deal with that?

Let us see where these cuts are going to come from. In order to make intelligent national policy decisions, we should have the highest quality of information available. But in making their proposals, the proponents of the freeze have not explained the source of the $179 billion reduction. Oh, there have been some vague references to the waste and bureaucracy, but no one has put a dollar figure on it.

Someone suggested spare parts cost too much and cost overruns. What is the dollar figure if we eliminate all cost overruns? As a matter of fact, if we eliminated the purchase of spare parts altogether, you would be surprised how little we would save.

The best way to avoid any cost overruns is just not buy any. But, you know we are doing a lot better in that connection. We have fixed price contracts now. Now we are making contractors eat part of these cost overruns. We are making progress. We are not all the way there yet. But to the extent there is cost overruns, waste, abuse, and fraud, what is the dollar figure on it? How much of that $179 billion can you actually in dollar figures tell me can be amortized?

One way to specify this would be to assume that the proportion of the fiscal year budget allocated to different defense accounts would stay the same over the 1985-87 period. Applying this percentage to the freeze plan, defense budget authority would yield specific account totals. This is compared to the President's request for each account. The cuts in each account over fiscal year 1985-87 would be: Procurement—$80 billion; O&M—$33 billion; RDT&E—$46 billion; and other accounts—$21 billion.

Canceling $80 billion of procurement will mean that a cost growth of approximately $15 billion will occur in these procurement programs because of delayed programs, broken contracts, procurement of weapons systems, and uneconomic production rates, and that has not been figured in what has been proposed here.

I do not know if the proposers of the amendment can tell us what they anticipate in the way of cancellation costs, increases per unit costs, renegotiated contracts, as a result of severe cuts in procurement, and the abolition of multiyear funding. Obviously we cannot have the capitalization of multiyear funding with the freeze proposal. It means actually if you are going to look at economics we are cheating the American people. We are saying we are spending less on defense now and your defense dollar is going to go not nearly so far as it did before. Either we are going to pay $2 billion worth a copy for an airplane, for example, and we are going to have a lot fewer airplanes at a higher price. That is what you are saying. You are not really achieving any savings. What you are doing is reducing the expenditure for 1 year. You are not making any savings.

You are making things cost more, and adding on to it in the outyears, picking up outyear inflation along with the increase per unit cost.

Many Senators on both sides of the aisle who support the freeze will probably object to this proportional cut approach. I noted earlier no one wants to cut readiness and force structure. Then by definition, the procurement account has to bear the brunt of the cuts. That is what you do. Otherwise, you are going to have to reduce steaming days, field days, flying hours, and now, my friend, and this sounds tough, this sounds tough, you are going to accuse me of demagoguery on this one, but I am going to say it anyway, because now you are getting to the point where you are trading blood for money because as we have increased flying hours, we have increased defense funding over the past 3 years, we have had fewer crashes, fewer fatal accidents. It stands to reason the better rehearsed, the better practiced, the better trained our people are, the less likelihood there is of accidents, and when you have to go into combat, the less likelihood that you are going to get killed.

Now, that is a fact of life.

Will anybody tell me that if there are two football teams of virtually equal talent, one of them trains 3½ days a week, the other one trains 5 days a week, which is likely to win the ball game on Saturday, given the fact that they are of roughly equal capability? I began to say the Cowboys and Redskins, but I will not do that.

One thing we could do is take the most controversial of the systems. Let us just wipe out the most controversial of the systems. Let us include the B-1, the MX, the Divad gun, the DDG-51 destroyer, the Trident submarine, battleship reactivations, the Bradley fighting vehicle, the KC-135 reengining program, and the strategic defense initiative.

Now, there are some big ticket items. Those are the most controversial. Let us say we can knock all of those out because they are controversial or at least have been in recent years.

Then, what, in fact, does that save? For fiscal year 1985 cancellation of those programs would yield $22 billion in BA cuts compared to the freeze target of $49 billion, and only $4.2 billion in outlay cuts, compared to the target of $19 billion.

So you still have a long way to go on BA and outlays. Where is the outlay money coming from? Where is it coming from? Operations and maintenance? Pay? Take it out of pay?

Taking all $179 billion of cuts out of procurement would be an immense undertaking. To give some sense of the magnitude of weapons reductions necessary to achieve this total, I ask unanimous consent to have the following table printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FREEZING NATIONAL SECURITY: CUTTING TOP 50 DEFENSE PROGRAMS CRIPPLES DEFENSE BUT STILL MISSES FREEZE TARGET

[Dollar amounts in billions]

	Quantity	Amount
Eliminate the "Top 50" defense programs for three consecutive years including:
Tactical aircraft (F-14, F-15, F-16, AV-8B, JVX, AH-64, HH-60D, UH-60, P-3C, SH-60B, E-2C, EA-6B, derivative fighter, trainers, AHIP)	2,350	$53.5
Combat vehicles (M-1, Bradley FVS)	4,700	9.9
Ships (SSN-688, DDG-51, CG-47, TAO-187, AOE, LPD, LPH, and CV SLEP's)	39	30.3
Tactical missiles and torpedoes (Patriot, Maverick, Stinger, Phoenix, HARM, AMRAAM, MLRS, MK-48)	54,930	16.2
Strategic programs (SDI, Trident sub, Trident II missile, MX, B-1)		53.0
Other (C3I, C-5B, KC-135 reengine, C-17, Tomahawk, Divad, Lantirn)		19.4

Mr. TOWER. What is most apparent in all of the debate is that the Soviet threat has simply not been addressed. We have heard nothing from the supporters of this plan concerning this assumption about current and future Soviet military developments.

Can the proposers of the plan—and I invite their attention to what I am about to say—can the proposers of this plan guarantee me that the United States will not be more vulnerable to attack, that our vital interests abroad will not be more vulnerable to a challenge by Soviets and Soviet surrogates? Can they guarantee me that?

We have heard nothing about the effect on future arms control negotiations if we make these substantial cuts. Can the proposers guarantee me that this will be an incentive to the Soviets to negotiate arms reductions with us? Why should they? If we are going to unilaterally agree to disarm ourselves, what incentive is there to the Soviets to negotiate arms reductions?

Now, some have suggested that the freeze would give us time to sort out the fundamental causes of our predicament. While we grow weaker and weaker sorting things out, the Soviet Union knows exactly where it is going. As Harold Brown, former Secretary of Defense once said: "When we build, they build. When we stop, they build."

Even given the President's funding, we are well behind Soviet production in weapons systems. You cut out that funding or reduce it substantially, and you can see what happens. The threat against the United States increases. Our ability to meet that threat decreases.

Let us look at some examples. Over the next 3 years the USSR will build 6,900 tanks, 13,650 armored vehicles, 2,520 tactical combat aircraft, 21 attack submarines, and 9 SSBN craft. Under the President's original request, the United States would build 2,160 tanks, 2,510 armored vehicles, 1,050 tactical combat aircraft, 12 attack submarines, and 3 SSBN craft. If all of the U.S. effort were canceled, it would only yield 3-year spending cuts of $34 billion—far short of the $179 billion freeze target.

How can any of the proponents of this amendment say that this enhances our ability to deter attack against us, our ability to protect our vital interests abroad, our ability to support our foreign policy objectives? I would be delighted to engage in a colloquy on that subject with them if they can explain to me how we benefit in that regard.

Mr. MELCHER. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. TOWER. I yield.

Mr. MELCHER. I have been listening to the distinguished Senator's comments. I may have missed a part of them, but I have not heard research and development funds mentioned. Is it not true, as we occasionally read, that that is about $28 billion a year?

Mr. TOWER. We can put the chart back up that shows the percentage that would come out of R&D. We can show you the dollar figure on that. Research and development would be docked about $46 billion. That is over a 3-year period.

Mr. MELCHER. I think the figure we read occasionally is $28 billion a year. Is that accurate?

Mr. TOWER. $34 billion is in the President's budget for fiscal year 1985 RDT&E.

Mr. MELCHER. $34 billion?

Mr. TOWER. Yes. That is a fairly fast spendout item. So you could achieve some immediate outlay savings by a severe reduction of research and development.

It seems to me we would really be mortgaging the future in that instance because the Russians are acquiring our technology by various means and incorporating it into their weapons systems faster than we can.

Now, the Senator from New Hampshire wanted me to yield to him and he has been waiting patiently. So I will be delighted to yield to him at this point if he would like to make a comment.

Mr. RUDMAN. I thank the Senator from Texas.

Mr. DOMENICI. Will the Senator yield for one comment?

Mr. RUDMAN. Yes.

Mr. DOMENICI. I just want to say to my good friend from Texas that I compliment him on his remarks today. It has been a privilege to work with him on this issue and I hope the U.S. Senate was listening.

I do have a question. I was not here all afternoon. Did I hear that the U.S. Chamber of Commerce supports this freeze?

Mr. TOWER. That is what I have been told; that the U.S. Chamber supports it.

Mr. DOMENICI. They did not make an exception for defense? They want to freeze everything, is that correct?

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Mr. President, if the Senator from New Mexico will yield; yes, that is correct.

Mr. DOMENICI. I understand that the National Association of Manufacturers supports it, is that correct?

Mr. TOWER. I understand they support the KGB amendment, as well.

Mr. DOMENICI. I would like them, if they are within earshot, to know that I will have something to say about their position before the afternoon is over. I am very disappointed, having supported them in many causes in the past, for them to be here today in the name of fiscal sanity, asking us to perform the kind of insanity on defense. They are usually up here asking us to make sure we protect their freedom. I hope they are listening because I will have some more to say about it before the afternoon is over.

Mr. SYMMS. Will the Senator from New Hampshire yield?

Mr. RUDMAN. I am not even sure the Senator from New Hampshire has the floor.

Mr. SYMMS. I keep hearing it said here that this is necessary and it is all fair and all even. But if it is a freeze and all fair and all even, how come half of the cuts come out of 25 or 30 percent of the budget, or is it really not a freeze?

Mr. TOWER. Actually, it is about 43 percent. As I understand, they calculate the 3-year deficit reductions at about $270 billion. And the outlays out of defense would be about $118 billion. But that is 43 percent out of 29 percent of the budget. And it is that portion of the budget that has grown slowly. The fact is nondefense spending has increased at a far greater magnitude. But we treat everything as equal. This is supposed to be fair. There is nothing fair about it, obviously.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. TOWER. Yes.

Mr. RUDMAN. I thank the Senator from Texas. I will not speak for very long.

Mr. President, this amendment has probably caused me more personal anguish in terms of how to vote on it, because it is a very appealing amendment and it is an amendment that does, in total, what I really believe ought to be done.

For instance, I do not believe that the so-called rose garden proposal is adequate. Chances are that if the other amendments that I understand may be coming on the floor are, in fact, proposed, then there is a good chance I will vote for them, as well as, in the final analysis, voting for that proposal which is described as a leadership proposal.

Mr. President, I serve on the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee. I would say, not in any way of being boastful, but just as a matter of observation, that I believe in 3½ years, I have missed exactly 1 hour of one hearing that that subcommittee held.

I consider it probably the most grave of the responsibilities that I bear in this Senate. This morning I took all of the information that I had on the hearings of the past 2 years and tried to analyze what happens here. If there was any chance that in good conscience without violating my own principles I could support this amendment, I would like to have supported this amendment. But, Mr. President, I cannot. I will tell you why I cannot.

I look at the chart here that the Senator from Texas has posted in relation to his remarks. I make one observation. It may not be an observation that people here in this Chamber want to hear, but it is an observation. We all know it is true. If there is a choice between some indeterminant allocation of this kind of freeze that has to be decided politically, we all know where it is going to fall. The uniformed men and women in the services, and the people retired in essence are a constituency and are represented. But I would say they have rather minor representation. Operations and maintenance, which during the years of 1977 to 1980 was nearly decimated, in my view looking at historical perspective, has very little constituency.

When you look at procurement, there is not a Senator in this Chamber, or a Member of the House of Representatives, who does not have in his or her district jobs, manufacturing defense items, some of which are necessary and some of which are not. There is not a Member of this Senate, or a Member of the House, who does not have some defense facility in their State, some which are necessary and some which are not.

I have no doubt that if we adopt this unspecified, total freeze what we will do is decimate personnel, and the quality of personnel. We have a volunteer force that finally has reached a level most of us can be proud of. Readiness is the heart of our Armed Forces. Those funds will be cut back but you had better believe we will find some way to buy some airplanes, some ships, some submarines, and some other goodies that maybe we do not need because that are where the jobs are. That is where the political pressure is. Let us all tell the truth. What we will really have in the defense bill in the eyes of the Members of this body is not so much national defense as it is one great big jobs bill.

Mr. President, let me paraphrase what the Senator from Texas said. If a democracy has one priority that is higher than any other, it is its own preservation. The defense of the country has to be the first priority.

Yet, I am sure that many of my colleagues have had the same experience. If you want to walk around your State and ask people, shall we reduce COLA's on social security or cut defense, or shall we reduce student loans or cut defense, or should we cut back the National Institutes of Health or cut defense, or cut the farm programs or cut defense, I can guarantee you—and I have seen polls that prove it—they will tell you to cut defense. The people of Great Britain, the people of France, and the people of the low countries in 1937 and 1940 cut defense. Were it not for this country and their determination, the history of the world after 1945 would have turned out quite differently than it did.

Mr. BIDEN. Would the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. RUDMAN. I would be happy to.

Mr. BIDEN. Are you serious? Are you serious in implying, if we in fact say to the Defense Department that you have the same amount of money next year as you have this year, that America will be in the posture that France was prior to World War II? Is that what you are saying? Is that what my distinguished friend from Texas is saying? Are you serious? That is my question.

Mr. RUDMAN. I would be happy to answer it. It may take longer than a yes or no answer because I obviously had not quite finished what I was saying.

Mr. TOWER. If the Senator will yield, it is not the same amount of money because with the inflationary factor it is $16 billion less. It is a reduction.

Mr. RUDMAN. What we do, if we adopt this amendment, in my view is totally reverse where we have been going and totally reverse it. It will not cut it back nor change it, but it will totally reverse it. The normal expectation, if we adopt this, is to reverse something that I believe—the Senator from Delaware may disagree with me freely—was the right thing to do in 1981; that was, to improve readiness, improve quality of personnel, and to do some procurement that was sadly overdue.

I ran for election in this body on that statement. I will continue to make the statement because I believe that it is true. I believe every empirical bit of evidence that we have will prove that point. I am not saying that a 1-year freeze will impoverish this country and make us susceptible to the exploitation by those who may wish to exploit us. But I am saying that to make this kind of a radical change in a policy that was set in 1981 is hardly responsible. That is what I am saying.

If this amendment contained growth figures that are, frankly, less than the Senator from Texas would like, and probably quite a bit less than the leadership would like, I would vote for it because I think it would be a time for very modest growth. I frankly do not agree with the numbers that are contained in the leadership proposal. But I believe this is the other extreme.

Mr. BIDEN. Can the Senator show us what figure that might be?

Mr. RUDMAN. I believe that this year's real growth figures that we will finally end up with in the Congress after much negotiation is in the area of possibly four, four, and four of real growth, not nominal growth. I believe that is where we will end up. That is a fairly educated guess.

In conclusion, Mr. President, let me simply say that I regretfully cannot vote for this amendment because it seems to me that this amendment sets an entirely new policy of the Congress in the area of defense. I cannot agree with the numbers that are contained in the leadership proposal.

I would be reasonably sure that over the next 3 months, or 60 days or less, we will finally come up with numbers in the defense appropriations bills which will more closely approximate a far more modest growth. But to adopt this, end up essentially gutting everything but the procurement budget, and then having to gut that at this time considering what is going on in the world, Mr. President, is not the way in my view that this Senate ought to vote.

I thank the Senator from Texas for yielding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPECTER). The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, might I ask the Senator from Texas? I understood the Senator from Arizona might want to speak. I will yield the floor. I might have something to say. I will wait.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I will say a few things to my chairman, and particularly to the chairman of the Armed Services Committee with whom I am honored to serve. I have listened to his remarks. He is absolutely right. The Constitution charges us with providing security for this country before it charges us with doing anything else. I remind my colleagues that the whole purpose of America is freedom. It is not welfare. It is freedom. What we are trying to do here today will result in the cutting down of our ability to insure that freedom.

Let me take a quick look at a few things that my chairman from Texas mentioned. I have been traveling around the world. I just returned from the Far East. I make it a point wherever I go to visit the commanding officers, and to visit the troops. I ask the commanders: "Are your forces in better shape today than they were 3 years ago?" I have never heard any answer but, "Yes." I can tell you after visiting the DMZ I have never seen morale so high in my life in the Armed Forces. I spent 37 years in that outfit myself.

It is not that the pay is higher, but it is more secure. Our men in uniform have a feeling that the Congress has finally realized that a Volunteer Force can work. We have the highest quality of people in uniform now than we have ever had, almost universally in the armed services No. 4, which is a high school graduate. We are getting more and more college graduates as we go along.

Over 50 percent, or maybe it is 55 or 57 percent, of the defense budget, Mr. President, goes to pay the troops. When you get to talking about freezing or cutting the amount of money that we are talking about, where do you think it is going to come from?

Let us take another look. I suggest it is going to have to come, to some extent, out of the money that we provide for the benefit of the men and women in uniform.

I am chairman of the Tactical War Committee, I think my subcommittee is probably responsible for spending more money in the armed services than any other committee. What are we looking at? The F-16 fighter plane, which we have agreed to take a rather sizable cut in. The F-15 aircraft, which is not only one of our best inteceptor aircraft, but we are now going to make it into a ground support aircraft. We have taken a cut in that.

The new C-17 troop transport that we have to have for a rapid deployment force, on which we have cut no metal yet but which we want to build, is threatened.

The military airlift command portion of our whole military structure is still about 20-percent deficient, Mr. President, on D-Day.

If we are talking about rapid deployment and our ability to get tens of thousands or hundreds of thousands of troops from this country to some other spot in this world, we are going to have to rely, as of today, as we relied forever in war, on ships. We do not have any ships. Our merchant marine does not exist.

So when we talk about transporting weapons, transporting troops around this world, I would laugh out loud if I were allowed to, because I will tell you, Mr. President, we cannot do it. It is that simple.

We were willing to take these cuts. We are working now in every subcommittee in the Armed Services Committee to try to get cuts, to try to extend the program, to try to cut here and there and the other place.

Mr. President, I have to say this: It sort of rankles me to hear that the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers come into this town and want to cut defense. If you want to put the blame on any two groups of people for the high cost of the military, do not put it on the Pentagon; do not put it on the man in uniform who is put over there for 2 or 3 years to learn the business and then he is transferred someplace else; do not saddle it on the Secretary of Defense who is in there maybe for 3 or 4 years. Put it on these two great associations of business people.

No business people in the world have had it so good since World War II as the National Association of Manufacturers and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

Why? Because they have never been said no to. Every one of us are deluged by the attempts of people representing different manufacturers, "We have to have this" and "We have to have that." They do not need that, and I think it is time that we made up our minds here.

Here is where I have been making suggestions for a long time, where we can save money in defense.

We can do several things, Mr. President. We can prolong the stay of uniformed generals in the Pentagon not for just the 3 years but keep them there long enough for them to learn the business; long enough for them to know that they can tell these people to go to hell and nobody is going to give them any trouble; long enough to allow us to sit down with them and to work out their aid; allow us to tell manufacturers, "I did this once, and I got away with it." I told one of the biggest manufacturers in this country, "My subcommittee will not buy" that particular piece of equipment "at the price you are asking." And they said, "Ha, ha, ha, listen to him. We make it 15 miles from his front room."

Well, came the day to write the bill up and we did not put it in. Do you know what happened? In 2 days they cut $2.5 million off each piece of that equipment. I do not know what it added up to. Maybe $800 million.

We can do that. We can do it and do it and do it. I think it is time that we tell these people who are, as I say, the fat cats who have never been so fat in their lives, that we are sick and tired of tossing away the American taxpayers' money.

I am not going to go on this. It gets me so lathered up I do not know when to quit.

I remember in World War II flying the best aircraft we ever had, not in combat. It was $37,500. Do you know what that will buy today, Mr. President? One rocket for one airplane.

A bomber? The biggest one we had was $225,000. I know that will not buy the navigation system for the B-1. In fact, it will not buy the navigation system for any airplane.

The B-1 started out, and I recall seeing the blueprints being made, as a $27 million airplane. What has happened to it? One President shot it down, another President was not sure, now it is back on the track, and it is up to over maybe $220 million.

That is not our fault. That is not the fault of the Pentagon. That is the fault of politics, pure and simple.

What we are doing here today is trying to pass an amendment which, in my mind, has a lot of sex appeal. I thought of this thing myself once in a while. Why not freeze? Then I got to looking at what would happen. It has taken us years to put in the idea of the continuing buy idea of containing an inventory of parts and equipment for the military.

How much would it cost to settle that? I have no idea. Billions of dollars. Will we ever get this money back? No.

We are not buying today, we have not bought in 20 years, in 1 year, enough tactical aircraft to replace the tactical aircraft we have lost through accidents.

Brought out on the floor by my distinguished friend from Texas was the fact that since this committee has allowed more flying hours per pilot all through the services, the safety records have improved and the accident rate has gone down. But still, in this year's authorization, we are not going to be able to authorize as many aircraft as we will lose.

Is that any way for us to prepare? No; it is not. I think it is rather criminal to come in here and suggest willy-nilly cuts in the defense budget without being specific. If they do not want the B-1, pick it out and we will argue about it. If they do not want the MX, pick it out and we will argue about it. If you want to argue about the pay for the troops, we will argue about that. But I do not think anybody has the courage to stand up and say, "Let us cut the pay and sustenance of our troops." If you want to say, "Let us cut the pay of the forces in Korea," suggest it. If you want to cut back the troops in NATO, suggest it and see how far you get.

I think we are toying, I think we are playing with the security of our country. As I have said many times on this floor, while I was not here by any means, I was in the service and I recall back in the 1930's it took us 7 years to buy the B-17. I am not saying the B-17 won the war, but I am sure it did a hell of a job. It took us vote after vote to get the draft, and we finally won it by one vote.

What is the message we are giving to our allies and to our enemies? The message, to me, what I would be hearing if I were over there, is the United States is sort of a paper tiger, and we are coming apart.

Mr. TOWER addressed the Chair.

Mr. GRASSLEY addressed the Chair.

Mr. DOMENICI. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GRASSLEY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I cannot help commenting on some of the remarks that have been made. Particularly, I would like to comment on the remarks just completed. In it, there was a statement that it is criminal to come in here with a suggestion to freeze the defense budget and, at the same time, talk about what $37,000 used to buy and what it will not buy today. I can tell you what $37,000 will buy today. It will buy 37 plastic stool caps that fit on the legs of a B-1 navigator's stool. That is what I call criminal activity.

That is not politics, Mr. President. That is just plain bad management. That is not the U.S. Chamber of Commerce's fault, that is not the National Association of Manufacturers' fault. There is something wrong with the way business is done.

I am not going to take a second seat to anybody in this Chamber about having the will or political fortitude to cut expenditures. I may not have as many defense plants in my State as some of the people in this Chamber have, but just a month ago, I voted to freeze target prices for farmers. There are 112,000 farm families in my State that are going to pay a price for my freezing target prices. That is going to save $3 billion, I was told.

In this proposal is a freeze on COLA's for pensions. There are 13 or 14 percent of the people in my State who are senior citizens drawing from one of those pension systems. For people here to challenge this budget because it fails to suggest where the savings would be made, forget that this is affecting every segment of the population of our country. That includes my constituents as well as the constituents of the Senator from Texas or the Senator from New Mexico or the Senator from Arizona or the Senator from New Hampshire.

All of a sudden, we have, after 3 or 4 hours of debate, everybody coming out of the woodwork, coming in to talk about defense. Simultaneously, there are all those calls coming from Air Force 1. Simultaneous with that is a lot of lobbying being done that we Republicans would consider the "liberal lobby." And obviously, too, the Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers are calling. I hope all the other groups that are supporting our cause are calling. What I say applies to people who support my position as well as people supporting the position in opposition to us.

I say it all resembles business as usual, whether it is the defense industry and the DOD coming out of the woodwork or whether it is the "liberal lobby" coming out of the woodwork, or whether it is White House pressure; it does not make much difference. It is still the very same activity that has been going on for years that has gotten us to the point where we have $200 billion deficits. I can speak about defense. I suppose I could speak about anything. I spoke generally this morning about the problem of planning.

In regard to planning and the things that have been said on the floor recently about defense, I hope that all of my colleagues, whether they are here or back in their offices, were listening to the debate. Because what the leadership is telling us is that we are locked into a defense budget now and well into the future which happens to be higher in constant dollars than any defense budget since the Korean war. Being locked into it, being unable to do anything about it—and that is the impression that has been given to me in this debate—is a pretty sad situation. For if any organization or any institution which cannot live for 1 additional year, 365 days, with the same budget, that institution, whether it be public or private, has pretty severe planning problems, especially at a level that, in peacetime, is actually more than at the peak of the Vietnam war.

What the leadership is telling us is that the situation in defense is so desperate that Congress cannot cut anything and must continue, in fact, to forever feed an irrational, underfunded approach to national defense. Everybody, including the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, has admitted the defense budget is underfunded. We have tied our hands in defense, as we have in the entire budget.

Sooner or later, Mr. President, we are going to have to face the fact that the system that gives us less and less defense at unprecedented cost will have to be untangled. The longer we put that off, the tougher it will be to make any change.

I, for one, appreciate all the time that the Senator from Texas and his staff have put into these various charts that have been brought before us to demonstrate what their position is. The Senator from Colorado, when he spoke earlier this afternon, said it very well when he said that the reason we are in the current deficit predicament is all the horse trading that we do to accommodate all the spending. He is absolutely correct. I do not care whether we are talking about new programs getting started, bases to close, whatever the house trading is that might go on. We encounter this problem when asked to respond to the challenge of the Senator from Texas as he would say, "How would you cut and where would you cut?" We have to put ourselves above that level of decisionmaking.

But I would add another reason why we are in this predicament. It is a reason that borders on what I would call extortion. This does not just apply to the defense budget; this would apply to any aspect of the budget. It is an old ploy that I call the Washington Monument ploy. When you want more money, you fabricate a need. When you want to prevent cuts, you offer up the Washington Monument in sacrifice. For those of my colleagues off the floor, listening in their offices and not having an opportunity to see them, I would just like to indicate that the best way to describe the charts in the back of the room for those is that they show the Washington Monument dressed in battle fatigues.

I have been in politics for 25 years, since I was 25 years old. I know how this game is played, and each Senator knows how it is played, or should know. The leadership apparently has not yet uncovered massive amounts of information which would show that in some defense programs they are funded at such a level that they cannot spend the money that we give them. There are a lot of other programs outside of defense that are funded as high as well. Just look at every fiscal year and you will find a large percentage of your budget spent in the last month or 6 weeks, whether it be defense—and it was $4 billion in defense this year put under contract in the last few days—or any other Department of Government. That should be ample evidence that we are appropriating more than needed, and that we ought to be able to get by for 365 more days.

Somehow I think we have gone overboard trying to respond to what this freeze will do. There is not one of us—Senator KASSEBAUM, Senator BAUCUS, or Senator BIDEN—in this Chamber who has to take a second place seat to anybody on whether or not we are patriotic, whether or not we fear the Soviet threat, whether or not we are concerned about keeping NATO together, whether or not we want to send the right signal around the world. There is not a one of us who pretends or desires to be a paper tiger. People overseas are as smart about our defense as we are. They know the weaknesses of our system. More important, they know our staying power.

Do you know what the advice of the admiral was who spoke to the warlords in Tokyo warning they should not bomb Pearl Harbor? That advice was that they ought to be concerned about the "sleeping giant." It was not the massive amount of military weaponry that we had at Pearl Harbor or elsewhere in the world. He feared our economic infrastructure, our industrial infrastructure, that backs up our military. Do you think that our potential enemies do not know about the weakness of our industrial infrastructure? Do you think they do not keep an eye on how closely knit our social fabric is?

Mr. TOWER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRASSLEY. They do.

Mr. TOWER. Will the Senator yield for a question at this time?

Mr. GRASSLEY. If it does not detract from the point I am making.

Mr. TOWER. I do not think so, because the Senator mentioned Pearl Harbor. I think he makes my point in the process. The reason the Japanese attacked Pearl Harbor is that we were not prepared. I happen to be privileged to have participated in that war. It went on for much longer than it should have. If we had been prepared, they probably would not have attacked us in the first place. Had we been more prepared when they attacked us, the war would have been over sooner.

I submit to the Senator from Iowa that if there is a next war it will be because we are not ready. We are not going to have 4 years to build up our defense capability to try to win it.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, may I say, first of all, they bombed Pearl Harbor because we had poor military planning. What sort of good military planning has all your ships in a single harbor? Second——

Mr. TOWER. They bombed us because they were militarily superior to us at the time, I say to the Senator.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Second, I would suggest to you, Mr. President, that if we are so well prepared today, how come we only build, with the massive amount of money we are spending on defense, two tanks a day? We are spending more on defense now in current dollars than at any time since the Korean war. We are building two tanks a day. Our entire country produces just two tanks a day. Our entire Air Force is getting only 200 tactical fighters per year. That is less than one plane per day. We are told that readiness is up in the Air Force, are we not? Our pilots get to fire just two missiles per year, one infrared missile and one guided missile.

Now, that is absurd. That is like giving each one of our marksmen one bullet or each one of our infantrymen just one grenade to throw. If that is the best that we can do with 5 straight years of unprecedented spending in defense, then we are in a sad situation.

And last, as I was speaking about Pearl Harbor, our industrial infrastructure and our social fabric, we ought to know that the strength of our staying power is as important an element of our national defense as the measurement of the number of tanks and ships we have. Unless we do something dramatic to get this budget deficit down, unless we do something dramatic to keep interest rates down and to keep people employed, we are not going to build our industrial infrastructure and we surely are not going to keep our social fabric as strong as it ought to be to meet our worldwide defense responsibilities. That is what is at issue as much as the amount of money we are spending on defense. We have to do something very dramatic and we have to do something different. Everything you see here today in opposition to this amendment is ample evidence of business as usual in this body as far as the budget process is concerned. I think it is time that we change the direction of our policymaking and change the direction of our budget deficits from upward to downward.

Mr. DENTON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DOMENICI). The Senator from Alabama is recognized.

Mr. DENTON. I say to the Senator from Iowa that I respect his motives. I do not wish to accuse him of politics. I do not wish to accuse the Senator from Delaware of any but the best of motives. I have had experience with both men. I like and respect them.

I submit that the argument is not who is being political, not whether we want to improve the management of the Defense Department, not whether we want to reduce the deficit, not whether any of us is patriotic, or that we want to maintain security. The argument is about understanding whether or not this amendment is harmful or helpful to the well-being of the United States of America.

I should like to define our survival, if you will, in two terms: One, national security, and the other well-being. And I ask the Senator from Iowa to listen to this as carefully as I listened to him.

Mr. GRASSLEY. I will.

Mr. DENTON. I take that with good faith. I am going to say it again. Survival equals national security plus well-being. Well-being equals the economic well-being, the social well-being, the educational well-being, the health well-being, and all of the things that we have been noticing and taking care of with great attention in a trend that is clear since the time of President Kennedy.

The word "security" means two things, generally speaking—first, military forces; second, foreign policy. And it includes the intelligence establishment.

I should like to offer my version of what has been business as usual since Kennedy's time and business as usual since about 1970, both of which trends I think are essential for our understanding of the argument. I offer this in good faith and with some sense that I, too, have an investment and a degree of understanding in the question before us today, though I offer it with no feeling that I have more or less than any of my colleagues. I have listened to them with great respect, and I ask them to listen to me with the same respect, because we are talking about an extremely vital matter, not a small matter.

In President Kennedy's time, we were spending for defense $49 billion, or 45.9 percent of the budget. For human resources we were spending $30 billion, or 28.8 percent of the budget—roughly twice as much on defense as we were spending on welfare related matters.

In 1982, under the merciless President Reagan, we were spending $187 billion on defense and $372 billion on welfare-related matters, roughly twice as much on welfare-related matters as on defense matters.

So you can talk, if you wish, about real money, real dollars. These are real dollars of which I am now speaking.

We are talking about a factor of four exchange, going from a spending ratio of 2 to 1 on defense over welfare to a ratio of 2 to 1 on welfare over defense.

Now let me ask you to picture a scene in 1975 when a general whom I respected very much, General Dixon, then commander of the Tactical Air Command, was talking about the fall of Vietnam, which was taking place because Congress had just shut off American aid to South Vietnam while Soviet aid to North Vietnam was being increased. We cut off our aid to South Vietnam, breaking the word of four Presidents, breaking the credibility of our own understanding about what the honor of this country should be, about what our own perception is of maintaining our interests.

General Dixon was talking to my class at the Armed Forces Staff College. He said: "Ladies and gentlemen, how can the Soviets have this tremendous buildup going on in armed services and military power, from an industrial base less than ours?"

He flashed a picture on the screen and said: "Here is how."

The picture on the screen was of a typical middle-sized Soviet town with mud streets and no automobiles, but with television antennas so that they could get Big Brother's word. But nothing else. The people were drably dressed. It was a typical village.

He then showed a typical town in the United States, with all the wealth and evidences of what we apportion to our well-being, to our standard of living. He said. "That is how they do it."

In Kennedy's time, and I ask attention to this, we had practically a first-strike capability against the Soviet Union. Maybe not quite, but I would not want to risk it, and I would not recommend it even if we could do it. I think we could survive in the long term without killing any of them. I think that is why Eisenhower did not go in during the Hungarian revolution in October 1956. I think we can prevail over them, but we have to maintain some kind of credibility in terms of military posture and in terms of our foreign relations successes.

In Kennedy's time, he was able to look Khrushchev in the eye and say, "Get those missiles out of Cuba." He got them out, after calling Khrushchev a liar because he said they were not there. Kennedy showed him pictures and said, "Get them out."

We all know that, during those days, all the chips were in the middle of the table. My wife was packed, ready to move before the balloon went up, to someplace in South Carolina, with some of the cans of what we still refer to as "Cuban missile crisis stew."

In those days, we were able to stare them down. We were spending twice as much on welfare as on defense.

Since Kennedy's time, the Soviets learned a lesson. They learned that they have to have the wherewithal to back up their moves and their bluffs, wherewithal in terms of military power, understanding, and will.

We started forgetting the lesson. In the long, drawn-out war in Vietnam, which need not have been drawn out or lost, we proved the deterioration of our understanding. We proved the erosion of our credibility around the world. Even before we did it, the rest of the world could see it happening, to the extent that Saudi Arabia and OPEC believed that it could with impunity triple the price of oil in 1 day.

In discussing that point, let me say that I am not against Saudi Arabia. I helped to pass the AWACS bill. But they, as did other nations, perceived that the United States simply did not have the understanding or guts to back up our own interests, as we proved in Vietnam. They tripled the price of oil in 1 day. Did they need it for the sake of justice? No.

I watched 82 ships, with cargoes rotting at anchor off Jidda in 1975, when they could not import the stuff as fast as they could buy it. The cargoes were rotting. They saw in 1973 that we lost sight of our understanding of what it takes to back up our interests and what it takes to back up foreign policy.

I say to the National Association of Manufacturers and to the chamber of commerce, as I say to my colleagues today, with humility but with emphasis that there is a cost to independence and liberty. We have been paying for failures in foreign policy because we did not understand what it takes to sustain on effective foreign policy.

Let me give a concrete example of the economic cost of foreign policy failures. When the Saudis tripled the price of oil in 1973, and without considering the multiplier effects, here is what happened to the U.S. domestic economy. For every year from 1973 on there was a price, and it is not well known. We just dug this out of Department of Energy statistics, and the figures are there. Each year during the 1970's, we lost $40 to $50 billion in gross national product, in constant 1972 dollars, because of rising energy prices.

In addition, we suffered 2 to 3 percentage points of inflation and lost 1 to 2 million jobs each year because of rising energy prices.

At least one-fourth of our decline in productivity growth and one-half of the decline in investment during the 1970's was attributable to rising energy costs.

Do I have to draw pictures? I will admit I do not have all the figures for all the costs with respect to the minerials we must have. I admit I do not have the figures as to the increased cost that we must pay to buy those items at increased prices because the Cubans, on Russian ships, went over and took over the African National Congress in South Africa and SWAPO in Namibia, and they are turning a major part of South Africa into Communist surrogate states.

I wish all of you could have been at the hearings of the Subcommittee on Security and Terrorism. One man sacrificed his life to blow the whistle on the ANC. He told me, before the subcommittee, "They will kill me for saying it, but this is the way it is." He went home to South Africa and they killed him. The Communists have coopted ANC and SWAPO. It is a Communist move that is going on now. I think the Senator from Iowa has some insight into that already.

Africa has 86 percent of the world reserves of the platinum group of minerals, 53 percent of manganese, 64 percent of vanadium, 95 percent of chromium, 52 percent of cobalt, and significant diamond and gold output.

The people on Wall Street better note this, as they did that day in New York when oil prices went up.

Mr. President, I guarantee you that Ollie Delchamps, who is the political man for the national chamber of commerce, would come on this floor if necessary and testify that he will come off that position, if you will give me 2 days to give him the facts.

So I do not believe that the NAM and the Chamber of Commerce are going to stick with a position in favor of this amendment because they will come to understand what inadequate defense is costing the United States day by day in terms of trade. I am not saying that the Japanese are necessarily ripping us off in a certain way, or that the West Germans or the French are, but on balance we are being ripped off in world trade today because they think we will not back up our own real interests.

We are cutting our own throats by a syndrome that Jeanne Kirkpatrick has enunciated on many occasions, and I cannot say it as well as she can, but she talks about a syndrome in which we are caught up in self-guilt, condemning ourselves to the fate that our enemies would assign to us.

Mr. President, I ask you to recognize that there is a tremendous cost to the lack of credibility that we already have in terms of backing up our foreign policy, a cost that is affecting our domestic economy for more than could be offset by the false savings that Senators are recommending today. I submit that general piece of information, along with the fact that President Carter would have spent more on defense than you are going to have us spend, by several tens of millions of dollars this year.

I am asked to limit my remarks, and I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SYMMS). The Senator from South Carolina is recognized.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to this amendment.

While I find considerable merit in the pending amendment, I regret that I cannot support it. The sponsors of this amendment, Senators KASSEBAUM, GRASSLEY, BIDEN, and BAUCUS, have put together a very attractive budget proposal. Their budget freeze would produce rapid and dramatic reductions in our projected deficit. I commend them for their hard work and diligence in developing this initiative and bringing it to this body.

Mr. President, a proposal which would reduce the deficit by an additional $23 billion, as this one does, certainly deserves the closest study and careful consideration. The amendment achieves these savings in a most desirable way, as I shall explain hereafter. It attacks spending, instead of seeking to impose new and heavier tax burdens on our already overtaxed population. Furthermore, it spreads the spending limitations across the board by limiting outlays to fiscal year 1984 levels in all areas.

Although any plan for budget savings should be spread across the broadest possible range, in order to minimize the impact on individual, worthwhile programs, it is not in the national interest, in my judgment, to impose an absolute freeze on national defense program expenditures. This is not to say that no cutbacks should be imposed on defense. However, in seeking to reduce deficits, it would be most unwise for us to simply freeze defense spending at last year's level.

An absolute freeze of this nature would pose serious dangers to our national security. The net result would not be to maintain status quo, but, rather, to effect an estimated 6 percent—and I repeat—6 percent real reduction in our level of defense expenditures due to the effects of inflation.

Mr. President, we cannot allow the national defense rebuilding program initiated by this administration to be stopped in its tracks as would be done under this amendment. After years of neglecting the security needs of our Nation in the face of an unprecedented Soviet military buildup, we are hardly at the point where we can rest on recent accomplishments, although considerable progress has been made. We must maintain a strong and viable military system for the sake of our freedom, and that of our children. This is not to say that defense spending is untouchable during budget debate. The President has previously agreed to substantial reductions in growth which were incorporated into the leadership package. Perhaps additional cuts in growth may be attainable. But, a real net reduction in our defense program is not acceptable.

Mr. President, I would again like to commend the sponsors of this amendment for their valiant efforts toward deficit reduction. They are working, as I said, I think in the right direction, as I have specified. However, because of the drastic and dangerous effects on our national security. I must oppose the amendment.

I merely mention this, Mr. President, that a $179 billion reduction in budget authority alone over 3 years would require eliminating all funding requirements, all funding, that is procurement, R&D and military construction for all—I repeat all of the top 50 defense programs. And what does that include? That includes the MX, the B-1, the Trident submarines and missiles, and the strategic defense initiative. It would include 2,000 tactical combat aircraft. It would include 4,700 track vehicles. It would include 39 major ships and almost 55,000 tactical missiles.

Mr. President, in the past 3 years Congress has reduced the President's defense program a total of $41 billion.

We cannot take this chance. We must not take this risk. We know the goal of the Soviets has not changed and if we are going to protect the people of this country we must provide the necessary defense to do that, and I hope this amendment will be defeated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DENTON). The Senator from New Mexico is recognized.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, while I cannot tell the Senate with any certainty when we are going to vote, I have been talking to the various interested parties and I do think a vote is relatively close. It could be a matter of an hour or slightly less unless something comes up that I am unaware of.

Mr. President, I would like to know when I use 10 minutes because I do not want to talk too long.

I have a table that I wish to make part of the RECORD, and I think it is self-explanatory. I have the 50 largest major weapons systems that are contained in the 5-year plan U.S. of the Department of Defense.

Mr. President, I shall ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a table showing the 1985 budget authority and outlays for each of those and then the subsequent years, 1986 and 1987, and then the 5-year total which is the cumulative total at the end of this sheet.

I would only put it in the RECORD with this statement: The freeze that is suggested here would reduce the outlays of the Defense Department by $118 billion. These 50 systems that I am putting in the RECORD over that 3 years, will result in a total of $90.1 billion in outlays.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that that summary be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[1] Fiscal year 1987 to 1989 program levels for SDI obtained from Aerospace Daily, Feb. 3, 1984, page 192.

Note: Budget authority shown is amount programed for procurement, RDT&E and military construction.

No estimate is provided for cost of termination liability.

Outlay estimates shown are CBO estimates (outlays from prior years are excluded).

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I have another chart that shows the cost impact of eliminating the 20 largest, 40 largest, or 50 largest systems contained on the previous list. It indicates that eliminating the 20 largest systems will result in outlay savings over 3 years of $70.7 billion, eliminating the 40 largest will result in outlay savings of $85 billion.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that that be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Budget authority shown is amount programed for procurement, RDT&E, and military construction.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I do this only to put into dimension the size of the cuts that are being recommended here in the name of "symmetry of freeze," or for the "good of the country." "Let us treat every one the same." Since we are freezing, let us freeze defense also.

Mr. President, I wish to make just three or four points.

I probably became acquainted with the distinguished Senator from Iowa only recently. Over 3 years, as chairman of the Budget Committee, I can tell him, if he were here, I have grown to respect him. As a matter of fact, I have great admiration for him. I was part of making sure he developed the expertise which he has been using down here on the floor I am glad I did it.

However, let me summarize what I think he is saying to the Senate.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on one point right there? Will the Senator yield just to clarify one point?

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield.

Mr. BAUCUS. I hope the Senator would confine his remarks to what this amendment is about, not what this amendment is not about. This amendment is a 1-year freeze. It is not a 2-year freeze. It is not a 3-year freeze. It is not a 4-year freeze. It is not a 5-year freeze. It is a 1-year freeze.

Mr. DOMENICI. I understand.

Mr. BAUCUS. I am disappointed, frankly, that the chairman of the Budget Committee is characterizing this amendment as something that it is not.

It is a 1-year freeze. We are only talking about 1 year. The chairman is talking about 3-year figures to exaggerate the number, to use scare tactics.

In the spirit of constructive debate, I hope that the Senator will stay with what this amendment is about, which is a 1-year freeze. We do not talk about things to do in year 2, in year 3, and year 4. This is only a 1-year freeze.

I hope the Senator from New Mexico, when he talks about what the result of our amendment would be, would confine himself to the thrust of this amendment

Mr. DOMENICI. Let me say to my good friend, I am sorry he is disappointed in me, but if he thinks I have been misstating the facts, he is going to remain disappointed, because I have not been.

Let me tell you when you freeze social security for 1 year, what you put down in the budget is the effect for 3 years. When I tell you what it is going to do in the third year, I was using CBO estimates of what is it going to cost in the third year.

I am disappointed that the Senator really thinks there is no impact in the third year of a 1-year freeze in 1985. As I look at it, your own amendment and the numbers that you put with it indicate that there is a rather significant reduction in defense over 3 years.

As a matter of fact, as I speak to this, I am reminded that those who propose this amendment speak of the 3-year effect on the budget deficit. And I suggest they must be using 3 years of defense savings. I suggest that they are using $118 billion in outlays as the amount that they are reducing the deficit. That is all I am telling the Senate.

I want to finish because we are in a hurry. I would be pleased to yield not only to the Senator but to yield the floor in about 3 or 4 minutes.

Here is what I think has happened to my good friend from Iowa. And I have already said, I have great respect and admiration for him.

In our free society, a bureaucracy called a defense establishment which is spending over $250 billion, is doing some things he does not like. And I assume that if we took that defense establishment and each one of us looked at it and said we would like to manage it better, boy, we would find some things we would change. If we had Spinneys around to tell us how poorly it is being managed, we would be angry and mad.

Well, let us have all those emotions, but let us not kid ourselves that we are going to fix that by freezing the defense budget authority at the 1984 levels in the middle of what we all understand to be a dramatic rebuilding of America's military strength, which the American people and an overwhelming number of U.S. Senators and U.S. House Members found in 1980 and 1981 to be absolutely necessary for the freedom of the Western World.

Now, in the middle of that rebuilding, we observe that the Defense Department is paying too much for a screwdriver. And Mr. Spinney tells us we are not planning things correctly. And our good friend from Iowa has noted all of that. And so he says, if I read him right, freeze the defense budget and they will learn a lesson. Freeze it and they will fix it.

Let me suggest to you, we make the reductions in the weapons systems that this kind of proposal is going to bring about, we will fix it all right. If you do not take it out of operations and maintenance and salaries and force reductions, we will not have any of those weapons systems. They will all be canceled.

So if the intent is to fix it so they will not be doing things wrong any more, you will fix that. You will fix that because there will not be very many left.

Now, I say in all honesty there are some things that ought to be straightened up, but I would submit that any establishment as large as that one, especially in a free society, and especially with Congress involved from year to year, and especially with annual appropriations and all the other things that are characteristic of our defense establishment, there is going to be abuse, there is going to be fraud, there is going to be waste, and there is going to be some planning that we do not like.

We are part of it under 1 year appropriations. The defense establishment is part of it. The private sector is part of it. But I submit, in the interest of fixing the problems, that we do not have to freeze things and not even know what we are doing, we are just guessing what cutting $118 billion in outlays out of the next 3 years is going to do and saying, "Well, it really has got to work because what is wrong with the freeze? It sounds so good."

Now I am not up here as one who gives the Defense Department whatever they want. I think in the last 3 years I have taken my share of the problem that the defense establishment brings to Congress. I think I have taken my share of heat.

I remind my friends on the Budget Committee, I am the Senator that last year got called out of the meeting by the President when we were about to vote on the defense number, after I had waited 7 weeks for Cap Weinberger to do something. He did not, and I get called by the President who said, "Wait some more." You know, I had to tell our President, "I can't do that. We are going to vote now and you are going to lose, because you wasted 7 weeks and didn't work with anybody."

So I am not one down here now as a Johnny-come-lately to try to get something out of defense or pleading to give them everything they want. In fact, I figure from time to time that they can do it for less; in fact, a lot less.

But I am telling the Senate that this is a drastic mistake, to send a signal to our allies, to send a signal to our men and women in the military, to send a signal to our enemies, that we just decided in the middle of this American military buildup to freeze things for 365 days.

Mr. TOWER. Will the Senator yield for a brief question?

Mr. DOMENICI. I am pleased to yield.

Mr. TOWER. This is not actually a freeze, it is a reduction.

If it were a freeze, it would have given the inflationary factor.

In fact, it is a reduction of $16 billion in real terms. For fiscal year 1985.

Mr. DOMENICI. That is right.

Well, I am speaking of freeze in the sense that the budget authority is exactly the same as it was the previous year and inflation, whatever it is, is not added on. And in anybody's understanding, it obviously will not even buy as much as the previous year.

And if you are in the middle of procuring things, what do you do? I mean, do you stop? You have ordered some airplanes and the budget authority is there for all 400. Do you just quit and say we will freeze it? Well, where do you freeze them? Halfway built? What about those that are just starting and you are about to spend the real money because you have got the first one built? Do you stop?

Let me suggest two other things. A lot of people talk about the great John Kennedy confrontation with the Soviets. Somebody has already compared the American military in terms of our GNP in that day versus now.

I heard an Assistant Secretary of Defense from that era say this: "We made the Soviet bear blink when we called their bluff about the missiles in Cuba. And, strangely enough, after we made them blink, the United States had a nervous breakdown for about 10 years." Now, that is about where things are, as I see it. In the decade of the seventies, after we made them blink, we somehow got so fearful and so scared and so concerned about this bad old America, that we might do things so wrong in this world, we just said we do not know whether we ought to have the right kind of military.

Then along came 1980 and 1981 and we decided that was a bunch of bunk. This is a great country. We were good players, not poor players, and we better get serious because our adversaries were. And we started this military buildup.

And now today, because it makes sense to somebody that we freeze the domestic side of this budget—and I am not even going to talk about that today, I did that yesterday, as well as I can. It just makes good sense, it is sort of American style to freeze everything since we are freezing the domestic side.

The point I would like to make is that this is not the way to do business. With all respect for the wonderful people who have cosponsored this, it is really a desperate move for America's military preparedness. Those men and women in the military, our allies, our friends, and, yes, our enemies are all going to take this in about the same way. Those who like it are going to clap. America's military preparedness and resolve are down the tubes, and our enemies who were hoping for just such a turnaround are going to sit there and say," we knew one if we waited, America would lose its resolve."

I hope the Senate does not do something today that it will regret. I do not think we will freeze defense this year when we are finished. I do not think we are going to freeze the rest of these items. It is not in the cards. The U.S. House is not freezing defense. The House Subcommittee that appropriates the money is not going to freeze defense. They and their chairman are not disposed to spend a lot of extra money on defense. As a matter of fact, it is quite the opposite.

It would be a strange day if our conferees went to conference with the U.S. House and the U.S. House had to add substantial amounts of money to the defense budget approved by the U.S. Senate. That is what would happen, if this amendment passes. We would put up the flag in the House, and say "you were right all the time." You have to put in enough money to make America strong because the U.S. Senate decided some kind of symmetry of freeze was a good thing, so the Senate froze defense and we sure hope the U.S. House will put money back so we will be on the right track.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I have been here 11½ years, unlike the Senator from Texas, but about the same time as the Senator from New Mexico. But I find this one of the most interesting, colorful, and humorous debates I have heard as long as I have been here.

We have two very distinguished Senators, the chairmen of two very important committees, telling us that this is all about defense, and America is about to pull down the flag. I have not heard yet, "turn tail and run." I have not heard that one yet. I have not heard, if we do this, we are going to be capitulating to our enemies. I find it fascinating that we are talking about how we are not going to be fair to our allies, and will break faith with our allies.

The signal that we are all talking about sending here is not about defense. It is about the economy. Let me tell you something. I find it fascinating that all of my distinguished colleagues who have made their VFW speeches here on the floor—all of them, I assume—assume that next year, we are not going to be doing anything with defense, that when in fact we have a deficit, when interest rates have gone up, when the cost of defense is even more, when we are moving in the direction that most people predict will occur, we are going to have a stymied growth, and we are just not going on with business as usual.

I heard the Senator from New Mexico make an eloquent speech about what FRITZ HOLLINGS was doing to the elderly, and about how we are not going to do anything about social security. I hear him say we are not going to do anything about defense. We are just going to roll right along next year. We are not going to touch entitlements, and we are not going to touch defense.

I am going to fly out of here. Does anybody believe that? Does anybody believe that next year with the reelection of Ronald Reagan—if that is what occurs—we are not going to see a fundamental change in either the tax structure, the entitlement programs, or defense? We are just going to go right on along. No change. I just think that is wonderful, if that is going to be the case.

I find it really interesting that we are going to cripple America's defense system by only spending $264 billion next year, if this amendment passes. My God, what a penalty. We will be prostrate; $264 billion. That is all we are going to do.

I assume what my colleagues are saying is we will pose this based on the defense portion of the amendment, that the real problem here is we do not want to make any hard choices about any weapons system. I assume they mean that we are not going to have to reconsider every single system underway. That is fascinating to me.

By golly, we have done damage, have we not? We have gone in outlays over the last several years—I will read them. In 1979, we spent $118 billion; 1980, $136 billion; 1981, $160 billion; 1982, $187 billion; 1983, $210 billion; 1984, $235 billion. What a terrible burden to place upon defense. I notice some of my conservative colleagues on the other side, and some of my liberal colleagues on this side, for political reasons have said, God bless the Grace Commission. Did it not have a wonderful idea to save money? Was not President Reagan right about waste, fraud, and abuse?

By the way, I suggest to my good friend from Idaho, who likes that Grace Commission report from what I have heard him say, that it says $93 billion in defense savings. Mr. Grace says $93 billion in 3 years. Well, I guess we are going to be selective. He says $93 billion. We are prepared to believe those figures in other areas, but not defense. He was only kidding. He did not really mean that.

I heard a moving speech last year from one of the most qualified debaters in the U.S. Senate—the distinguished Senator from Texas, not too many months ago—saying if we go below 13 percent, we will jeopardize America's future. We will be breaking faith, and then out came the flag, and we ran it up the pole. We were told this was absolutely essential. And today he can buy 7 percent. I find that curious, Senator. You went from 13 to 7. Yet I guess with 7 percent we are not dropping to our knees before the Communist horde. I do not know. I find that kind of fascinating. Now we hear the same speech that you made at 13 and 7 and saying if you go to zero, it is the end.

By the way, a lot of folks are talking about how this is going to cripple us. I found it fascinating the Senator from Texas, when we have a $90 billion drug problem in America, permeating every single pore of the fiber of America, is prepared to cut, and did vote to cut money for drug interdiction, money for the Justice Department. If I were going to engage in this frivolous tactic, my friends, in opposition, I would stand on the floor and say you are putting the heroin and needle into the arm of the American public. The reason why my dear sister was robbed was because of you. I cannot believe you people are not willing to protect the streets of America. God forgive you for what you have done. I do not do that to you. [Laughter.]

I do not say that. And I am almost as adept on my feet as the Senator from Texas. I did not stand on the floor when you all said, "No Hawkeye for drugs. Take it out of Coast Guard."

To say on the floor of the Senate, "Does my friend from Texas understand that he is increasing crime in the streets of Waco? Does my friend from Alaska understand"——

Mr. TOWER. The streets of Waco are relatively crime free.

Mr. BIDEN. They will not be, if you do not jump on the bandwagon and help me fight crime. You folks are so soft on crime over there. My friend from Alaska and my friend from New Mexico go home and make speeches about that brown heroin from Texas, the cocaine from Colombia, and then they vote against BIDEN's increases for funding.

Well, the murder rate goes up. I really do not hold you personally responsible, as you seem to be prepared to hold me on defense.

I think we should have a challenge in the art of demagoguery. I am ready. Let us go.

You are right, the Senator would say I would win.

The Senator from New Mexico voted against the increases I proposed in the Budget Committee over the last 3 years in the name of the economy.

Mr. TOWER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BIDEN. No, I will not yield. In the name of the economy he voted against those increases, in the name of interest rates, a sound economy.

Mr. TOWER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BIDEN. I will not yield. I am just getting started. I have not spoken all day.

So, ladies and gentlemen of the Senate, I think it is time that we talked about what this amendment is about. It is not the denuding of America's security. If we are going to play that game, we can all play that game. It is about the future, hard choices and difficult decisions.

I went out to a place where I am unaccustomed to travel, to Chicago and New York, to the Mercantile Exchange, the Chicago Board of Trade, to Bear Stearns and E. F. Hutton and others. I met with, over the last 3 weeks, the leaders of those communities.

Guess what they told me to a person. "BIDEN, if the distinguished Senator from Kansas, the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Montana are successful and this amendment were to pass, interest rates would drop 1.5 to 3 percent in the next 4 months."

They said to me, everyone I have spoken to, and the indications seem to be in this direction, that interest rates are likely to go up under the Republican leadership plan.

Let me ask you another question. I have heard this speech in the Budget Committee so many times, about the street does not believe us, we do not have willpower. So when the Senator from Iowa comes along and says, "We have 1 year to give us all time to stop and breathe and think and reorder some of our priorities before the future has totally slipped from our grasp," we did it because we did not want any pie in the sky. Then along comes someone and we say, "We are going to give you a big one. We are going to have a reduced package, the leadership package or the Democratic package, back-end loaded, not front-end loaded." And we wonder if they are going to believe us.

The reason why the Senator from Delaware is so supportive of this amendment, and I must say not only supportive but worked so hard to come up with it along with the Senator from Kansas and others, it is because I believe if we do not do something drastic to demonstrate that we have the resolve to tackle some of these problems, that we are going to be moving into a recession the first quarter of next year and moving down. Budget deficits under the Republican budget plan, 3 years out, start to go up. The President says he wants no new taxes, the Republican leadership says they want no new taxes, and the President says he wants no change in defense, and with a commitment there will be no change in entitlements—poof, the magic dragon. We are going to do all that. You know that, do you not?

The reason I believe so strongly in this amendment is for reasons maybe slightly different than my Republican cosponsors, for I predict to you that if we do not turn around this deficit in a convincing way to keep interest rates from going up and keep the economy from going to Hades in a handbasket, we are going to be presented with the following scenario next year whether or not it is a Republican or Democratic President who is elected. The issue no longer will be the capping of COLA's or not, but the issue will be eliminating COLA's for social security. The issue will not be whether or not we deal with eliminating people on disability rolls who are malingerers but whether or not disability should be cut. The issue will not any longer be whether we maintain the medicare system by putting some of the cost on the doctors and the hospitals, but cutting the medicare system. The issue will be not whether or not we keep or increase WIC but whether or not we have it at all. The issue will not be whether or not education is something the Federal Government should be increasing, but whether or not the Federal Government should be doing it at all.

Guys like me will be hard pressed to be able to make a case in the face of staggering budgets and sluggish economic growth that we increase them. Then, my friends in opposition will be able to stand up and say, "Does the Senator realize that what he is doing is increasing the deficit, increasing it badly?"

I will not be able to stand on the floor and say we need new major tax increases because how can you increase taxes at the time of recession?

So I think this is our last best chance.

I find it curious when we talk about this. Let us talk about some historical defense spending totals. The annual rate of growth in total defense spending from 1981 to 1984 was 10 percent or a total of 29-plus percent real growth over that 3-year period. The annual real growth in defense procurement for 1981–84 was 17 percent, or about 50 percent over a 3-year period of time. The annual real rate of growth in defense R&D for 1981 to 1984 was 13 percent.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the Senator state the source of those figures?

Mr. BIDEN. The source of the figures is the staff from the Budget Commitee on the Democratic side.

Mr. STEVENS. That is nowhere near it. The publication on the House side shows it to be 3.5 percent real growth. If you want to talk about nominal growth, that is another matter.

Mr. BIDEN. This is the real growth in those areas.

We are not cutting defense. We are denying a $50 billion increase next year, following a number of years of steady increases.

We are not requiring any specific cuts——

Mr. TOWER. Will the Senator yield for a clarifying question?

Mr. BIDEN. Yes.

Mr. TOWER. The Senator said we are not cutting defense. In fact, in real terms, we are, because the inflationary factor is not added.

Mr. BIDEN. The Senator is correct.

Mr. TOWER. So, in fact, we are cutting $16 billion. In other words, $264 billion in 1984 money would mean $248 billion.

Mr. BIDEN. The Senator is correct. If we use the CBO figure, he is right. If we use the President's figure, it is $13 billion, his economic assumptions, and $3 billion in outlays. The fact of the matter is, Mr. President, that we are at a point where I find it very difficult to understand how anyone is going to be able to tell me that they truly believe that we are not going to have to make significant changes next year in defense and weapons programs and changes in entitlement programs, and changes in other spending programs. I would hope that we also keep our perspective, not that it is all that relevant, but since it has been raised so many times, on the charge relating to the share of GNP that the distinguished Senator from Alabama made.

In constant dollars in real terms, we shall spend more in 1985 on defense than in any year since 1946, the end of World War II. But more importantly, in 1984, which is the outlays we want to be in the budget, the outlay in 1984 is greater in real terms than in any year since 1946, save two, 1968 and 1969, the height of the Vietnam war. Outlays under our amendment would exceed the 1969 and only be $3 billion less in real terms than in 1968, and we are not at war.

We are not spending less for defense, in fact: we are spending more. We have, in fact, a real growth that has occurred on a fairly consistent basis over the last several years.

Mr. President, I want us, if my colleagues would, to keep our eye on the ball. How can we say that we are willing to deal with entitlements and unwilling to deal with defense and suggest that we are willing to do something significant about the deficits? We see the dire predictions that are being made, and they are probably wrong in being as dire as they are, and those rosy predictions about the economic prospects are probably equally off base. But I wonder if anyone in here truly believes that we are going to have such a robust growth, low interest rates, low inflation, and all without making some drastic changes in the way we are going.

It seems to me that it is not merely the symmetry of this amendment that makes sense, it is the substance of the amendment that makes sense.

We are asking for 1 year. Everybody will live on what they lived on last year. If anyone suggests to me that that means we shall have sent a signal to all the world that we have reneged on our requirement for a strong defense, I would suggest that that is not a reasonable assumption that anyone could make.

(Mr. WALLOP assumed the chair.)

Mr. STEVENS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BIDEN. I yield for a question, Mr. President.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, did the Senator support the deployment of cruise missiles to Europe?

Mr. BIDEN. Yes.

Mr. STEVENS. The Senator knows they were not there in 1984. They have to be paid for in 1985.

Did the Senator support the B-1 bomber?

Mr. BIDEN. No, Mr. President.

Mr. STEVENS. Did he support the multiyear contract for the B-1 purchase?

Mr. BIDEN. No, he did not.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator from Delaware believes that the cost of the B-1 should be increased by $1 billion because of this amendment?

Mr. BIDEN. I believe it would be cut.

Mr. STEVENS. The amendment will cause a $1 billion increase in acquisition cost of the B-1 because it will cost $1 billion to terminate the contract.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, let me say if that were the alternative, I am prepared to spend more money for the same program in 1986 than I would have in 1985 if, in fact, the effect will be, as I believe it will be, that interest rates will come down because the net effect of not doing what I am doing will in fact cause interest rates to go up and in fact, we will be spending more money, not less money, in the total budget.

Mr. STEVENS. If the Senator will yield for another question, I wonder if the Senator from Delaware realizes that this will put a limit on the payment of cost-of-living allowances for military personnel? The authorization exists for a 3.5-percent increase. This would pay zero. Does the Senator from Delaware intend that that be so?

Mr. BIDEN. That is what is assumed. We cannot, in the budget resolution, dictate that. It could be that, it could be cutting the program. It could be either.

Mr. STEVENS. The Senator is correct, Mr. President. Instead of maintaining the current level force, he could take the position, I assume, and I wonder if the Senator wants to take the position that we should reduce our Armed Forces by at least the amount that is necessary to achieve the saving from a reduction in force that would then allow us to pay the cost-of-living allowance——

Mr. BIDEN. Let me respond to the question. We all know, as the Senator from New Mexico points out constantly to us in the Budget Committee, in budget documents like this, we cannot line item. I can have an agenda to tell you how I cut it. I would cut the B-1 bomber, I would cut the MX missile. That would take care of all of it. The Senator may argue to cut other things. I suspect the Senator from Idaho would say, get Mr. Grace in and he will take care of it.

The fact of the matter is that this document does not allow us to line item and dictate to those on the authorizing and appropriating committees where in fact that money will or will not be spent. The exercise, although I can tell you how I could do it, is not a particularly relevant exercise, as the Senator from New Mexico points out at least four times in every budget meeting we have.

I can do it. I would take out the MX and the B-1.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I know the Senator is correct in terms of his interpretation that it is no direction, but if the direction is to delete $50 billion from the program and we can show him that that deletion leads to other costs due to cancellations under existing procurement contracts, which make it an even deeper cut, I wonder how the Senator would face up to that.

Did the Senator vote for the fourth submarine? Did he vote for the 840 tanks per year? Did the Senator vote for the return of the three battleships that this Senator opposed?

My memory is the Senator supported them.

Mr. BIDEN. That is right, Mr. President. I told the Senator how I would get my savings. I have already told him; I already answered the question, Mr. President.

The Senator from Iowa talked about the Washington Monument argument. I call this the old rathole theory, that once you have something bad in process, because it costs money to stop it, we keep it going.

Anyway, does the Senator have any more questions for me?

Mr. STEVENS. The one last question I would have, Mr. President, is that the statement that disturbs this Senator most was the statement the Senator from Delaware made about the visits to Wall Street and to the various sectors of American industry. I, too, made those calls not too long ago. I was urged to bring about a reduction in defense spending, which we have brought about by virtue of the leadership's amendments before the Senate.

Does the Senator really wish to convey the impression to this body that it is the wish of the entitles he mentioned to cut defense expenditures with all the resultant bankruptcies and failures that would come about in the private sector? Is that really their message, to cut $50 billion plus in 1 year from the defense budget?

Mr. BIDEN. Let us make two things clear, Mr. President. One is the question is not cutting. It is whether or not we are going to add the $50 billion the Senator wants added, not cutting from where we are. We have not passed the budget yet. So we are not cutting. The question is how much we add, if anything. And I am arguing for 1 year we do not add, No. 1.

No. 2, the folks that I spoke to in fact said to me nothing about defense, nothing about entitlements. They said they need to come up with savings that in fact in 1 year would be in the $40 billion range and what the effect would be if we had that kind of cut in 1 year, the first year.

That is what they were talking about. They did not presume to suggest whether or not it be an MX missile or a slowdown in the entitlement programs or the food stamp program. They were talking about deficit reduction in the first year. That is what they were talking about, and that is what the Senator from Delaware was referring to.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask, if the Senator will respond to one other question, if the Senator realizes that to maintain a production rate of 840 tanks or 4 attack submarines or the level of the other production that is under contract, the increases mentioned in the leadership amendment are necessary just to maintain the rates of production? Does the Senator realize that I know of no new initative in this budget for the expenditure of funds other than the proposal to continue C-17 R&D? It is not in production. But does the Senator realize that this funding bill is essential to maintain the existing rates of procurement, the existing level of production of American industry at the existing level of employment? Does he realize that the impact of the bill we have before us compared to the amendment that he is endorsing would be just to continue the level of production of the current year?

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, the Senator is saying two things to the Senator from Delaware.

Again, it makes no difference what my response to that answer is in terms of whether or not we can incorporate that notion into this budget resolution, but I will answer it.

The Senator is saying that next year we are going to have to, if we do not do it this year, face the question of whether or not we are going to keep all of those programs going, some of which the Senator from Delaware voted for, in light of changed economic circumstances, just as the Senator from Delaware is standing up saying notwithstanding the fact we promised cost-of-living increases to senior citizens, the changed economic circumstances are so dire we have to reconsider that for 1 year, just as the Senator from Delaware, who spent 10 years of existence in this body trying to increase money for the Justice Department and fighting organized crime and interdicting drugs is saying that we cannot, because of the state of the economy, afford to do it this year. That is what the Senator from Delaware is saying.

The Senator from Delaware would like also to say something else, if I may. We heard from the Senator from Arizona and the Senator from Texas and other Senators talking about the requirement of the Constitution to provide for the common defense, the implication being that the common defense of the United States could not be sustained for 1 year at the level of $264 billion.

And the second thing it fails to take into consideration is a document which I should like to read. It says:

> We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare.

That is another item in that little matter that is mentioned. And then in section 8 of the Constitution:

> The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

They always drop that "general welfare" portion, but again I want to make a point. I do not concede the implicit assumption in the statement made by the opposition to this amendment that to go on $264 billion for 1 more year jeopardizes national security and the ability to provide for the common defense.

Mr. President, I am pleased that the bipartisan budget freeze proposal is now before the Senate. As you know, it is being offered jointly by Senators KASSEBAUM, GRASSLEY, BAUCUS, and myself. Despite opposition by the leadership, support for this proposal has grown during the past several weeks. By the time we have discussed it here on the floor, I believe its chances for passage are excellent.

But it has already served several important purposes. It has alerted the Senate of the magnitude of the problem this country faces in preserving its fiscal stability and it economic health. It has also demonstrated clearly, I believe, that the Republican leadership plan is not adequate to stem the flow of red ink in our national budget. Finally, it has served to alert the country to the crisis atmosphere that could exist during consideration of the budget next year, if our freeze is not adopted this year.

At the beginning of this year, it was not clear to many people just how great our deficit problem was or what actions it would take to deal with it. The President offered only a down payment which was little more than his original budget with defense spending trimmed slightly. And it was widely predicted that Congress had no will to try to solve the mounting deficit problem in a election year.

All that is changed now. Recent action in the Senate Budget Committee, where our budget freeze was nearly adopted, shows that many Senators realize that the time for business-as-usual is over. This year may be our last chance to take effective action against deficits without risking serious adverse consequences on the lives of millions of Americans.

Mr. President, we have traveled a long way, in the wrong direction, since the day in February 1981 when the President, in his program for economic recovery, confidently predicted a balanced budget in 1984. At that time, deficits were running about $60 billion. And now that 1984 is here, the current year's deficit is estimated to be about $190 billion.

Since 1981 we have been taking many actions aimed at closing the gap between spending and revenues. But we have always underestimated the virulence and persistence of the deficits and the speed with which they could grow. I hope that we have now learned our lesson. I hope we now realize that deficits of $300 billion by 1989—and nearer $400 billion if the economy slumps—must be treated with an immediate freeze to stop the growth of deficits for long enough to put in place a permanent deficit control package. If we do not freeze deficits right now, their exponential growth will make it impossible for any longer term plan to take hold and become effective.

Mr. President, we will soon be talking about increasing the limit on the national debt here on the floor. When that bill comes up for consideration, there will be many voices raised in protest. And well there might be. The national debt is expected to be about $1.9 trillion in fiscal year 1985 and a staggering $3.3 billion in fiscal year 1989. By 1989, the interest payments necessary to service such a debt will have more than doubled to $219 billion. I, myself, am outraged by those numbers. I hope that all those other Senators who share my outrage will also share my determination to do something about those deficits before the debt limit increase comes up. Now is the time when we can do something about the national debt. We can vote, as I propose to do, to freeze our Government is fiscal year 1985.

If we do not take bold, dramatic action on deficits right now, we are risking an economic disaster, probably some time next year. As deficits persist, and grow larger, interest rates are certain to rise also. And it is quite likely that the inflationary tendencies that still exist in our economy, may be unleashed again. These events, in turn, will depress economic activity, and we could well find ourselves in yet another recession again.

These dire predictions are not yet fact. But 10 years under the new budget process should have taught us at least one thing. If one waits until the next economic stage is clearly visible, it is too late to do anything about it. So we must act now, while only a few signals foretell the economic problems ahead. Interest rates have been climbing for some time now. The prime rate has risen from 11 to 12 percent—and many expect it to go higher soon. Mortgage rates are nearing 14 percent and there is real danger that homebuyers will soon become discouraged by high rates. The most recent Treasury borrowing—a 2-year note—went for a very high 11.8 percent.

Housing starts, in sympathetic reaction, plunged 26.5 percent in March to 1.6 million units. While bad weather surely played a part in this, as the administration claimed, the realtors also had a strong point when they said that "long-term mortgage rates of 13 percent or higher are not compatible with a—housing—starts rate of 2 million-plus units."

Inflation is fortunately still restrained. But there have been predictions of CPI increases of 8 percent next year. Factories, at 81 percent of capacity, are nearing the point where bottlenecks may increase pressures on interest rates and inflation. And the soaring GNP of 8.3 percent in the first quarter can only reinforce inflationary pressures.

What can we do, Mr. President, to avoid an economic calamity? Of course, there is never any guarantee that Government action will have the desired result. But in this case, the action we need to take is one that must be taken in any event. We must freeze the Federal budget and stop the deficits in their tracks. This will ease the pressures on interest rates and calm inflationary expectations. This, in turn, will greatly improve the outlook for continued economic health.

What will the Kassebaum-Grassley-Biden-Baucus budget freeze do to deficits. I have a table here that demonstrates clearly how much more forcefully our plan deals with deficits than any other viable alternative. Next year deficits under our plan would fall from the current policy baseline of $197.3 billion to $161.5 billion. That is $19.3 billion lower than the leadership plan and $12.3 billion lower than the Democratic alternative.

By fiscal year 1987 our deficit would still be only $162 billion as compared with $245.2 billion if no deficit reduction actions were taken. This is $41.5 billion lower than the leadership plan—under which deficits actually continue to rise. And it is $7 billion lower than under the Democratic alternative.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following brief table demonstrating the effectiveness of the Kassebaum - Grassley - Biden - Baucus budget freeze be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEFICITS

[In billions of dollars]

	1985	1986	1987
Kassebaum-Grassley-Biden	161.5	148.5	162.0
Republican leadership	180.8	185.4	203.5
Democratic alternative	173.8	170.7	169.0
CBO current policy baseline	197.3	216.9	245.2

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, how does the Kassebaum-Grassley-Biden-Baucus budget freeze accomplish this? It does it by freezing the Federal Government for a year. And let me emphasize that this is only a 1-year action, a 1-year freeze. This is intended to stop the rise of deficits so that there is time to plan a long-range strategy of deficit control. But the 1-year feature is critical. This stops the deficits immediately, not over the 3 years that the Democratic alternative requires. And it certainly does not allow them to climb in 1986 and 1987 as the leadership alternative does.

It stops them immediately, in fiscal year 1985. And it also stops the climb for at least 3 years. And it does this so effectively that in fiscal year 1987, if no other action than a 1-year freeze is taken, spending will be $73.2 billion lower than it would otherwise have been. The Republican or Democratic alternatives reduce spending in fiscal year 1987 by only $46.4 billion or $39.5 billion respectively.

But let there be no mistake about it. A 1-year freeze will not be enough to solve our problem. The 1-year freeze gives us time to plan an effective future strategy. Further actions will be necessary, in 1986 and 1987, to push the deficits below $162 billion. But while we work on further actions, at least deficits will not be climbing. There will be a firm ceiling on deficits. We will have stopped swimming against the ever-rising tide of deficits.

How does our budget freeze accomplish this? The freeze actions are clear, simple, and effective. We would freeze budget authority for defense programs for 1 year at the fiscal year 1984 baseline level of $264 billion. There would be no Defense Department civilian or military pay raises in fiscal year 1985. In the same way, there would be no cost of living adjustments in any indexed program in fiscal year 1985. And medical costs would be contained by freezing doctor and hospital fees for 1 year. In fiscal year 1985, we assume that agricultural target prices and loan levels will be frozen at the 1984 crop year levels. Nondefense, discretionary programs would also be frozen at the fiscal year 1984 baseline level for budget authority—or program level, where relevant. On the revenue side, we had originally proposed to limit revenue increases to a $10 billion figure. Now that the Senate has overwhelmingly adopted a revenue package, we have dropped any revenue increase from our amendment.

While this program is severe, it is the only proposal that will halt the upward spiral of deficits. It is fair also—a form of shared sacrifice. But the sacrifice only runs for 1 year, and then other formulas will have to be found for further deficit reductions—as will be the case with any plan adopted this year.

This 1 year of sacrifice should prevent many future years of needless suffering. Because it is clear that such a freeze may be necessary to protect many programs—defense and nondefense alike—that are essential to the future of our country. The Reagan administration has already made it clear what kinds of actions it envisions next year to reduce deficits. The targets include indexed programs like social security, farm programs, medicare, and medicaid, veterans health programs, student aid, and higher education, and many others.

And one other thing I confidently predict to you. While the Reagan administration does not list defense as a target for cuts, it will be a target next year if we do not freeze this year. It will not be possible to cut back many important domestic activities without cutting back defense also. And the reaction against defense could last for years and be much more harmful than our proposed 1-year freeze. After all, the 1-year freeze can actually be useful, according to Charles Spinney, in reforming Pentagon budget practices. Under the freeze, DOD outlays continue to grow at an 8-percent rate. And there is a $43 billion backlog of unobligated funds that provides some cushion, if needed. In this connection, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a news clipping from the Washington Post dated April 18, 1984, describing an analysis of the defense budget by Mr. William W. Kaufman be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LONGTIME PENTAGON ANALYST REPORTS '85 REQUEST COULD BE CUT $45 BILLION

(By Fred Hiatt)

The Pentagon budget request for fiscal 1985 could be reduced by $45 billion without affecting military capability, according to a Brookings Institution analysis by longtime Pentagon adviser William W. Kaufmann.

Kaufmann, who wrote annual posture statements for Republican and Democratic defense secretaries throughout the 1970s, said the Reagan administration had skewed military spending dangerously toward procurement, which increased by 92 percent in three years, and away from operations expenses, which rose only 30 percent.

In addition, he said, so much money has been committed for future weapons purchases that the administration and Congress will have "a heavy mortgage" for the next five years. Even if Congress cuts the proposed 1985 budget from the $305 billion to about $290 billion, more than a third of the following year's defense outlays will be "committed and uncontrollable," he said.

"It's already late to put the budget easily on what Bill is suggesting is a stablized track," Brookings analyst John D. Steinbruner said in releasing the Kaufmann study yesterday. "There's going to be a surge in investment, like it or not . . . But it's never too late to adjust on the margins . . ."

In the past, Defense Department officials have vigorously denied that they have slighted readiness at the expense of hardware. They also have said that the "surge" in weapons purchases is needed to counter a perceived growing Soviet threat and to compensate for what the Reagan administration says was a "decade of neglect" after the Vietnam war.

Defense Secretary Caspar W. Weinberger told Congress this year that his proposed budget could not be reduced from $305 billion without threatening national security.

President Reagan, under pressure from Republican senators, then agreed to a $291 billion level that he said would not reduce national security "to a point of unacceptable risk." Kaufmann said yesterday the budget request could be reduced further, to $260 billion, "without any additional risk." Most of the savings would come from eliminating what the Brookings report said was duplication caused by Weinberger's unwillingness to control the military services, which in many cases have each bought weapons systems that perform the same task.

"The planning process has really been running in an unusually undisciplined manner," Steinbruner said. "The increases have not had strings attached to them, they've been spread across the board, and no one's had to argue very hard for them."

For instance, Kaufmann said the Army did not need the Divad antiaircraft missile, new weapons that have not performed well in tests, when it also was upgrading existing Vulcan, Chapparal and Hawk guns and missiles and when the Air Force was buying F16 fighters for the same anti-aircraft mission. Canceling Divad and Patriot would save $2.2 billion, he estimated.

Similarly, Kaufmann said, the Army could save $1.5 billion by canceling the AH64 Apache helicopter, designed to perform the same ground-attack mission as the Air Force A10 attack plane. Last night, the Pentagon said the AH64 "complements" rather than competes with the A10 because the former would be controlled by ground commanders while the latter would be "managed at a much higher level."

Kaufmann was particularly critical of the administration's nuclear weapons program, saying the Pentagon could scrap both the MX intercontinental ballistic missile and the smaller, mobile Midgetman.

He said the Midgetman, the darling of many liberals in Congress, "may sound attractive as an alternative to the MX" but would be so restricted in its mobility—presumably by political or environmental constraints—that it "would be vulnerable to relatively simple and cheap attacks by an enemy."

Weinberger has not presented a convincing case that the Soviets could wage war on many fronts simultaneously, the threat for which the administration says the Pentagon should prepare, Kaufmann said.

Mr. BIDEN. As I was saying, Mr. President, these are prudent actions that in the long run will strengthen the many worthwhile Federal activities that many of us support. If deficits are allowed to climb, as they would do under the Republican leadership plan, next year we will be besieged to make deep cuts in the programs we need only freeze this year. So it is only prudent to act now, before even more painful action is required.

Because, Mr. President, I think one thing is clear. Congress and the President are going to have to act on this deficit issue sooner or later. The President and the Republican leadership have shown a preference for later action. I do not understand that position. In the first quarter of this year, the economy was booming. The gross national product grew in real terms by 8.3 percent. Everyone knows that the easiest time to deal with deficits is when the economy is booming—when entitlement spending is restrained and revenues are up. To deal with deficits in slack times is not only more difficult, but deprives the economy of needed stimulus and may drive it into recession. Many economists are predicting slower economic activity in the future. So it only makes sense to take decisive actions now, not later as the leadership apparently favors.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I applaud the efforts of the sponsors of this amendment. It is refreshing to see a bipartisan effort to reduce the deficit that does not depend upon massive tax increases. Generally around here, bipartisan budget means tax increases matched by defense spending cuts.

This budget would address the heart of the deficit problem—the continued expansion of spending, despite our efforts of the last 3 years to control the Federal budget. The effect of their budget freeze is to reduce spending by $226 billion over fiscal years 1984-87, including a cut of $120 billion in defense, $72 billion in nondefense outlays and $34 billion in debt service savings.

I wish it were possible this year to cut spending by $226 billion. But to the Senator from Kansas this budget has one fatal flaw—it has no chance of being enacted.

One reason is that most of the spending cuts are in defense. This budget plan cuts military spending by $80 more than the Baker amendment. By holding budget authority constant, this would amount to a real reduction in the Pentagon's budget for 1985. It seems to this Senator that such a defense cut is both dangerous and unrealistic.

There is a broad bipartisan consensus that defense spending needs to be increased—not by the amount that the President has proposed, but in the range of 3 to 6 percent real growth. Let me emphasize that the KGB budget does not allow for zero real growth in defense. By freezing actual budget authority real defense spending will decline by 5.6 percent. I cannot believe that the President would or should accept such an appropriation.

A second reason why this budget is not going anywhere is that it freezes COLAs, including social security, without any assurance from the Speaker of the House that he is willing to go along. Of the nondefense savings, $23 billion in this budget come out of social security. Now I do not believe that any area of the budget is untouchable, and our actions in the Finance Committee over the past 3 years bear this out. We have reduced spending in programs under the jurisdiction of the Finance Committee by $73 billion over fiscal years 1982 through 1986, and these are entitlement programs. But I have been around here long enough to know that a $23 billion reduction in social security spending is not going anywhere in an election year without the Speaker's endorsement.

Just recall 2 years ago. The Senate Budget Committee was attacked for doing so little as suggested that the social security trust funds were approaching insolvency. The issue became so politicized that it is dangerous to even stand here and talk about social security. This amendment is a political land mine that the Speaker of the House would love to see us step onto. Any Republican who votes for this plan will be accused of trying to dismantle the social security system. I will bet the Democratic fundraisers already have the letter in their computer.

I would also remind Members that this amendment would cut medicare spending by an additional $6.7 billion on top of the $9 billion in cuts already in the Finance Committee package. The additional savings come from freezing hospital payments. Some Senators may have the impression that the hospital freeze would substitute for the Finance Committee medicare package. But as the legislation is drafted, the freeze is in addition to our provisions, for a total reduction of $15.7 billion.

We attempted to make greater savings in medicare in our committee markup. But we encountered strong opposition to further cuts. We also believe that completely freezing hospital payments seriously jeopardizes our efforts to implement the prospective payment system.

The Finance Committee provisions include a modification in hospital payments that would result in a reduction of about 1 percent in those costs. Such a reduction would still permit an increase to account for the changes in the prices of the goods and services hospitals must purchase, helping to insure that medicare recipients continue to have access to high quality services. This amendment would permit no adjustment in hospital payments.

In conjunction with this proposal to further reduce payments to hospitals, the amendment before us would modify two additional provisions in the Finance Committee amendments. First, it would strike the provision indexing the part B deductible, and second, it would maintain the part B premium at 25 percent of program costs for only 1 additional year. These modifications reduce the savings resulting from the Finance Committee amendments by $588 million.

PART B PREMIUM

Part B premiums have increased by less than 270 percent since 1970 while there has been an increase of 1,720 percent in the Government's share of program costs and an increase in overall program costs which exceeds 960 percent.

The part B premium proposal contains a hold harmless provision so that an individual's social security check will not be reduced when their premiums increase.

The committee proposal is designed to accomplish one major objective: To provide for a more equitable balance between general revenue and premium financing of medicare part B.

The KGB amendment allows the balance between general revenue and premium financing to continue to tilt toward increased Federal financing after 1986. Rather than a year-to-year fix as has happened before and is being proposed again—we should stand by the committee's proposal which holds the Governments subsidy of this program at 75 percent.

INDEX PART V DEDUCTIBLE

The original Finance Committee proposal would be for 3 years only. The 1981 Reconciliation Act increased the part B deductible by 25 percent from $60 to $75. Prior to this amendment the deductible had remained at $60 since 1972 despite a more then 430-percent increase in total program benefit payments between 1972 and 1981. Since 1981 benefit payments have increased by an additional 80 percent.

The deductible was originally intended to reflect a portion of program costs, and has, because it has been fixed, failed to do so. The real value of the deductible will continue to erode if no increase takes place.

Indexing the part B deductible makes it more consistent with the part A deductible since both would change on an annual basis and reflect the increasing costs of the program.

The incremental increase in the deductible is small on an individual-by-individual basis, but results in significant cost savings to the program as a whole.

In 1985 the deductible would increase by $3, or less than 4 percent, while part B program costs are expected to increase by 16 percent.

CONCLUSION

Just so there is no misunderstanding, let me repeat that this budget would reduce social security spending by $23 billion and medicare by nearly $16 billion over the next 3 years.

This is much more drastic than anything considered by the House. They took up a weak freeze that would have allowed spending to rise only by the rate of inflation. This proposal just to limit spending got only 308 votes. How can anyone believe that this budget freeze has any chance in the House, when a much more modest attempt was defeated by 3 to 1?

The Senator from Kansas reluctantly recommends that this amendment be defeated. Our job this year is to get as much deficit reduction as we can. I believe the Republican leadership budget does as well as we can hope this year. While it would be great to lower the deficit even further, particularly through spending cuts, if this amendment were passed, the chance of getting any deficit cuts enacted this year would be slim.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to the budget freeze proposal advanced by the Senators from Kansas, Iowa, and Delaware. In many ways, I agree wholeheartedly with the authors of the amendment. I agree that the budget deficits facing this Nation are truly extraordinary and demand extraordinary and bold action from this Congress. And I agree with the authors that we could go well beyond the budget reductions contained in the leadership amendment which is pending before this body. I agree that savings in fiscal year 1985 are much to be preferred to savings in the outyears of 1986 and 1987. The savings need to be front-loaded as the Senator from Colorado has said here on the floor. And I will also reluctantly agree that the KGB amendment is the best opportunity to achieve these objectives in an election year.

But, Mr. President, although I share many concerns and objectives with the authors, I cannot agree to the method of budget discipline that their amendment employs. I am opposed to the freeze approach. The deficits we face are structural—that is they are built into the laws which govern this Nation. The deficits are authorized by this Congress and the policies that we have agreed to pursue.

We may freeze those authorizations for 1 year as this amendment suggests. But what do we do next year, when we face the same problem all over again—huge deficits built into the law? Do we just freeze again? And for how many years do we abrogate our responsibility to address policy while we take the easy path of an across-the-board freeze year-after-year, how long will it be before the budget of the U.S. Government is grossly out of balance with the priorities and needs of the Nation?

I have been saying since I came to this body in 1978 that the Congress needs to review and adjust the underlying policies that create these budget deficits. We cannot solve the budget problem by simply crunching numbers. It is not a numbers problem. The problem is policy and until we bring those policies—health care, pensions, housing, defense, agriculture—to the floor of the Senate and debate policy reform—under the discipline of a budget resolution, but in the context of a policy debate—we cannot resolve the fundamental problems which cause the deficits which threaten our economy.

We have on rare occasions faced those policy debates in this Congress. For instance, early in the 1st session we reformed and according to some, saved the social security system. We made sure that social security was put on a sound financial footing for the foreseeable future. Tax revenues collected under that legislation will support benefit payments. But the social security example is rare. We have tried in my Subcommittee on Health which has jurisdiction over medicare and medicaid to make the savings required through rational policy adjustments rather than mindless numbers crunching. The principal example of this effort is the prospective payment system for hospitals participating in medicare which was adopted in the social security package last year.

So there have been some policy changes. But they have been too few and far between. We seem each year to spend more and more of our time on the budget process and less and less on the authorization bills which are the building blocks of the budget.

Furthermore, we find the compromise reflected in last year's social security legislation undone by this amendment. We raised payroll taxes, we increased the tax on the self-employed, we brought thousands of the employed under the social security system for the first time and we did all that to make sure that benefits, including cost-of-living increases, could be provided. But now, just a year later, we find under this amendment that the COLA would be denied, frozen. It is as if we imposed those new payroll taxes, not to save social security, but to balance the budget. And that we find ourselves forced to do so because we have failed to apply the discipline of our social security legislation to other areas of the Federal budget.

Mr. President, beyond my objection to the methodology of the amendment—little more than number crunching in the absence of policy considerations—I must also object to this amendment, because it is only half a freeze. It freezes that part of our policy which is implemented by direct spending. But as Members of this body well-know, that is only half of our spending. The other half is accomplished through the Tax Code. The credits, deductions, and exemptions which make up the vast bulk of the Code, cost the U.S. Treasury very nearly as much as we collect in tax revenues every year.

Shall we freeze our spending programs for housing while we allow the tax expenditures for mortgage interest deductions to go unchecked? Shall we freeze our assistance programs for small business, while we continue unchecked the substantial depreciation and investment tax credits found in the Tax Code for large and profitable companies? Will we—as we did in the tax package last week—continue a moratorium on taxing fringe benefits for the employed while we freeze the spending programs for food stamps and job training that benefit the unemployed?

This amendment is only half a freeze. Those who depend on Federal spending will be frozen. Those who achieve substantial benefit through the Tax Code are left unaffected by this new found discipline.

So, Mr. President, I will oppose this amendment for two reasons. Although it is attractive in the short term, it is not a reasonable response to our budget problem over the long run. And our budget problems are long run. Second, even in the short term, the amendment is unfair in that it deals with only half of the spending decisions that we make. The other half—the expenditures made through the Tax Code—are left completely untouched by this amendment.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, someone commented the other day that the solution to the deficit problem depends on whom you ask. And as I study the details of this proposal to freeze all Federal spending, I am reminded that each of us has our own notion as to how the deficit should be reduced.

Just last week, I offered a budget plan that would have cut funding for all Federal programs—except social security, medicare, and national defense—by 10 percent over current levels. My plan was not approved, but it gave Senators a chance to vote for substantial and meaningful spending cuts without harming our senior citizens or jeopardizing our national security.

The Congressional Budget Office estimated my budget plan would have saved the taxpayers roughly $200 billion in 3 years, time.

Mr. President, Senators know I do not make a habit of voting against legislation that would cut Government spending. In fact, some might say I have taken more than my share of swings with the budget ax.

However, there comes a time to draw the line between cutting waste and extravagance from a bloated Federal bureaucracy and cutting funds for programs which are worthwhile to millions of Americans.

I must draw the line here, Mr. President. I cannot support a 1-year freeze on spending for all Government programs—the worthwhile, as well as wasteful—and accordingly will vote against this plan.

Congress simply must reduce Federal spending, but it should not do so at the expense of citizens who are truly needy and depend on Government assistance for their survival.

As I understand this freeze proposal, it would hurt millions of senior citizens and disabled Americans in North Carolina and elsewhere by denying them an annual cost-of-living adjustment this year. By freezing medicare funding, it would jeopardize the ability of elderly citizens to get the medical attention and hospital care they desperately need.

Supporters of this plan claim it is "fair," but I see nothing fair about spending cuts which have this kind of impact on those Americans who can least afford it.

If this plan passes, Mr. President, our efforts to restore the national defense capability of our Nation would be severely crippled. During the decade before President Reagan was elected, our defense capability was allowed to deteriorate to a dangerous level. The United States is no longer No. 1 in its ability to defend itself from foreign aggression. There is an urgent need to catch up.

By supporting a reasonable amount of defense spending, Mr. President, I am certainly not advocating waste by the Pentagon. We must move quickly to cut out wasteful spending practices in all Federal agencies—including the Pentagon.

The Grace Commission—formally known as the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control—studied Federal waste and extravagance for 3 years and has presented Congress with more than 2,400 recommendations for cutting down on the cost of Government without eliminating worthwhile programs. The panel estimates $425,000,000,000 could be saved in 3 years if President Reagan and Congress implemented them. That is roughly half of the entire Federal budget for the current fiscal year.

Sad to say, the Grace Commission report has been all but ignored by Congress and the news media.

Mr. President, there have been many times during my nearly 12 years in the Senate that I have encouraged the use of a "buzz saw" to cut excessive spending. But each time, I have been careful to tailor the proposal so as not to harm the most necessary and worthwhile Federal programs. While I commend my distinguished colleagues for their hard work and courage in putting this budget plan together, regretfully I cannot join with them in support of it.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today in opposition to the Kassebaum-Grassley-Biden budget proposal currently under consideration by the Senate. I fully sympathize with the intentions of my colleagues offering this amendment: however, I believe that its impact will be inequitably distributed throughout our society.

Certainly, I do not dispute that the budget is a disaster. I call it a disaster because that is exactly the state of our budget process. The Federal Government may incur a $180 billion deficit in fiscal year 1985 if action is not taken soon. In fact, budget deficits may total $500 billion between 1986 and 1988. This is outrageous: it will mortgage the future of our children.

I was one of 28 Senators to support a budget amendment. That would have cut the 1985 budget for all programs by 10 percent, except for social security recipients. I subscribe to the notion that all sectors of the budget must be cut. However, I think that social security recipients must be treated separately.

This is the crux of my concern with the current amendment. It does not distinguish between the poor, the middle class, and the wealthy. It will eliminate the COLA for social security recipients. The end result will be that 5 million senior citizens will be pushed below the poverty level.

Where will these people turn? Last year they had to sacrifice their COLA for 6 months. Under the pending proposal, they would have to wait another full year. This would create a whole new class of impoverished Americans. Consequently, I must vigorously oppose this amendment.

The authors of the pending budget proposal are right to be concerned about the deficit, but I believe that their amendment either must be modified to exempt senior citizens or must be defeated.

Thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I have listened closely to the debate on the Kassebaum-Biden-Grassley amendment, and my concern about the effect of the deficit on future economic growth is so strong that I seriously considered voting for the amendment. However, in the final analysis I cannot support it.

I agree that we must have a program of shared sacrifice which will lead to substantial deficit reduction. It is for that reason that I voted for the Hollings plan yesterday. But the program before us is not one of shared sacrifice. Unlike the Hollings plan, it calls for a major sacrifice by social security recipients but for no sacrifice by the wealthiest members of our society. Right now there are thousands of people in this country who make hundreds of thousands of dollars a year and pay nothing in taxes because of tax shelters and loopholes. Tens of thousands of profitable corporations pay nothing in taxes for the same reasons. The Hollings plan would have allowed for tax reform to change these inequities. The plan before us, however, would allow them to continue at the same time we are asking recipients of social security to make do with less after taking into account inflation. I cannot accept this.

In addition, I find the 4½-percent reduction in defense spending in real terms too drastic of a step. I have come to this floor over and over again to offer amendments to cut military waste and to terminate unwise weapons programs. But the plan before us today goes beyond cutting waste and terminating unwise programs. I am concerned about the impact of this amendment on operations and maintenance. I am also concerned what a cut of 4½-percent would do to our arguments with the allies that they should keep our mutual commitments to increase defense spending by 3 percent after taking into account inflation. If the allies take this vote today as a signal that we are no longer serious in our efforts to insist that they share the burden of defense, then in the long run this amendment may cost us more in defense spending if we have to further pick up the slack in their own defense efforts in order to protect our own security.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, since the Senate did not support, as I think it should have last night, the Hollings, Exon, Andrews proposal for truly meaningful deficits reductions, I find it necessary to cast a vote for the Grassley - Biden - Kassebaum - Baucus amendment. As the issue now stands it is the only option now available to attack the deficit problem for those of us very much concerned about it. However, Mr. President, I am concerned about the zero increase in our defense needs. That is simply not realistic in my judgment. Should this measure pass, I will subsequently be offering a proposal to make the defense number increase at least 4 percent.

It is with that understanding that I will cast an affirmative vote.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I inquire of the Senator from New Mexico whether or not there are any additional Senators he knows of who wish to speak in opposition to this amendment? I will make the same inquiry on my side, whether there is any Senator who wishes to speak in support of this amendment and to determine how much longer we should continue.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, let me say to my friend from Delaware, Senator DOLE has just returned. I might ask if he cares to speak further.

Does the Senator from Delaware have anyone else?

Mr. DOLE. I do not feel compelled to speak, but I would be happy to speak.

Mr. DOMENICI. He does not feel compelled to.

Mr. BIDEN. I do not think there is anyone else. If Senator DOLE speaks, I would be happy to speak again.

Mr. DOLE. We can speak at the same time.

Mr. BIDEN. It would probably be equally understood.

Mr. DOMENICI. We have no further Senators who want to speak in opposition. If the Senator is ready to vote, we are.

Mr. BIDEN. I am ready to vote. Let us vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Alaska (Mr. MURKOWSKI), is necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Alaska (Mr. MURKOWSKI) would vote "Yea."

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HART), is necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 65, as follows:

[Rollcall Vote No. 85 Leg.]

NOT VOTING—2

Hart	Murkowski

So the amendment (No. 3043), as modified, was rejected.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DOMENICI. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, it has been called to my attention by the distinguished Senator from Oregon that he has a misunderstanding and an error in respect to the vote just cast.

He has consulted, I believe, with the minority leader, and has advised me of that situation.

I yield, if the Senator wishes to make a request at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon is recognized.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I would like to make two statements. One, the vote which I cast in opposition to the Kassebaum amendment was intended as a vote "aye." The vote was announced before I had the opportunity to vote for the amendment. Two, this will not change the outcome of the vote. Therefore, I would ask unanimous consent that I may be recorded as voting "aye."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator from Oregon will be recorded as having voted "aye."

Mr. HATFIELD. I thank the leadership.

(The foregoing tally has been changed to reflect the above order.)

31-059 O-87-21 (Pt. 8)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. May we have order in the Senate? Senators please cease conversation.

The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, it is my understanding that the distinguished ranking member of the Budget Committee, Senator CHILES, is prepared to offer his amendment at this time. I also understand that, while debate will proceed this evening, Senator CHILES does not wish to have the vote on or in relation to that amendment tonight, but rather to take it up tomorrow, which is satisfactory with me.

I wonder if I could inquire of the two managers now as to when they would like to resume consideration of this and how soon we might be able to get to a vote approximately on the CHILES amendment. I am not trying to get a time agreement, I am just trying to get an estimate so I can make a further announcement about the schedule of the Senate tomorrow.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, my understanding was that we would lay it down tonight. I have tried to tell some Members that I did not think there would be any votes tonight. I do not think that we will debate it very long tonight, just lay it down and take it up tomorrow.

While I would not at this time like to enter into a time agreement, I am not going to try to delay it any great length of time. I want there to be a free-flowing debate on the amendment as there was on this amendment and as there was on the Hollings plan.

I would think sometime toward midafternoon we could see where we stand in the debate at that time. That is what I can indicate to the Senator now. I do not want to lock myself in but, at the same time, I think there should be a meaningful debate.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I think that is a fair analysis of the situation as best we can do.

Let me say it is still the hope of the leadership on this side that we can finish tomorrow night. I do not think we can, perhaps, but we ought to try, because otherwise we are going to be on this bill when we return on Monday. We have many, many other things that have to be done.

But in any event, it is the intention of the leadership to ask the Senate to remain late on tomorrow evening to get as far as we can and finish if possible.

Mr. President, based on the colloquy that we have now had, I wish to announce that I do not foresee any further record votes this evening.

AMENDMENT NO. 3044

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I send my amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Florida (Mr. CHILES) proposes an amendment numbered 3044.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

(a) "SEC. . It is the Sense of Congress that total Budget Authority available for appropriations for Budget Function 050 (National Defense) and for non-defense discretionary programs shall not exceed $431.3 billion for FY 1985; and which $290.8 billion is intended to be for National Defense and $140.5 billion is intended to be for non-defense discretionary programs; that for FY 1986, the Total Budget Authority for these activities shall not exceed $462.8 billion, of which $321.0 billion is intended to be for National Defense and $141.8 billion for non-defense discretionary programs; and that for FY 1987, the total Budget Authority for these activities shall not exceed $497.5 billion, of which $354.3 billion is intended to be for National Defense and $143.2 billion is intended to be for non-defense discretionary programs."

(b) "SEC. . DELAY FOR 2 YEARS OF COST-OF-LIVING ADJUSTMENTS TO TAX TABLES.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Subsection (f) of section 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to adjustments in tax tables so that inflation will not result in tax increases) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(6) Special Rule for 1985 and 1986.—Notwithstanding the provisions of this subsection, for taxable years beginning before January 1, 1987, no increase shall be made under clause (ii) of paragrah (2)(A) of this subsection and no adjustment shall be made under paragraph (2)(C) relating to such increase."

(b) BASE YEAR.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Subparagraph (B) of section 1(f)(3) of such Code (relating to cost-of-living adjustment) is amended by striking out "1983" and inserting in lieu thereof "1985".

"(2) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by paragraph (1) shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1986.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, this is the Chiles amendment, or the Chiles package. It will be the pending business, I understand, when we come back on the bill tomorrow.

I yield now to the distinguished majority leader.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Florida. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there now be a brief period for the transaction of routine morning business not past the hour of 7 p.m., in which Senators may speak for not more than 1 minute each, with the exception of the majority and minority leaders who shall have no restriction in that respect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMENDING THE GOVERNMENT OF COLOMBIA FOR ITS WORK IN COMBATING THE SPREAD OF COCAINE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have a few items that are cleared for action by unanimous consent on this side.

First, there is a matter that we provided by unanimous consent would be placed directly on the calendar by order of last evening; that is, Calendar 828, House Concurrent Resolution 275.

If the minority leader has no objection, I ask the Senate to proceed to consideration of that item at this time.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, there is no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the resolution by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A House concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 275), commending the Government of Colombia for its recent seizure of record amounts of cocaine, congratulating the Government of Colombia for its decision to test herbicidal eradication, expressing the hope that the Government of Colombia will carry out a sustained eradication program, and deploring the assassination of the Minister of Justice of Colombia.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of the concurrent resolution.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I rise in support of House Concurrent Resolution 275, which commends the Government of Colombia for its efforts to control drug trafficking in that country and which deplores the recent assassination of a government official who fought to rid his country of drug dealers.

Rodrigo Lara-Bonilla, the Minister of Justice in Colombia, was gunned down on April 30 when he stopped by the side of the road to assist two apparently stranded motorcyclists. One of the paid assassins died in the exchange of gunfire and one was seriously wounded by Mr. Lara's guards.

President Betancur has declared a state of siege and has convened his full Cabinet in response to the assassination and its connection with Colombia's illicit drug business. He said martial law was ordered so that Columbia could "recover its national dignity that has been trampled by drug traffickers, giving us a black image throughout the world." I applaud President Betancur's swift reaction to this murder. Mr. Lara spoke out vigoruously and bravely about the threat to his country that drugs and the criminal element pose. Courage and duty, whether on the field of battle or in the war against drugs, should not be forgotten. Neither should the Colombian people forget this man's fight to warn and to rid Colombia of the devastation caused by drugs—the cost of life, productivity, integrity, and freedom itself.

In 1979, I visited Colombia and talked with the President and Attorney General of that country. They provided convincing evidence of the magnitude of drug production there and their difficulty in trying to cope with it. Their resources obviously were inadequate. When I returned, we saw to it that aid was forthcoming to help them begin. Sixteen million dollars helped to establish a 1,200-man special narcotics control unit with the Colombian National Police. This special unit was in charge of the recent successful attack on cocaine laboratories and the huge confiscation of 13.8 metric tons of coke on March 10. That is estimated to be one-fourth the cocaine consumption yearly in the United States. Our aid also helped to train Colombian customs personnel and pilots and provided aircraft and equipment necessary to narcotics control.

Foreign aid is often critized, but here is a case where assistance we have provided is certainly cost beneficial. We have seen this money fight the drug flow at its source. Just last year, we gave Colombia $3.5 million for narcotics control efforts; this lone successful raid on March 10 at Tranquillandia removed $1.2 billion from drug dealers' pockets and from the drug traffickers' underground economy. The more we can help in endeavors like that, the less we have to spend for drug law enforcement in this country. Money can be saved which otherwise would be needed for overcrowded courts, prisons, and drug rehabilitation programs.

That Colombia is the processing and the distribution center for about 75 percent of the cocaine entering the United States is reason enough for us to lend support and assistance. The fact that the drug industry there alledgedly is promoted and protected by the Communist guerrilla force and that guerrillas and traffickers work together in drugs-for-guns deals threatening the Democratic Government of Colombia is reason enough for Colombia to welcome our support. Sadly, this has not always been the case. However, the commitment of the Colombian Government to their treaty obligations regarding the eradication of cannabis and coca is encouraging. The cautious but positive progress made to date by the administration of President Betancur in this regard, especially in the face of the ruthless and lawless challenges of the criminal elements within the country, is to be commended.

The return of the fugitive Harold Rosenthal to the United States by Colombia is another indication of their determination to rid their country of the blight of international criminals. Rosenthal was a key figure in the mass movement of tons of cocaine into this country with a total disregard for the laws of his own country of the United States as well as those of Colombia.

We strongly encourage the government of President Betancur to expeditiously process the international extradition requests for our Government. This process, directed at the highest levels of the international drug trafficking cartels, will serve notice to these criminals to terminate their activities or suffer the scourge of a modern judicial system, loss of their freedom, and all of their resources. The deterrent quality of this kind of bilateral cooperation will benefit the societies of both countries for generations to come.

The pervasive cancer of drug abuse and trafficking has reached into the heart of the Colombian society. Violent criminal acts with direct connection to the major drug traffickers in Colombia has become a daily occurence. The most recent outrage by these drug kingpins is the assassination of Justice Minister Rodrigo Lara-Bonilla. He was a man committed to ridding his county of the menace of these parasites. His loss shocks the conscience of all law-abiding people throughout the hemisphere, especially the dedicated men and women in the law enforcement community. The total desregard that these drug traffickers have for life and the laws of their country as well as other countries points to the need for a renewed dedication to the ideals of this fine man.

Mr. President, I ask the Senate to join with the House in deploring the assassination of Rodrigo Lara-Bonilla, Minister of Justice of Colombia. I ask also that the Senate join the House and the Senators who cosponsored my resolution of commendation, Senate Resolution 358, to commend Colombia's efforts to eradicate drugs at the source and to applaud Colombia's world record drug bust of March 10. The Government of Colombia has embarked on a difficult journey to make this hemisphere a safer place, free of drugs and free of the criminal element which lives off the profits of those drugs. Colombia deserves our pat on the back and our encouragement to go forth as its President announced "unleashing a war without quarter against the crooks that sow terror in cities, the countryside, and towns."

Mr. President, this is very significant. Colombia recently made the biggest cocaine bust that we have seen happen anywhere. The country of Colombia has more and more been taking a serious concern in regard to drugs. We had some differences for a while. Much of the marihuana was coming from Colombia. Then cocaine was being processed there. Our concern was whether the Government in Colombia was expressing sufficient concern.

It is clear from their recent actions they took in the tremendous drug bust that they have taken this more seriously. This terrible thing has happened, the assassination of the Minister of Justice. They are now beginning a real war on crime.

This resolution helps us stand with Colombia, support them for the recent actions they have taken, and tells them that we stand ready to assist them in any way in this dreadful, dreadful war that is going on.

Mr. President, I introduced a similar concurrent resolution after the occasion of their successful cocaine bust.

This certainly takes the place of that. Now we want to take this further action of expressing our sympathy for the assassination of Mr. Lara by our resolve to stand with President Betancur in his all-out war on these underworld factions.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, the resolution now under consideration by the Senate addresses one of the most significant international narcotics control issues now facing the United States—how to reduce dramatically the flow of cocaine and marihuana from Colombia to the United States. As the resolution makes clear, one of the most effective ways to achieve this objective is by herbicide eradication done in cooperation with the host government. It is my hope that Colombia will soon implement an ongoing herbicide eradication program aimed at reducing its illicit marihuana crop. The Committee on Foreign Relations supports this kind of effort. To this end, the committee has approved the Department of State's international narcotics control budget for fiscal year 1985 which includes the authority to fund an effective Colombia eradication program.

The Government of Colombia has made some progress on the narcotics problem in recent months. Its most dramatic success was the March crackdown on cocaine processing and warehousing facilities in the country. That major law enforcement effort by the Colombia Government demonstrated that when there is sufficient will to take action, the drug profiteers can be beaten. But the human costs can be very high. Sadly, 2 days ago the Justice Minister of Colombia, one of the strongest supporters in the Colombia Government of increased antinarcotics efforts, was assassinated. It appears that his assassination may have been the work of drug traffickers.

I am told that President Betancour has said publicly that his government will continue to move forward in its efforts to deal more effectively with the narcotics problems. I applaud him for this statement and pledge my support for any serious efforts by the Colombia Government that will help reduce the amount of Colombia marihuana and cocaine coming into the United States. I strongly support House Concurrent Resolution 275. It is my hope that it will be a call to action for the Colombia Government to move forward vigorously on both the eradiction program and the apprehension and prosecution of drug producers and traffickers in that country.

The concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 275) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ORDER TO PLACE H.R. 5222 ON THE CALENDAR

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Judiciary Committee be discharged from further consideration of H.R. 5222, Controlled Substances Registrant Protection Act of 1984, and it be placed on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER TO HOLD H.R. 5287 AT THE DESK

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that once the Senate receives from the House H.R. 5287, a bill to amend title II of the Higher Education Act of 1965 to permit additional funds to be used to continue awards under certain multiyear grants, it be held at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE CALENDAR

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have a series of calendar items on the Calendar of Business which are cleared on this side for action by the unanimous consent. I will ask the minority leader if he is in a position to similarly clear all or any portion of the following items: Calendar Orders numbered 775, 776, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, and 824.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the items that have been enumerated by the distinguished majority leader have been cleared on this side.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader. I wonder if the minority leader would object if we proceeded to consider these items en bloc?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, my answer is in the negative.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I make that request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COTTON STATISTICS AND ESTIMATES ACT AMENDMENTS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2085) to amend section 3a of the Cotton Statistics and Estimates Act to provide continuing authority to the Secretary of Agriculture for recovering costs associated with cotton classing services to producers which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry with an amendment to strike all after the enacting clause and insert:

That, effective for the period beginning October 1, 1984, and ending September 30, 1988, section 3a of the Cotton Statistics and Estimates Act (7 U.S.C. 473a) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3a. Effective for the fiscal years ending September 30, 1985, September 30, 1986, September 30, 1987, and September 30, 1988, the Secretary of Agriculture shall make cotton classification services available to producers of cotton and shall provide for the collection of classification fees from participating producers, or from agents who voluntarily agree to collect and remit the fees on behalf of producers. Such fees, together with the proceeds from the sales of samples submitted under this section, shall cover as nearly as practicable the cost of the services provided under this section, including administrative and supervisory costs: Provided, That (1) the uniform per bale classification fee to be collected from producers, or their agents, for such classification service in any year shall not exceed the uniform fee collected in the previous year by more than the percentage increase in the Implicit Price Deflator for Gross National Product as indexed during the most recent twelve-month period for which official statistics are available, and (2) the uniform per bale classification fee shall not be increased for any year if the accumulated reserve exceeds 20 per centum of the cost of the classification program in the previous year. Special classification services provided at the request of the producer shall not be subject to the restrictions specified in clauses (1) and (2) of the preceding sentence. All samples of cotton submitted for classification under this section shall become the property of the United States, and shall be sold: Provided, That such cotton samples shall not be subject to the provisions of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 (40 U.S.C. 471 et seq.) Fees collected under this section and under section 3d of this Act and the proceeds from the sales of samples shall be credited to the current appropriation account that incurs the cost and shall remain available without fiscal year limitation to pay the expenses of the Secretary incident to providing services under such sections. Such funds may be invested by the Secretary in insured or fully-collateralized, interest-bearing accounts or, at the discretion of the Secretary, by the Secretary of the Treasury in United States Government debt instruments, with the interest earned and any late payment penalties to be credited to the appropriation account for use by the Secretary of Agriculture in providing services under this section and section 3d of this Act. There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section to the extent that financing is not available from fees and the proceeds from the sales of samples.".

SEC. 2. Section 203(h) of the Agricultural Marketing Act of 1946 (7 U.S.C 1622(h)) is amended by inserting after "service authorized by this subsection" the following: ": Provided, That any operating balances from the collection of fees under this subsection may be invested by the Secretary of Agriculture in insured or fully-collateralized, interest-bearing accounts or, at the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, by the Secretary of the Treasury in United States Government debt instruments, with the interest earned and any late payment penalties to be credited to the trust fund account that incurs the cost of the services rendered under this Act and to be available without fiscal year limitation to cover the expenses of the Secretary of Agriculture incident to providing such services".

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, S. 2085 extends through fiscal year 1988 the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture to recover from cotton growers the costs associated with providing cotton-classing services. The Department of Agriculture began charging user fees for cotton-classing services on October 1, 1981, pursuant to authority contained in the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981. This bill will allow the Department of Agriculture to continue to recover the costs of such services and, thus, maintain equitable treatment to all users of commodity grading activities.

I urge the support of S. 2085 since the user fee concept has now been effectively integrated into the cotton classification system without any detectable adverse effect. Participation by producers in the program during fiscal years 1982-83 remained at the same high level as it had been in previous years—about 97 percent. The Department of Agriculture predicts the same level of participation in fiscal year 1984 as well. Additionally, Mr. President, passage of S. 2085 will result in a continued savings in appropriated funds of $12 to $14 million annually.

In addition to providing for the collection of classification fees from participating producers, the bill will specifically allow agents who voluntarily agree to do so to collect and remit the fees on behalf of producers. This provision is consistent with the intent of Congress as expressed in the conference report on the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981 and is now incorporated into the bill to clarify the Department's authority to continue billing voluntary collection agents for the fees, rather than producers. By directly billing the approximately 1,200 ginners and warehousemen, rather than billing individually about 50,000 producers that receive classing services, annual cost savings under the cotton classification system of about $800,000 will result.

S. 2085, as reported, also makes improvements to the current program. The bill places a cap on the total fee per bale that correlates to annual increases in the rate of inflation. Specifically, the bill provides that the uniform per bale classification fee in any year may not exceed the fee collected in the previous year by more than the percentage increase in the implicit price deflator for gross national product as indexed during the most recent 12-month period for which statistics are available. The change, requested by the cotton industry, replaces the current overall dollar limit on total revenues that may be raised from the assessment of cotton-classing fees.

Mr. President, the bill also assures the cotton industry that fee increases will be based on need and that large reserves will not be accumulated from the collection of fees. Thus the bill provides that the uniform per bale fee may not be increased for any year if the accumulated reserve exceeds 20 percent of the cost of the classification program in the previous year. Special classification services provided at the request of the producer, such as high volume instrument classification, would not be subject to the restrictions on fee increases.

Additionally, S. 2085 continues the current authority for the Secretary of Agriculture to invest, in interest-bearing accounts, the operating balances of the cotton classing and cotton service testing programs user fee accounts to help offset program operating costs. The Secretary could also request the Secretary of the Treasury to invest these funds in U.S. Government debt instruments.

Finally, S. 2085 will allow the Secretary of Agriculture to invest operating balances from the collection of fees for all voluntary inspection and grading programs being conducted by the Department of Agriculture under authority of the Agricultural Marketing Act of 1946. These programs involve various agricultural commodities such as meat, poultry, eggs, and fruits and vegetables. The ability to invest collected fees in interest bearing accounts or U.S. Government securities will allow these programs to help pay for themselves as well as offset future revenue requirements. This provision places all voluntary inspection and grading programs of the Department of Agriculture on a comparable basis.

Mr. President, I urge adoption of S. 2085. The continuation of the user fees for cotton-classing services and the close coordination of the program with the cotton industry will result in the program being administered by the Department of Agriculture in the most efficient manner possible. S. 2085 will directly benefit cotton growers and users and will provide equitable treatment to all users of commodity grading activities. In addition, the recovery of these costs removes the burden of paying for these specialized services from the general taxpayer.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. President, S. 2085 extends, for 4 years, the authority for the Secretary of Agriculture to charge fees for cotton classification services provided to producers by the Department of Agriculture. The bill will also permit the Department to invest, in interest-bearing accounts, cotton-classing fees, and other fees for commodity inspection and grading services that are held for use in covering the costs of the services.

Enactment of the bill is needed to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to continue to collect fees to offset costs associated with providing cotton-classing services to producers. Without enactment of the bill, authority to charge for cotton-classing services will expire at the end of fiscal year 1984. Under S. 2085, the authority is extended through fiscal year 1988.

The Department first implemented a fee for cotton classification services on October 1, 1981, under the provisions of the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981. Initially, the fee was established at a level that covered only about two-thirds of the cost of the classing services, including administrative and supervisory costs. In fiscal year 1982, the established fee was 60 cents per bale, and, in fiscal year 1983, the fee was increased to 67 cents per bale. The balance of the cost of the classing system was financed by appropriated funds and by proceeds from the sale of cotton samples accumulated by the Department of Agriculture. For fiscal year 1984, the Department of Agriculture increased the user fee to $1.15 per bale, which is estimated to be sufficient to recover the full cost of the cotton-classing program. This last increase placed all agricultural commodity grading services on a full cost-recovery basis.

Under S. 2085, in fiscal year 1985 and following years, the Department will be able to adjust the 1984 user fee for cotton classing as appropriate to reflect inflation, thus enabling the Department to keep fee income at levels sufficient to cover inflationary increase in its cost of providing the services.

The cotton classification user fee system started in 1981 has been well received by cotton producers. Participation in the classification program by producers has remained at the same high level as in previous years—about 97 percent. In that regard, I urge the Department to work closely with the cotton industry, as it has in the past, to insure that the program continues to operate efficiently.

S. 2085 also authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to invest, in interest-bearing accounts, the operating balances of the trust fund containing fees collected for voluntary commodity inspection and grading services provided under the Agricultural Marketing Act of 1946. Under that act, inspection and grading services are provided for various agricultural commodities, such as meat, poultry, eggs, fruits, and vegetables. The interest earned on deposits will be applied against the cost of providing the inspection and grading services.

This new authority to earn interest on fees collected under the Agricultural Marketing Act will place all voluntary commodity inspection and grading programs of the Department of Agriculture on a comparable basis, and help offset future revenue requirements.

Mr. President, this bill is necessary to maintain the effective operation of the cotton classification and other commodity inspection and grading programs without adding to the Federal budget. I urge my colleagues to vote for the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as amended.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide continuing authority to the Secretary of Agriculture for recovering costs associated with cotton classing services to producers and to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to invest funds derived from fees for certain voluntary grading and inspection services.".

TASK FORCE ON AGRICULTURAL CREDIT

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution (S. Res. 287) establishing a task force on agricultural credit, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry with an amendment to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That it is the sense of the Senate that the President should appoint a task force on agricultural credit to examine agricultural credit problems, report to the President and Congress on the credit problems confronting agricultural producers and related businesses, and make recommendations for resolving any problems that are identified.

SEC. 2. The task force should—

(1) identify and describe the components of the existing agricultural credit system;

(2) identify and describe the credit needs of agricultural producers and related businesses;

(3) evaluate the ability of the existing agricultural credit system to meet the credit needs of agricultural producers; and

(4) develop, for the President and Congress, specific policy and legislative recommendations to ensure the availability of adequate agricultural credit at reasonable cost.

SEC. 3. The task force should have a balanced membership composed of not fewer than fifteen persons representing all major segments of agriculture, such as farmers, suppliers, marketing personnel, and lenders.

SEC. 4. The task force should prepare and transmit a report to the President and Congress containing a detailed statement of its findings and recommendations.

SEC. 5. The task force should submit its report as soon as practicable, but not later than January 1, 1985, and should terminate not later than twelve months after being established.

SEC. 6. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a copy of this resolution to the President.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I commend the distinguished Senator from Mississippi for his leadership in this and other efforts on behalf of our farm community.

There is no doubt that many farmers and agri-businessmen are facing financial difficulty, most through no fault of their own. I am sure every Member in this Chamber is sympathetic to these problems and would support any reasonable effort to provide meaningful assistance.

However, Mr. President, the avenues open to the Congress and others to deal with the stresses occurring in the agricultural economy are far from clear. Wide differences of opinion exist among those involved with agriculture as to what are the most effective means to help producers and agricultural businesses with their credit problems.

The Federal Government is involved directly with agricultural credit through the Farmers Home Administration. This agency is supplying an ever increasing amount of capital to our farmers and is an integral component in insuring that their agricultural credit needs are met. However, FmHA is by no means the sole credit source, or even the largest. This fact seems to be lost on many who claim that radical changes in the policies of this agency would provide a panacea for all of our troubles in the farm economy.

This administration has a policy of "going the extra mile" with troubled borrowers and through liberal use of the various servicing authorities of FmHA, has been able to keep many producers in business who otherwise would be forced to liquidate. Last year, over 65,000 servicing actions including deferrals, reschedulings, reamortizations, and consolidations were made on behalf of FmHA borrowers. I commend this effort and want to insure that this Agency has every reasonable tool to assist our farmers who use FmHA for credit. Recent legislation enacted by Congress made several significant contributions to this effort which I believe will prove quite helpful to FmHA borrowers experiencing temporary difficulty because of last summer's drought and other causes not under their control.

However, Mr. President, FmHA provides only about 12 percent of our Nation's credit for agriculture. The Farm Credit System, commercial banks, insurance companies, and private individuals provide essential sources of capital for all segments of the farm community. These lenders have been able to meet, for the most part, the credit needs of our farmers. Now, it is apparent from information from these lenders and other sources that a careful, comprehensive review of the financial difficulties of American agriculture and recommendations to deal with them is necessary.

A task force, made up of representatives from all areas of agriculture including farmers, suppliers, marketers, and lenders would provide essential insights into our farm credit problems and what might be done to alleviate them. This report will be instrumental in guiding Congress and others in providing for responsible and adequate sources of credit to insure the continuation of this Nation's most basic industry—agriculture.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. President, I am pleased that the Senate is taking final action today on Senate Resolution 287, which calls on the President to establish a task force on agricultural credit. The task force would develop policy recommendations designed to insure the availability of credit to farmers at reasonable rates of interest.

The last several years have been most difficult for our Nation's farmers. The declining value of farm assets, high interest rates, and low farm income have combined to create a severe credit crisis for many farmers.

Although the farm credit situation has been deteriorating for several years, the administration has refused to take timely measures to improve conditions. Each day the administration allows to pass without applying some remedy, it becomes that much more difficult to reverse the trend.

INDICATORS OF THE ADMINISTRATION'S POLICY FAILURES

The threat of foreclosure is the most serious and demoralizing aspect of the current depressed agricultural economy. Although some would say that the media has sensationalized the financial problems of farmers, I believe there is an abundance of evidence to support the headline on a story that recently appeared in one of the newspapers in my State: "Losers are long gone; now it's good farmers going under."

During the last 2 years, over 15,000 farmers with Farmers Home Administration (FmHA) loans have been forced to liquidate their operations for financial reasons. In overseeing record numbers of farm liquidations since 1981, FmHA has taken over 2,200 farms into its inventory. Prior to the current administration, the number of farms held by FmHA had never exceeded 260. The farms held by FmHA consist of about 488,000 acres having a value of several hundred million dollars.

I have written the Comptroller General asking him to investigate the procedure and policies used by FmHA to manage this enormous amount of farmland. It is clear that FmHA cannot put the property up for sale because that would further depress the value of farm assets. However, the agency is poorly equipped to manage the large number of farms in the agency's inventory.

FmHA borrowers are not the only farmers experiencing difficulty. In 1983, the Farm Credit Administration reported that Production Credit Association (PCA) loan losses for the previous 3 years exceeded the combined losses for the preceding 47 years.

In his annual report to Congress, submitted in February of this year, the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration said that PCA's in 1983 were "subject to the worst financial pressure since the 1930's. The estimated $240 to $250 million in losses sustained by PCA's in 1983 represents, in 1 year, approximately 40 percent of all losses throughout their 50-year existence." Further, the report stated that the system "will likely face more difficulty in 1984 than in 1983."

In addition, a survey conducted by the Independent Bankers Association of America found that, among its mostly rural member banks, the lenders expect that about 17 percent of their present farm borrowers will not be able to meet all of their loan payments in 1984.

A survey conducted by the agricultural division of the American Bankers Association found that nearly 66 percent of the bankers surveyed estimated that the net worth of their farm borrowers declined during 1983.

Department of Agriculture official forecasts confirm the fears of many agricultural lenders that farmers will have difficulty making their loan payments during 1984. A report issued on March 1, 1984, by the Department states that farmers can expect increased cash flow problems during 1984 due to an expected drop in net farm cash income from the 1983 level that could be as steep as 16 percent.

ACTION BY CONGRESS NEEDED

Earlier this year, I outlined an agenda for action that should be taken by Congress this year to meet the needs of the hard-pressed agricultural economy. Senate Resolution 287, calling for the establishment of a Presidential task force to study agricultural credit problems and make recommendations on policy changes, is one of a series of proposals I have developed or sponsored as part of that agenda.

My other credit proposals include the Emergency Agricultural Credit Act of 1984, which recently was enacted into law, and Senate Concurrent Resolution 99, legislation designed to curb the number of agricultural loans being classified as "problem loans" by Federal bank examiners.

The enactment of the Emergency Agricultural Credit Act of 1984 and favorable action today by the Senate on Senate Resolution 287 are steps in the right direction. However, I am disappointed that other actions on agricultural credit, needed for some time, have not been taken.

For example, existing law requires Congress specifically to reauthorize every 3 years, and set lending limits for, the FmHA farm credit programs, which provide family farmers with an essential safety net. Although the previous 3-year authorization under this requirement expired at the end of fiscal year 1981, a new 3-year reauthorization has not been enacted. Reauthorization legislation was reported by the committee during the 97th Congress (S. 2314) but was never considered by the Senate. No action has been taken on the matter during the current Congress and agricultural credit legislation was not mentioned in the committee's 1984 agenda, released on December 22, 1983, by the chairman of the committee.

It is my hope that the enactment of the Emergency Agricultural Credit Act of 1984 and the Senate's approval of Senate Resolution 287 are signs that the administration and Congress are beginning to take cognizance of the agricultural credit crisis, and that we will see further action on needed agricultural legislation in the coming months.

It must be said, however, that a major source of the credit problems facing U.S. farmers—high interest rates—cannot be easily dealt with in agricultural credit legislation. Any comprehensive solution to agricultural credit problems must include action by the administration to reverse the dangerous economic policies that threaten to perpetuate excessive interest rates.

LARGER ECONOMIC PROBLEMS ADVERSELY AFFECT AGRICULTURAL CREDIT

Beginning in the 1970's, we have seen what are normally considered financial and banking issues growing in importance to the agricultural economy. Prior to about 1970, farmers and agricultural lenders did not have to concern themselves with such things as the value of the dollar or the financing of the national debt. Today, those matters have a direct bearing on commodity prices and on interest rates, and thus on the profitability of farming and the financing of farm operations.

In the 1970's, farmers began to see that their ability to earn a living was directly related to our Nation's ability to export agricultural products.

More recently, the farm economy has been affected by another international event—the influence of foreign investment on U.S. interest rates.

According to the Congressional Budget Office, since 1981, the Federal deficit has gone from 2 percent of the gross national product to 6 percent. The burden on U.S. business and on agriculture caused by this crushing debt load has, so far, been lessened by the flow of foreign capital into the United States. Nearly half of the increase in the deficit has been directly or indirectly financed with funds from overseas.

Regarding the significance of financing the deficit with funds from overseas, in a report issued in February, the Congressional Budget Office said this:

> For now, foreigners seem willing to continue acquiring U.S financial claims, spurred by high yields on dollar assets and by optimism as to the economic and political stability of the United States. The longer-run outlook is less certain. Even if interest rates remain high, foreigners may hesitate to continue investing in U.S. assets if massive U.S. trade deficits make them fear a depreciation of the dollar, or if they grow concerned over U.S. fiscal policy. If the inflow of foreign funds were to cease because of such a lack of confidence, substantial upward pressure on domestic interest rates would result, intensifying the crowding out of interest-sensitive domestic expenditures and making it even more difficult for developing countries to service their dollar debts. Another consequence would be a depreciation of the dollar, imparting an inflationary impulse to the American economy.

Further, investment in the United States by foreigners is not limited to Treasury securities. Significant amounts of foreign funds are flowing directly into farm communities as a result of purchases by foreigners of farm credit system securities, issued to obtain funds for the system.

Farm credit system officials estimate that about 18 to 20 percent of the system's $70 billion in outstanding securities is held by foreign investors.

The Congressional Budget Office has issued a warning to the administration about the consequences of relying on foreign capital to finance the Federal deficit and meet other domestic credit needs. The following statement was included in another report recently issued by that office:

> Fortunately, very large capital inflows from abroad have so far limited the rise in interest rates. It should be emphasized that these capital inflows are not a costless remedy for deficits. If capital inflow continued for a long time, foreign claims on U.S. output (interest and dividend payments to foreigners) could rise to such a level that they would reduce the U.S. standard of living significantly below what it would be with less government borrowing and lower capital inflows.

It should be noted that the economic and political conditions that have attracted foreign capital to U.S. investments have increased the value of the dollar and hampered export sales. If the value of the dollar decreases relative to other currencies, as is necessary to improve export markets, foreign investors can be expected to withdraw their investments from the United States and interest rates will rise sharply.

It is evident, then, that the administration's fiscal policies are taking our Nation's farmers down a road to bankruptcy.

Because of already dangerously low profit margins, farmers cannot afford higher interest rates that would result if foreign investors withdraw their funds; nor can farmers continue to survive with annual decreases in the volume of farm exports due to the high value of the dollar.

Higher interest rates, in particular, would be devastating for our Nation's farmers. Few other industries are so sensitive to interest rates. Information provided by the Department of Agriculture illustrates this point.

In 1972, farm production expenses totaled $52.8 billion. In 1982, they totaled $140 billion. That represents a 165-percent increase in 10 years. During that same time, interest expenses for production went from $2.2 billion to $10.4 billion, an increase of 376 percent.

Also, total farm debt is currently about $215 billion. If the average interest rate on that debt was reduced by 2 percent, that would translate into over $4 billion in lower farm expenses. An additional $4 billion in net farm income would be almost a 15-percent increase over projected net from income for 1984 and that would be a significant difference for many marginal operators. Further, the Department of Agriculture estimates that each additional $1 billion in net farm income would generate 65,000 new jobs.

Of course, an increase in interest rates would have the opposite effect on farm income. In that regard, I will note that within the last several weeks, the prime rate of interest has been raised twice by the large banks.

It is clear the administration needs to take steps to reform its fiscal policies so that interest rates can be reduced without relying on foreign investment. Fiscal policies that would result in lower interest rates for an extended period of time would be an effective means of stabilizing the farm economy and improving farm income.

CONCLUSION

The many problems surrounding farm credit are complex and serious, and are related to other aspects of the national economy. Federal farm credit programs cannot address the weaknesses in the overall economy caused by the administration's bankrupt fiscal policies, but they must be adjusted to reflect the credit problems for farmers stemming from these policy failures.

These considerations provide a strong argument for the creation of a Presidential task force to analyze the situation and make recommendations on changes in agricultural credit policy, as provided in Senate Resolution 287.

A careful, unbiased examination of our Nation's agricultural credit industry and Federal agricultural credit policies will assist the administration and Congress in developing legislative remedies.

To enhance the credibility of the task force, the President should follow the precedent established with the formation of the Task Force on Social Security, as I have urged him to do. By working with Members of Congress to define task force objectives and in making appointments that represent the diverse groups involved with agricultural credit, the President will insure the objectivity of the task force. It would be a serious mistake for the administration to attempt to use the task force to justify discredited policies.

Also, it is important that the work of the task force be completed quickly. It has become clear to me that decisive action to meet agricultural credit needs cannot be delayed any further if we are to avoid irreversible injury to our Nation's family farm system of agriculture.

I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting the resolution.

I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the letter to the Comptroller General requesting an investigation of FmHA's farm management procedures be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC, April 26, 1984.

HON. CHARLES A. BOWSHER,
Comptroller General of the United States, General Accounting Office, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. BOWSHER: We are very concerned about the large number of farms that the Farmers Home Administration has taken possession of during the last three years as the result of loan foreclosures or other actions. We believe that the General Accounting Office should examine the agency's management of farm property that is in inventory and the procedures used to sell or lease that property.

Prior to 1981, the agency never held more than 260 farms in inventory at any time. It is our understanding that the Farmers Home Administration is currently in possession of over 2,200 farms valued at over 400 million dollars.

Congress never intended the Farmers Home Administration to be one of our Nation's biggest farm landlords. Further, the agency was created to assist family farmers with their credit problems and is poorly equipped to act as a real estate agent or manage hundreds of thousands of acres of farm land.

We request that you review this situation and provide us with your recommendations on any management improvements or revisions of policy needed to protect the substantial interests of the taxpayers and Farmers Home Administration borrowers.

Sincerely,

THAD COCHRAN,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Agriculture and Related Agencies, Committee on Appropriations.
EDWARD ZORINSKY,
Ranking Minority Member, Subcommittee on Agricultural Credit and Rural Electrification.
DAVID L. BOREN,
Member, Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.
WALTER D. HUDDLESTON,
Ranking Member, Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.
THOMAS EAGLETON,
Ranking Minority Member, Subcommittee on Agriculture and Related Agencies, Committee on Appropriations.
ALAN J. DIXON,
Member, Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I am happy the Senate has passed Senate Resolution 287, legislation I introduced requesting the President to establish a task force on agricultural credit. I think this action by the Senate indicates how broad the scope of the agricultural credit problem really is.

We face a very serious crisis on the farm unless something is done to improve the terms and conditions for obtaining operating funds. This crisis is not years away either, it has already begun to show signs of its presence. Farmers Home Administration currently is in possession of over 2,000 farms, but prior to 1981, it never held more than 260 in inventory at any time. This trend worries me considerably.

The current debt load farmers are trying to service is an enormous burden that is simply going to require time to reduce to a satisfactory level. Profits to the farmer just are not enough, even in the so-called good years anymore, to make substantial payments on outstanding debt. We use to refer to profits in farming as though they revolved around a boom to bust cycle. Today they seem to cover only a bust to get-by cycle. Because of the high capital requirements, losses during the bad years tend to be greater and greater while profits in the good years tend to be smaller and smaller.

One of the most important factors, if not the most important, in a successful farm plan is an adequate and reliable source of credit. I know of no other factor that will have any greater impact on the future direction of the structure of the farming industry. Without sufficient credit at reasonable rates and terms, farming, especially family farming, will have an uncertain future.

I urge the President to carefully consider the Senate's concern, as evidenced by the passing of this resolution, about the impact current credit conditions can have on farmers. I think it is imperative that the President appoint the task force requested by this legislation. I hope, in establishing the task force, the President will strive to insure its objectivity by making appointments that represent the diverse groups involved with agriculture. Every effort should be made to enhance the credibility of the task force because its recommendations will be directed at the largest industry in the United States—an industry that has the potential to contribute significantly to the recovery and maintenance of a healthy and growing economy in this country.

The amendment was agreed to.

The preamble, as amended was agreed to.

The resolution (S. Res. 287) and the preamble, as amended, are as follows:

S. RES. 287

Whereas agriculture is the Nation's most basic industry, and its associated production, processing, and marketing segments, together, provide more jobs than any other single industry;

Whereas United States agriculture is the world's most productive and the world's largest exporter;

Whereas it is in the Nation's interest to carry out an agricultural policy that will ensure an adequate, dependable supply of food and fiber at reasonable prices;

Whereas producers are the basic element in the food and fiber system and their ability to make a profit and meet their financial obligations is critical to their remaining in business;

Whereas technological developments have greatly increased the capital requirements of agricultural production;

Whereas agricultural-related debt has risen from $50,000,000,000 in 1970 to $215,000,000,000 in 1983;

Whereas a general decline in the financial condition of producers, as evidenced by increases in the average debt-to-asset ratio and debt-to-equity ratio, threatens the ability of producers to obtain the credit needed to continue their operations;

Whereas it is essential that producers be able to obtain adequate credit at interest rates conducive to debt servicing and profit making; and

Whereas the foundation of the Nation's agricultural system will be adversely affected if produers are unable to obtain a return on their investment that enables them to service their debt and continue their operations: Now, therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the President should appoint a task force on agricultural credit to examine agricultural credit problems, report to the President and Congress on the credit problems confronting agricultural producers and related businesses, and make recommendations for resolving any problems that are identified.

SEC. 2. The task force should—

(1) identify and describe the components of the existing agricultural credit system;

(2) identify and describe the credit needs of agricultural producers and related businesses;

(3) evaluate the ability of the existing agricultural credit system to meet the credit needs of agricultural producers; and

(4) develop, for the President and Congress, specific policy and legislative recommendations to ensure the availability of adequate agricultural credit at reasonable cost.

SEC. 3. The task force should have a balanced membership composed of not fewer than fifteen persons representing all major segments of agriculture, such as farmers, suppliers, marketing personnel, and lenders.

SEC. 4. The task force should prepare and transmit a report to the President and Congress containing a detailed statement of its findings and recommendations.

SEC. 5. The task force should submit its report as soon as practicable, but not later than January 1, 1985, and should terminate not later than twelve months after being established.

SEC. 6. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a copy of this resolution to the President.

AUTHORIZING THE USE OF THE ROTUNDA

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 107) authorizing the rotunda of the Capitol to be used from May 25, 1984, through May 28, 1984, for the unknown American of the Vietnam era to lie in state, was considered, and agreed to as follows:

S. CON. RES. 107

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the rotunda of the United States Capitol may be used from May 25, 1984, through May 28, 1984, both dates inclusive, for the remains of the unknown American of the Vietnam era to lie in state, and for appropriate proceedings and ceremonies in connection therewith.

AUTHORIZING THE PRINTING OF PRAYERS BY THE SENATE CHAPLAIN

The resolution (S. Res. 375) authorizing the printing of prayers by the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., as Chaplain of the Senate during the 97th Congress, was considered, and agreed to as follows:

S. RES. 375

Resolved, That there be printed with an appropriate illustration as a Senate document, the prayers by the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., the Chaplain of the Senate, at the opening of the daily sessions of the Senate during the Ninety-seventh Congress, together with any other prayers offered by him during that period in his official capacity as Chaplain of the Senate; and that there be printed such additional copies not to exceed $1,200 in cost of such document for the use of the Joint Committee on Printing.

SEC. 2. The copy for the document authorized in section 1 shall be prepared under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing.

AUTHORIZING THE PRINTING OF PRAYERS BY THE SENATE CHAPLAIN

The resolution (S. Res. 376) authorizing the printing of prayers by the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., as Chaplain of the Senate during the 98th Congress, was considered, and agreed to as follows:

S. RES. 376

Resolved, That there be printed with an appropriate illustration as a Senate document, the prayers by the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., the Chaplain of the Senate, at the opening of the daily sessions of the Senate during the Ninety-eighth Congress, together with any other prayers offered by him during that period in his official capacity as Chaplain of the Senate; and that there be printed such additional copies not to exceed $1,200 in cost of such document for the use of the Joint Committee on Printing.

SEC. 2. The copy for the document authorized in section 1 shall be prepared under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing.

GRATUITY TO CAROL JEFFERY TOLIVER, AND OTHERS

The resolution (S. Res. 377) to pay a gratuity to Carol Jeffery Toliver; Norman Lee Toliver; Marvin Lewis Toliver; Catherine Amelia Henderson; Ruth Louise Toliver; Mary Etta Samuel; Phyllis Jean Pelham; Alvin Windell Toliver; and Grace Ann Toliver was considered, and agreed to as follows:

S. RES. 377

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay, from the contingent fund of the Senate, to Carol Jeffery Toliver; Norman Lee Toliver; Marvin Lewis Toliver; Alvin Windell Toliver, brothers of James R. Toliver and Catherine Amelia Henderson; Ruth Louise Toliver; Mary Etta Samuel; Phyllis Jean Pelham; and Grace Ann Toliver, sisters of James R. Toliver, an employee of the Senate at the time of his death, a sum to each equal to one-ninth of five months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

GRATUITY TO RUTH M. FIRSHEIN

The resolution (S. Res. 378) to pay a gratuity to Ruth M. Firshein, was considered, and agreed to as follows:

S. RES. 378

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay, from the contingent fund of the Senate to Ruth M. Firshein, widow of Benjamin H. Firshein, an employee of the Senate at the time of his death, a sum equal to nine months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

GRATUITY TO ERIC SWANSON AND KRISTAN BOOTH

The resolution (S. Res. 379) to pay a gratuity to Eric Swanson and Kristan Booth, was considered, and agreed to as follows:

S. RES. 379

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay, from the contingent fund of the Senate, to Eric Swanson, son of Ruth B. Swanson and Kristan Booth, daughter of Ruth B. Swanson, an employee of the Senate at the time of her death, a sum to each equal to one-half of seven and one-half months' compensation at the rate she was receiving by law at the time of her death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

GRATUITY TO PATSY L. FUNK

The resolution (S. Res. 380) to pay a gratuity to Patsy L. Funk, was considered, and agreed to as follows:

S. RES. 380

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay, from the contingent fund of the Senate, to Patsy L. Funk, daughter of Thomas L. Maloney, an employee of the Architect of the Capitol assigned to duty on the Senate side of the Capitol grounds at the time of his death, a sum equal to six months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

GRATUITY TO WALTER M. STICKELL

The resolution (S. Res. 381) to pay a gratuity to Walter M. Stickell, was considered, and agreed to as follows:

S. RES. 381

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay, from the contingent fund of the Senate, to Walter M. Stickell, widower of Rita L. Stickell, an employee of the Senate at the time of her death, a sum equal to six months' compensation at the rate she was receiving by law at the time of her death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

GRATUITY TO LAURA DUDLEY PAGE

The resolution (S. Res. 382) to pay a gratuity to Laura Dudley Page, was considered, and agreed to as follows:

S. RES. 382

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay, from the contingent fund of the Senate, to Laura Dudley Page, widow of Stanley H. Page, an employee of the Senate at the time of his death, a sum equal to four months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

GRATUITY TO DANIEL T. FOLEY, MAUREEN C. CANNY, AND EILEEN P. TWIGG

The resolution (S. Res. 383) to pay a gratuity to Daniel T. Foley, Maureen C. Canny, and Eileen P. Twigg, was considered, and agreed to as follows:

S. RES. 383

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay, from the contingent fund of the Senate, to Daniel T. Foley, brother of Joan V. Foley and Maureen C. Canny and Eileen P. Twigg, sisters of Joan V. Foley, an employee of the Senate at the time of her death, a sum to each equal to one third of seven months' compensation at the rate she was receiving by law at the time of her death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the several items were passed and/or agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, that concludes my list of routine items to be disposed of this evening.

THE EL SALVADOR ELECTIONS

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, El Salvador is scheduled to hold Presidential elections next Sunday, May 6. Based on some disquieting events of the last several weeks in that country, I believe strongly that the elections should be postponed until the conditions exist for a fair and workable electoral system. Furthermore, I have written to President Reagan and asked that the U.S. Ambassador to El Salvador, Mr. Thomas Pickering, be recalled immediately.

It is essential that Mr. Pickering be recalled before the elections on Sunday, if those elections are to have any credibility, either in El Salvador or in the United States. Ambassador Pickering has consistently taken actions in support of one candidate, and has thereby attempted to manipulate the electoral process in unwarranted interference in the internal affairs of a sovereign nation. It is an open secret that Mr. Pickering demanded that Provisional President Magana veto the Constituent Assembly's plan to return to a more viable election system.

Mr. President, the first round of voting last month in El Salvador demonstrated courage and enthusiasm on the part of the voters; but, chaos and disorder reigned in the actual procedure. It is tragic but true that an estimated 300,000 people who voted in the March 1982 elections were not able to vote on March 25, 1984. About 10 percent of the people who lived in areas where the Marxist guerrillas were in a position to prevent voting, could not vote; and about 20 percent of those who showed up at the polls were unable to vote due to the complicated and deeply flawed system. For example, people were given incorrect information about where to vote; some places never received any ballots at all; and voter registration lists for whole cantons were lost. Toward the end of the day, some of the counterproductive procedures had to be relaxed in many areas.

Mr. President, after the first round it became apparent that the computer system—imposed and implemented by the U.S. Agency for International Development, and paid for by the U.S. taxpayers—needed to be either corrected or eliminated for the second round of voting. In the Legislative Assembly, the elected representatives voted to do just that. It was agreed upon that the incomplete and inaccurate voter registry lists would not be used again; rather, the voter would be able to cast his vote by showing his voter identification card, and by dipping his finger in indelible ink.

Last week, Provisional President Magana surprisingly vetoed the measure after he had declared that he would do so only if he found the new law to be unconstitutional. There is reason to believe that President Magana was forced into making such a decision. He did not find the measure to be unconstitutional; rather, he stated unconvincingly that all the irregularities, and inaccurate voter registry lists of the first round would be corrected. Now, just a few days before the final round, the incomplete and inaccurate registration lists remain unchanged. This means that most of the Salvadorans who were not able to exercise their constitutional right 1 month ago will once again be left out of the decisionmaking process. In El Salvador there are approximately 1.4 million elegible voters; it is not insignificant that about one-fifth of those voters will be precluded from voting, because of procedures that cannot be implemented in that war-torn country.

Mr. President, at the highest levels of this Government, the United States has declared that it is neutral in the Salvadoran elections. Yet hardly a day goes by where we do not find the Washington Post or the New York Times quoting an unnamed high level source saying that the United States would clearly prefer a victory by the moderate Jose Napoleon Duarte. These same sources are notorious for influencing public opinion by telling the liberal press that Duarte is the only candidate who would be able to bolster the U.S. Congress to supply the necessary funds to El Salvador.

Mr. President, I am convinced that precisely the opposite is true. If the U.S. Embassy is allowed to throw the Salvadoran elections to the socialist candidate, it is doubtful if either developmental or military assistance will be approved by the U.S. Congress.

OTHER INCIDENTS

I am deeply concerned, Mr. President, about other reports indicating that the State Department has not remained neutral during the political campaign in El Salvador. For example, there is the very reliable report of the incident that occurred in the department (State) of Sonsonate, where Mr. Timothy Howard, Third Secretary of the U.S. Embassy, arrived by helicopter to meet with officials of one political party to tell them that the United States would not support their candidate. I have received numerous reports from Salvadoran citizens who say that they have been told, or led to believe, that only Mr. Duarte would be able to have the full support of the U.S. Government.

Mr. President, there are still other reports indicating that the U.S. State Department has bent over backward to facilitate a Duarte victory in El Salvador. It is known that Mr. Pickering went so far to meet with the candidate of a major party to pressure him to withdraw from the race. After the first round of voting, Mr. Pickering also met with Jose Francisco Guerrero, who placed third, to tell him that the United States wanted him to remain neutral in the final round of balloting—an obvious move to favor Duarte.

THE IMPACT

Mr. President, the immediate impact of the interference of the U.S. State Department is obvious. By forcing President Magana to veto the election plan, the desire of the majority of the constituent assembly was thwarted; the elections will be carried out without a complete or accurate voter registration list; the whispering campaign by certain U.S. officials has intimidated the Salvadoran voters; and finally, there have already been reports in the Salvadoran press of fraud by the Christian Democrat Party in several zones—they were caught with polling boxes in their possession before election day. What will be the long-term result of all this? Will we find one more socialist country in the Western Hemisphere, and one more pawn of the Soviet Union at our doorstep?

A U.S. ENDORSEMENT

Mr. President, the scenario is all too clear. The United States has subtly, yet effectively, endorsed one candidate, Jose Napoleon Duarte, a leftist, even by Salvadoran standards. The U.S. media have managed to confuse the American people by failing to report the accurate facts about Mr. Duarte and the Salvadoran Christian Democrat Party. One need only look back to 1979 when Duarte and his other socialist allies ran El Salvador in a U.S.-sponsored junta. Duarte effectively destroyed El Salvador politically, socially, and economically in just 2 short years.

Mr. President, I remind my colleagues that it was Jose Napoleon Duarte who systematically imposed socialist reforms when he succeeded Guillermo Ungo as head of the Salvadoran junta in 1980. Duarte enthusiastically carried out the socialist land reform scheme created by the U.S. State Department. Duarte nationalized all private banks in order to give the central government control of all credit. Duarte nationalized significant parts of the export sector, which caused enormous losses, unprecedented corruption, and a serious further decline in foreign exchange earnings.

It will be worthwhile to examine the record. The facts, as I shall demonstrate, show that Duarte was and is the compliant agent of a network of international forces ranging from the Socialist International, to international banking groups, to left-wing foundations and media in the United States and Europe, all of them seeking to impose socialism in Central America.

DUARTE'S POLICY OF NEGOTIATION

Mr. President, President Reagan has stated a clear policy of not negotiating with the Marxist-Leninist groups in Central America, whether they be guerrillas or illegitimate regimes. Yet Mr. Duarte—and his party, the Christian Democrats—seem to have a special kinship with the leftists in the region. Last year in an interview, Duarte stated that if he lost the Presidential elections he might be forced to go to the hills and fight with the Marxist guerrillas. Then, on January 13, 1984, in an article in El Salvador's largest newspaper, Diario de Hoy, the second ranking member of the Christian Democrat Party, Julio Adolfo Rey Prendes, said, "We do not need to crush the enemy, we need to integrate him." The enemy of which he speaks is, of course, the Marxist-Leninist guerrilla organizations attempting to seize political power by violent revolution, and backed by the Soviet Union and its surrogates.

Mr. President, more recently Mr. Duarte made an even more significant announcement. On April 21 of this year, Drummond Ayres of the New York Times reported that Duarte asked two U.S. Senators to take a message with them to the Marxist-Leninist Sandinista dictatorship in Nicaragua. Duarte had his emissaries inform the Sandinistas that if he became President in El Salvador, he would seek negotiations with their regime. This, of course, should come as no surprise to those who remember that the political front man for the Salvadoran guerrillas, Guillermo Manuel Ungo, was Duarte's running mate in the 1972 elections. Statements such as these indicate that Duarte would once again share power with his socialist and Marxist allies, regardless of the fact that they are linked to the aggressive designs of the Soviet Union and its satellites in this hemisphere.

Consider a recent statement by Mr. Ruben Zamora, an active member of the Christian Democrat Party for more than 12 years, now a Salvadoran guerrilla leader. An April 24 Baltimore Sun article written by John Lantigua quotes Zamora: "In private he tells people he is willing to negotiate with us." It should be noted that guerrilla violence increased more under the Duarte junta than during any other period. And this Senator is one who cannot and will not support sending large sums of money to a country that insists on a plan to make a deal with the Communists.

DUARTE AND COMMUNITARIANISM

Mr. President, in his own book "Comunitarismo Para Un Mundo Mas Humano (Communitarianism for a More Human World,)" Duarte simplistically attacks the American system. He states:

Capitalism is not acceptable because it considers the individual to be in a struggle against collectivity . . . preaches the predominance of the individual . . . is based on the indifference of the State toward human truth . . . and has created a structure of antagonistic classes fomenting a conception that permits the preponderance of a dominant capitalist class, one that molds the conduct of the State anti-socially, and feeds on the misery and injustice of the exploited classes.

Many Salvadorans call Duarte's ideology undigested Marx.

Mr. President, we must not ignore what Mr. Duarte has said about private enterprise. On May 31, 1983, the Miami News carried a story written by Karen Stanley after a telephone interview with Duarte. The article reads:

Duarte criticized the Diario de Hoy's economic positions as "extremely right-wing, against the intervention of the State on any matter, and absolutely for private enterprise."Duarte said his Christian Democrats "believe that the State should be the director of society."

LINKS WITH SOCIALIST INTERNATIONAL

Mr. President, it is a fact that the Christian Democrat Party in El Salvador has a history of clear-cut links with the Socialist International, with the Salvadoran Communist Party, and with the various subversive groups in El Salvador. In 1971, the Christian Democrats formed a legal alliance with the National Revolutionary Movement (MNR), which is affiliated with the Socialist International, and with the National Democratic Union (UDN) which has been the politically front of the Salvadoran Communist Party. Together, this coalition participated in the 1972 elections. In 1979, the Christian Democrats alined themselves with the Revolutionary Popular Bloc (BPR), which is the mass political front of the Marxist-Leninist guerrilla group, the Popular Forces of Liberation (FPL).

Mr. President, when the Christian Democrats were in power—from 1980 to 1982, with Duarte at the helm—there were people in key government posts who are recognized as militant Communists. For example, Jorge Alberto Villacorta was the Secretary of Agriculture; he is now the spokesman for the guerrillas and operates out of Costa Rica. Hector Trujillo was the Ambassador to Germany, in spite of the fact that he was and is a member of the Revolutionary Democratic Front (FDR). Sergio Lama was the general consul in Santiago, Chile, and is the brother-in-law of the Salvadoran Communist Party head, Shafik Handal. In Mexico, Benjamin Guzman was named as cultural attaché, in spite of his direct participation in the Communist uprising of 1932.

During the Duarte junta, Roberto Castellanos Figueroa was sent by Duarte as Ambassador to Nicaragua, though he later resigned from his post as a protest, "because the Salvadoran oppressive regime is walking hand in hand with Yankee imperialism." Duarte's Ambassador to Italy was Avo Priamo Alvarenga, who was founder in the University of the Democratic Movement of the Left (MID), and was later a founder of the National Revolutionary Movement (MNR). This movement is now integrated with the revolutionary guerrilla forces.

Mr. President, we cannot ignore the fact that in the official U.N. speeches of El Salvador's current Foreign Minister, Fidel Chavez Mena, a high ranking member of the Christian Democrat Party, he defended the positions of the nonalined countries and defends the cause of the terrorist Palestinian Liberation Organization. These speeches can be found in the archives of the U.N., although I understand the Salvadoran newspapers refused to publish them because the speeches are considered embarrassing to the Salvadoran nation.

Mr. President, the links between the Christian Democrat Party in El Salvador, the Salvadoran Communist Party, and the Maxist-Leninist guerrilla organizations are real and definitive. Before the State Department meddles any further in the El Salvador election process, we should consider the consequences if the United States successfully forces a socialist victory in that country.

That is why I have urged President Reagan to recall immediately the U.S. Ambassador to El Salvador, Mr. Pickering. It is essential that this action be taken if next Sunday's elections are to have any credibility, either in El Salvador or in the United States.

All Americans agree that it should be a prime goal of our policy to support free and fair elections in El Salvador. But Ambassador Pickering has gone beyond that consensus, consistently taking actions which support only one candidate, and manipulating the electoral process in a way that can be considered only as unwarranted interference in the internal affairs of a sovereign nation.

El Salvador has suffered for years from persistent interference by the United States in its democratic process. Despite this, the Salvadoran people have continued to keep faith in democracy, even when, as after the Constituent Assembly elections in 1982, the obvious intent of the electorate and the numerical result were thwarted by U.S. diplomatic pressures to impose the unelected provisional President, Alvaro Magana, on El Salvador. Now, at a crucial moment in the electoral process, the U.S. Embassy has used this unelected provisional President as a tool to set aside the majority will of the elected Constituent Assembly.

There has been much talk about the "death squads" of the right and the left threatening the democratic process. I wrote to President Reagan on February 27 about that problem. As I stated in that letter:

> Mr. President, you and I are gravely concerned about such violence—wherever it happens and regardless of who is responsible for it. . . . Once we learn, beyond a reasonable doubt, that any individual or group is engaged in extra-legal "death squad" activity—whether from the violent left or the violent right, with whatever motivation—we must take the position as a nation that we will not countenance it.

The point is this, Mr. President: Violence can be directed not only against persons and property; violence can be done to the democratic process as well—and we must not countenance it there either. In his actions designed to rig the electoral outcome, Ambassador Pickering is the leader of the death squad against democracy. It is an open secret that Ambassador Pickering has met with electoral candidates in an attempt to influence their decisions, and that he demanded that President Magana veto the Constituent Assembly's plan to return to a fair and workable electoral system. The effect of this will be to cast doubt over the validity of the electoral process, and make the hope of social reconciliation infinitely remote. Mr. Pickering has used the cloak of diplomacy to strangle freedom in the night. He should be removed from the scene of the deed immediately.

It is clear that the consensus on foreign aid to El Salvador has failed in the Senate. The Foreign Relations Committee was unable to report out either developmental or military aid. If Mr. Pickering is allowed to throw the Salvadoran elections to the candidate of his choice, it is doubtful if either developmental or military aid will be approved by the U.S. Congress. In order to restore U.S. credibility, remove the appearance of U.S. partisanship, and maintain hope of social reconciliation in a troubled country, it is essential, in my judgment as chairman of the Western Hemisphere Subcommittee, to recall Mr. Pickering at once.

HISTORY OF U.S. INTERVENTION

El Salvador has become a case history of the destruction of a country through the means of U.S. assistance programs. Using foreign aid as a club, the U.S. State Department and the U.S. Embassy in San Salvador have constantly intervened in the internal affairs of El Salvador since 1962. This intervention has always been to push the country to the left, toward Marxist socialism.

In 1962, the United States insisted that El Salvador nationalize its central bank, nationalize the Salvadorean Coffee Co., adopt a system of price controls, exchange controls, high tariffs, strengthen left-wing trade unions, and install a burdensome "social security" system. The effect of the U.S. intervention was to slow down capital formation and economic growth, thereby making it more difficult to raise the standard of living for the poor of El Salvador. The U.S. Embassy also insisted upon a "progressive income tax" and the imposition of the highest property taxes in Latin America.

In 1965, the U.S. Embassy insisted that the Salvadorean Government tolerate the Communist takeover of the university there. The Embassy argued that by allowing the takeover, it would "contain" the subversive action. Of course, what it did was to give a base to subversion, strengthen the hand of the subversives by giving them a headquarters from which to operate. The U.S. Embassy even invited some of the Communist faculty members to go to the United States for Government-approved seminars.

Moreover, U.S. Ambassador Murat Williams was reported to be deeply involved in the organization of the Christian Democratic Party, the one that still remains the favorite of the State Department. His successor, Ambassador Raul Castro, was frequently heard to make disparaging remarks about the business and agricultural leaders of El Salvador; and Ambassador Ignacio Lozano was so obnoxious in his behavior, that then President Romero asked for him to be recalled even before Lozano took office. Ambassador Frank Devine was vocal in insisting that terrorists, who had been involved in violent crimes, were "political prisoners" and had to be released.

Ambassador Devine and Ambassador Bowdler openly worked with the opposition to overthrow the government of President Romero. They demanded that President Romero resign, and that new elections be called, even though the Salvadorean Constitution provided for election at regular intervals, similar to U.S. procedure. Assistant Secretary of State Viron Vaky and Ambassador Christopher van Hollen—who was only an inspector of embassies—made the same demands during visits to El Salvador.

Once the constitutional government of El Salvador was overthrown in 1979, a left-of-center military junta was installed with U.S. approval. On March 5, 1980, the unconstitutional junta suspended the constitutional rights of the people of El Salvador, and ordered the military to occupy the lands of the first properties targeted for "reform." Although it was widely publicized that "14 families" were responsible for controlling the country, the actual owners turned out to number in the thousands. The United States put $22.5 million into the land reform program in 1980, and $10.5 million in 1981. Legislative action by Congress put a stop to further funding in 1981 through direct action, but U.S. policy has continued to support the program ever since.

At the time of the destabilization of El Salvador by the United States in 1979, El Salvador was a model of economic progress for a developing country—contrary to the myths which are widely published today. Of course a "developing country" is one which by definition is one which is still moving forward. One would not expect to find progress evenly distributed. It is not in the nature of a free society that the fruits of progress are evenly distributed all at once. Only in a coercive society can everyone be forced to live on the same level. Yet even by every measure of redistributive thinking, El Salvador in 1979 stood head and shoulders above other developing countries in the region. Despite the lack of resources, and despite the burdens of high taxes and economically repressive measures demanded by the U.S. State Department, the strong work ethic which characterizes Salvadoran society was already paying off.

ECONOMIC PROGRESS IN EL SALVADOR—THE RECORD IN 1979

I submit that there is no evidence that the situation in El Salvador is one of economic oppression. It is well known, for example, that income distribution statistics in the United States show that the top 20 percent of American families receive 41 percent of the national income, and the lowest 20 percent get only 5.4 percent of the national income. Yet no one calls this oppression in the United States.

In El Salvador, the top 5 percent of the population received 24 percent of the national income, and the lowest 20 percent received 5.7 percent, according to the 1977 statistics of the OAS Economic and Social Council.

Moreover, the OAS figures for El Salvador look especially good compared to those for all of Latin America: The top 5 percent got 32.7 percent for all Latin American countries, and the lowest 20 percent got 3.7 percent.

Indeed, the situation has been improving rapidly, despite the efforts of the terrorists to wreck the economy. The minimum wage in agriculture has increased 37 percent between 1976 and 1979, and for those workers in seasonal crops, 77 percent.

The United Nations has an economic indicator called the Gini which measures concentration of wealth. For El Salvador, the Gini is 0.50, which the U.N. classifies as "moderate," comparing it with Argentina, Chile, Costa Rica, and Venezuela.

A recent World Bank study shows that in El Salvador, 20 percent of the urban population and 30 percent of the rural population live below the poverty line. Of course, as we have discerned in our own country, poverty lines can be manipulated by political interpretation.

But for all Latin America the figures are 43 percent as calculated by the ILO and 41 percent as calculated by ECLA—U.N. Latin American Economic Commission. So again El Salvador is doing far better than most, or, at least, it was until the Marxists began to move in and take over.

Indeed, the World Bank study shows a dramatic improvement in income distribution between 1965 and 1977, despite the rapid growth of population in El Salvador. Most of the increased distribution has affected the lower 40 percent of the people, incomewise.

As far as the tax burden is concerned in El Salvador, between 1971 and 1977, tax collections as a percentage of the GNP increased from 11 to 17 percent. This is one of the highest in Latin America. In 1962, direct taxes accounted for 28 percent of the revenues. In 1977 they accounted for 55 percent of the revenues. The indirect taxes, those which presumably affect the poor the most, decreased accordingly, from 71 percent in 1962 to 45 percent in 1977.

The myth has been perpetrated that the moderate-sized farms that were nationalized were exclusively in the hands of wealthy "absentee landlords" who did little or nothing to improve the productivity, or to better the lot of their workers. It was said that 78 percent of the land was in the hands of 10 percent of the landowners. But is such a "concentration" unjust? Those who cite it neglected to say that: "many of these landowners were corporations, such as we have in the United States, that have the capital to invest in long-range plans, and to provide greater benefits for their employees, precisely as it is in the United States. Moreover, the trend is slowly moving away from concentration, with the present level down from 83.8 percent in 1967."

But is such a system unjust? I doubt that many Americans would find it so, if they put it in an American context.

The Library of Congress states, for example, that in Illinois only 5 percent of the landowners own 57 percent of all the land; in North Carolina, the top 5 percent of the landowners own 69 percent of the land. Indeed, if we compare the total for the U.S. figures to those of El Salvador, we find that they actually exceed the concentration of land ownership in that country.

One should also compare the official statistics from the Natural Resources Economics Division, Economic Research Service, U.S. Department of Agriculture. The pattern of land ownership varies, as we might expect. In almost every State, less that 5 percent of the landowners own more than 50 percent of the land. In fact, the national average for the United States is that 75.1 percent of the land is owned by only 5 percent of the landowners. In fact, 48 percent of the land is owned by less that 1 percent of the landowners. That means that nearly one-half of the United States is owned by 1 percent of the landowners.

It should be emphasized, that this is 5 percent and 1 percent of the landowners, not the population as a whole. If the statistics were worked up on ownership as a percentage of the population, the results would be even more dramatic.

But what if you consider only farm and ranch land? The statistics show that over half of all U.S. farm and ranch land is owned by only 5 percent of the landowners—in fact 52 percent. Finally, 30 percent of the farm and ranch land is owned by 1 percent of the landowners.

The bottom line, is that 75.1 percent of the land in the United States is owned by 5 percent of the landowners, while in El Salvador the figures cited are 78 percent of the land owned by 10 percent of the landowners. So it is fair to assume that the situation is worse in the United States—providing we agree that such statistical analyses tell us anything about social justice. Perhaps we should have land reform in the United States before we impose it on hapless smaller nations.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that two tables illustrating these facts be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. HELMS. Furthermore, 61 percent of the land in 1979 was under cultivation in farms of less than 100 hectares. There was already a land distribution program in operation, which in 1978 awarded 8,300 hectares, and in 1979 awarded 36,200 hectares to cooperatives representing 5,000 persons. Unfortunately, the productivity of such distributions has declined.

Some persons have asserted that the concentration of land in the hands of a small group and the emphasis on exportation of agricultural products were responsible for the large part in the poverty in El Salvador.

Just the opposite is the case; in so far as national earnings were increased and have achieved better distribution, it was because of the earnings from agricultural exports. The notion that emphasizing exports somehow induces poverty is completely wrong. The fantasy that taking a nation back to stone-age socialism is progress is either the result of ignorance or of callous disregard for the sufferings of the poor.

Indeed, it is also wrong that exports were overemphasized. In 1978, basic food production increased 38 percent, making El Salvador self-sufficient in food.

It is often asserted that the most modern countries in the region are Costa Rica, Venezuela, Colombia, and Ecuador. Yet in the 1978 statistics published by the Inter-American Development Bank, that, to take just two significant indices of social welfare, El Salvador surpasses all of them in the percentage of governmental spending either for education, or public health, or both. Specifically, the figures are:

[In percent]

	Education	Public health
El Salvador	22.4	9.6
Colombia	13.2	6.6
Venezuela	13.6	5.2
Costa Rica	34.3	4.0
Ecuador	30.4	9.5

Similarly, although El Salvador has a tragic rate of infant mortality, it is no worse than most Third World countries, and, in deaths per thousand, is about the same as such relatively rich Latin American countries as Colombia, Venezuela, and Mexico, according to the LADB figures. When the statistics for deaths under 5 years due to malnutrition are examined, El Salvador is comparable to Argentina, Colombia, Brazil, and Mexico.

Despite this record of progress, a case could be made that an even better record could have been accumulated if there had been considerably less intervention by the government in the economic sector. The socialist measures which have been forced upon El Salvador by U.S. pressure have impeded progress, rather than encouraged it. Moreover, they have contributed enormously to the atmosphere of increasing politicization that has devastated political life in El Salvador, and encouraged terrorism. The first steps that should be taken should be the depoliticization of the economy of El Salvador. The most effective and efficient method for increasing the distribution of wealth is to remove political values from the system of destribution. Only a value-free economy can raise the standard of living of the poor.

But all of this was swept away—both by the economic terrorism imposed by the U.S. State Department, and the guerrilla terrorism of the left. The State Department aimed to sweep away the productive social structure through policies mislabeled "reform"; but the guerrillas went straight to the infrastructure which made an ordered society possible. Both contributed equally to the disaster.

NEGOTIATE WITH WHOM?

Mr. President, it is fashionable in some quarters to insist that the solution to the violence is to negotiate with terrorists. If this has ever been a solution, anywhere in the world, it has yet to come to my attention. Mr. Duarte's ties to the left are not ties to some indigenous fighters for social justice. On the contrary, they are tied to a very sophisticated Marxist-Leninist apparatus which is the result of a conscious program of exploitation of weaknesses and a carefully planned program of subversion.

When the U.S. press extolls the virtues of Mr. Duarte's erst-while political partner Guillermo Ungo, who now heads up the political arm of the Communist guerrilla movement, they conveniently ignore both the former close association between Duarte and Ungo, and Ungo's present role of putting a respectable front on the gang of leftist cutthroats and murderers who are trying to seize power.

When Reuben Zamora travels to the United States and is courted by press and universities alike, they fail to point out that he has a dual role as representative of a unit especially set up to disseminate foreign propaganda, and an actual guerrilla role in the terrorism.

There is, indeed, a very elaborate interlocking network, which was formalized and activated by Castro at a meeting in Havana in 1980. In order to see with whom negotiations might be carried out, I have pulled together the results of investigations carried out by my staff group assigned to this area. This information is based on field investigations and direct interviews in the region with appropriate experts.

EARLY SOVIET INFLUENCE IN EL SALVADOR

Mr. President, I am deeply concerned that in all the debates in Congress and in all the media coverage of the situation in El Salvador one central fact has been neglected. It is certainly no secret that the Soviet Union has been fomenting revolution in this hemisphere for almost seven decades. The strategic objective of the Soviet leadership to promote world revolution has been a central feature of international reality since the Bolshevik coup d'état in Russia in 1917. The question today, as it has been for most of this century, is what are we going to do to halt and to roll back Soviet global aggression?

Back in 1918, three Soviet agents—Guraski, Glabauf, and Kavanov—entered El Salvador to work with Esteban Pavletich to establish the first Communist cells in El Salvador. Subsequently, Salvadorans such as Luis Felipe Recinos, Enrique Conde, and Augustin Faribundo Marti entered the Communist Party network. Enrique Conde fled to Costa Rica after President Maximiliano Hernandez Martinez launched his campagin against the Communist uprising in El Salvador in 1932. Conde continued his subversive activities against El Salvador from his base in Costa Rica and worked closely with key Costa Rican Communists such as Manuel Mora Valverde.

The penetration of the labor movement worldwide has always been a standard Communist tactic. In 1922, the Central American Labor Confederation (COCA—Confederacion Obrera Centroamericana) was founded and was based upon the Communist Party sections and organizational structures in Central America. The Salvadoran group that became a member of COCA was the Regional Federation of El Salvadoran Workers (FRTS—Federacion Regional de Trabajadores de El Salvador).

In 1929, the Soviet Communist Party sponsored a meeting in Havana, Cuba, of the heads of the Communist Parties of Central America and the Caribbean. In this October meeting, the Soviets brought Faribundo Marti under stricter discipline. The Soviets viewed his plans for a revolution in El Salvador in 1929 as premature and wanted the Communist Party and supporters in El Salvador to take more time to work out the plans for a more detailed strategy and to make better preparations.

The Komintern organization based in Moscow had a number of delegates at this meeting. At the time, the Komintern had a special department for Central America and the Caribbean whose central objective was fomenting revolution in the region. The Komintern directors at the Havana meeting wanted the Communist uprising in El Salvador to commence on October 17, 1932, and worked with the Communist Party of El Salvador (PCS) to assist in the coordination of the Communist elements in the labor movement, the peasant movement, and even within the military. The PCS had the support of Communist front operations controlled by Moscow such as Red Aid International based in New York, the International Labor Federation based in Amsterdam, the Komintern organization based in Moscow, the Communist Congress of Buenos Aires, and the Latin American Labor Confederation based in Montevideo.

The Communist rising in El Salvador did erupt in 1932 as planned but under the strong leadership of President Hernandez Martinez it was suppressed. Today, five decades later, we are again confronted by a Communist onslaught backed by Moscow in El Salvador.

STRUCTURE OF THE SOVIET BACKED COMMUNIST FORCES IN EL SALVADOR

The principal directing organ of the Communist revolution in El Salvador is the Unified Revolutionary Directorate (DRU—Direccion Revolucionaria Unificada) which controls the military, diplomatic, political, and economic aspects of the revolution. Five organizations are represented in the DRU: The Communist Party of El Salvador (PCS), the Popular Forces of Liberation (FPL), the Armed Forces of National Resistance (FARN), the Revolutionary Army of the Poor (ERP), and the Revolutionary Party of Central American Workers (PRCT).

The Communist Party of El Salvador started to be organized in 1918 as I mentioned earlier. In 1925, the party took on a formal and overt character. In 1930, Faribundo Marti returned from abroad to El Salvador and became the Secretary General of the party and picked as his chief lieutenants Alfonso Luna and Mario Zapata. Two factions within the PCS developed during the 1960's. One was headed by Shafik Handel who allowed for penetration of the electoral process as tactic to achieve power. The other faction was headed by the late Cayetano Carpio and it emphasized violent armed revolution as the road to power.

In April 1970, the FPL was formed when the Cayetano Carpio faction broke away from the official Communist Party which remained in the hands of Shafil Handel. In August 1975, the FPL established a mass front organization called the Popular Revolutionary Bloc (BPR). This front was formed through a coalition of FPL supporters and primarily those groups organized by Father Bernard Bourlang, a French Jesuit priest. Three of the four members of the central command within the FPL National Masses Committee—Juan Chacon, Facundo Guardado, and Julio Flores—became the leaders of the BPR. A fourth member of the committee, Oscar Bonilla, became secretary general of AGEUS (Association of University Students of El Salvador). Both the BPR and AGEUS were housed in the same office in the National University of El Salvador. The clear cut Marxist-Leninist ideology of the BPR and AGEUS are revealed in their publications such as "Red Star," "Popular Combat," "Guerrilla," and "The Rebel."

The Revolutionary Army of the Poor (ERP) was formed in March 1972 by a number of members of the El Salvadoran Communist Party. Under the leadership of Joaquin Villalobos, the EPR has had close working relationships with several guerrilla organizations in Latin America including the Tupamaro National Liberation Movement of Uruguay, the People's Revolutionary Army of Argentina, the leftist Revolutionary Movement of Chile (MIR).

The mass front organization for the ERP is called the Popular Leagues of February 28 (LP-28) which has been concerned with propaganda, mobilization, and recruitment. The clear-cut Marxist-Leninist ideology of the ERP and its LP-28 is found in their publications such as "Proletariat Thought," "Communist Press," "Red Flag," "Wake Up Peasant," and "The Power is Born from the Gun." It is significant that an ERP member, Norma Guevara, was placed into a leadership position in the Communist supporting Salvadoran Commission of Human Rights.

The Armed Forces of National Resistance (FARN) was formed in 1975 after the assassination of an ERP member Enrique Dalton which precipitated a split in the ranks. FARN's former leader, Ernesto Jovel, was replaced by Ferman Cienfuegos after the former's death. Cienfuegos' real name is Eduardo Sancho.

FARN took over the Unified Popular Action Front (FAPU) which has been formed in 1974 by two Catholic priests, Higinio and Jose Inocencio Alas. FAPU has been especially close to the Union of Workers of the Salvadoran Institute of Social Security (STISS). The Marxist-Leninist ideology of FARN and FAPU are clearly identifiable in their publications such as "Pueblo" and "For the proletarist Cause."

The Revolutionary Party of Central American Workers (PRTC) was also spawned by the Communist Party of El Salvador. Its mass front organization is the Movement of Popular Liberation (MLP).

For its part, the Communist Party of El Salvador has operated through a mass front called the National Democratic Union (UDN) which was formed in 1970 and which participated in the 1972 and 1977 elections through a coalition of opposition parties known as the National Opposition Union (UNO). The UDN is composed of several Marxist-Leninist labor and peasant organizations including the salvadoran Workers Confederation (CUTS).

The labor laws of El Salvador require that 10 unions are necessary to form 1 federation and that 3 federations are necessary to form a confederation. The Communist Party of El Salvador controls three federations: the United Trade Union Federation of El Salvador (FUSS); the federation Union of Food, Garment, and Textile Industry Workers (FESTIAVTSCES); and the National Trade Union Federation of Salvadoran Workers (FENASTRAS). CUTS is the confederation in which these three federations are joined and it operates in close cooperation with the guerilla front organizations such as the BPR, LP-27, and FAPU.

THE UNIFIED REVOLUTIONARY DIRECTORATE (DRU)

In May 1980, at a meeting in Havana, Cuba, the Unified Revolutionary Directorate of the El Salvadoran revolution was formed at the direction of Fidel Castro as a precondition for larger scale Cuban aid. The DRU is composed of three representatives of each of the five major Communist organizations in El Salvador.

According to information reaching my office, the membership of the DRU is as follows. The members from the FPL are: Leonel Gonzalez (a pseudonym); Dimas Hernandez (a pseudonym); and the third name is unknown. The members from the ERP are: Joaquim Villalobos; Jorge Melendez; and Sonia Medina. The members from the FARN are: Ferman Cienfuegos (a pseudonym for Eduardo Sancho);

Oscar Armando Acevedo; and the third name is unknown. The members from the PRTC are: Roberto Roca (a pseudonym); Mario Lopez; and the third name is unknown. The members from the Communist Party of El Salvador are: Jorge Shafik Handal; Roberto Castellanos Calvo; and Mario Aguinada Carranza.

The DRU operates two key Commissions: The Commission for Finances (COFIN) and the Commission for International Relations (CORINTER). The Commission on Finances is composed of one member from each of the five organizations comprising the DRU. The head of the Commission is Farid Handal, the brother of Shafik Handal who is the head of the Communist Party of El Salvador. The mission of COFIN is to amass the financial support for the Salvadoran revolution from the international contacts. The Commission was located in Mexico City until late 1982 when the Mexican Government nationalized the private banks and the financial situation was unstable. COFIN was charged with handling the donations which came in the form of various currencies such as U.S. dollars, German marks, French francs, and so forth. The Commission then changed the foreign currencies into dollars for use inside of El Salvador by the DRU as well as for external purchases of arms. COFIN is now located in Panama taking advantage of the sophisticated network of international banking services in that country for the movement of moneys for the support of the Salvadoran revolution.

The Commission for International Relations, CORINTER, has had its base in Managua, Nicaragua, but now operates in a number of countries. Its offices in Mexico City are said to be the most important in terms of organizing international support and establishing logistical support for the Salvadoran revolution. The head of this Commission is Ferman Cienfuegos, whose real name is Eduardo Sancho. The delegate to CORINTER from the El Salvadoran Communist Party is reported to be Dr. Miguel Angel Saenz Varela.

In Costa Rica, the Salvadoran revolutionary complex maintains a similar operation to that in Mexico City. The head of this operation is reported to be Dr. Renan Rodas Lazo.

In Prague, Czechoslovakia, the Salvadoran revolutionary complex maintains an operation which interfaces with the Soviet Union and other satellite countries. The head of this office is reported to be Dr. Jorge Arias Gomez.

In Havana, Cuba, the DRU naturally maintains a key operational center whose head is reported to be Julio Cesar Salazar.

THE DEMOCRATIC REVOLUTIONARY FRONT (FDR)

Subordinate to the DRU is the Democratic Revolutionary Front (FDR) which was created in April 1980 to disseminate propaganda outside of El Salvador. The FDR is composed of the Revolutionary Coordinator of the Masses (CRM) which was formed in January of 1980 and the Democratic Front (FD) which was formed in April of 1980.

The CRM is composed of the overt mass organizations of the five Marxist-Leninist revolutionary organizations. The BPR is the mass organization for the FLP. The LP-28 is the mass organization for the ERP. The FAPU is the mass organization for the FARN. The MLP is the mass organization for the PRTC. The UDN is the mass organization for the Communist Party of El Salvador.

The Democratic Front is composed of organizations which do not take part in the armed military struggle on an overt basis. Three small political parties form the basis of the FD. They are the National Revolutionary Movement (MNR); the Popular Social Christian Movement (MPSC); and the Independent Movement of Professionals and Technicians of El Salvador (MIPTES).

Guillermo Ungo, the leader of the MNR which is a member of the Socialist International organization, is the head of the Democratic Revolutionary Front. It should not escape notice that Dr. Ungo went to Moscow during the 1960's to sign a cultural exchange agreement with Lomonosov University. He was representing the National University of El Salvador and traveled with its rector Dr. Fabio Castillo Figueroa. Dr. Castillo is the head of the Movement of Popular Liberation (MLP) which I mentioned earlier was the front organization for the PRTC which is one of the five Marxist-Leninist revolutionary organizations comprising the DRU.

According to information reaching my office, the Executive Council of the FDR is composed of one member from each of the eight organizations comprising the FDR. The BPR representative is Oscar Bonilla; the LP-28 representative is Galindo Marisol; the FAPU representative is Jose Napoleon Rodriguez Ruiz; the MLP representative is Fabio Castillo; the UDN representative is Dagoberto Gutierrez. The MNR representative is Guillermo Manuel Ungo; the MPSC representative is Ruben Zamora; the MIPTES representative is Eduardo Francisco Calles who acts as the vice-president of the FDR.

THE FARIBUNDO MARTI NATIONAL LIBERATION FRONT (FMLN)

Also subordinate to the DRU is the Faribundo Marti National Liberation Front which was formed in November 1980 to coordinate and execute the armed revolutionary insurgency in El Salvador. The FMLN is composed of the five Marxist-Leninist revolutionary groups which form the DRU. They are: the Communist Party of El Salvador (PCS); the Popular Forces of Liberation (FPL); the Armed Forces of National Resistance (FARN); the Revolutionary Army of the Poor (ERP); and the Revolutionary Party of the Workers of Central America (PRTC). The FMLN has a general command which integrates and coordinates the armed insurgency of these groups.

COMMUNISM IS THE ENEMY IN EL SALVADOR

Mr. President, as I said at the outset I am deeply concerned that the Congress and the media are refusing to come to grips with the central fact in El Salvador. That fact is that the Soviet Union directly and through its satellites and surrogates is fomenting Communist revolution at our very doorstep.

The facts about the Soviet thrust into El Salvador and the Soviet-Cuban orchestration and manipulation of the revolutionary forces in El Salvador are clear for all to see. The facts about seven decades of Soviet subversion in our hemisphere are available to anyone who would care to study them. It is inconceivable to this Senator that at this late hour these facts are not being recognized for what they are and that truly effective steps are not being taken to exclude the Communist menace from our hemisphere.

We must be absolutely clear that communism is the enemy in Central America whether it hides behind a Socialist face or whether it stands plainly out in the open for all to see.

Mr. President, there is no substitute for military victory over the Communist forces in Central America and there is no substitute for free enterprise to bring prosperity and a better life for all in the region. It is at our peril that we forget these fundamental truths.

Mr. President, in today's Washington Post there appeared an article by Roland Evans and Robert Novak which describes the activities of our Ambassador to El Salvador, Thomas Pickering, and the attitude of the U.S. Embassy in favor of Jose Napoleon Duarte. I ask unanimous consent that this important article be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUR MAN IN EL SALVADOR

(By Rowland Evans and Robert Novak)

SAN VINCENTE, EL SALVADOR.—The quiet glee of American diplomats that Christian Democrat Jose Napoleon Duarte seems certain to win El Salvador's May 6 presidential runoff would be restrained if they carefully weighed the opinion of an army captain operating in this guerrilla-menaced area.

"Duarte ruined this country before," he told us, referring to Duarte's tenure as unelected president. "My brother officers and I think it would be a disaster for our country for this to happen again." Concerns that Duarte will not pursue the war vigorously are commonplace in San Vincente Province and other areas bloodied by communist insurrection. That explains why Duarte's conservative opponent, Roberto D'Aubuisson, will win handily here.

Helped by a huge majority in the capital of San Salvador, however, Duarte looks like a certain winner nationally—with some forecasts giving him two-thirds of the vote. That cheers U.S. policy makers, who fear a D'Aubuisson victory would cause Congress to cut off military aid.

But Duarte has yet to instill confidence in Salvadoran businessmen and hard-line anticommunists such as the army captain here. They fear the Reagan administration favorite pursues a non-Reagan agenda of appeasing the communists and further socializing the economy. The danger is not an army coup, but deepening economic decay, political instability and the calamity of right-wing insurgency amid left-wing revolt.

Duarte has never more clearly been Washington's man in El Salvador. "Without any doubt," D'Aubuisson told us in an interview broadcast over the Cable News Network, "the American Embassy under Mr. [Thomas] Pickering [U.S. ambassador] has tended to favor the election of Mr. Duarte." Contact between the embassy and D'Aubuisson is now at the level of assistant political officer.

Unsubstantiated accusations linking D'Aubuisson to right-wing "death squads" are less at issue than war-fighting strategy. There is unofficial opinion within the embassy the guerrillas never could be overcome militarily by D'Aubuisson and that the only hope is that Duarte can draw the insurrection's more moderate leaders into the political process. That requires a Christian Democratic government clearly to the left.

Although the U.S. news media routinely call Duarte "moderate" (while stigmatizing D'Aubuisson as "far right"), the Duarte regime expropriated land, nationalized banks and socialized the coffee import business. Salvadoran businessmen believe these "reforms," much more than ravages of war and worldwide recession, are responsible for economic stagnation that between 1979 and 1982 saw the gross national product revert to the level of 1962.

Even some of Duarte's admirers at the U.S. Embassy hope he will consider proposals by D'Aubuisson's National Republican Alliance (ARENA) to reinvigorate the economy with private credit. Far from hoping for such market-oriented policies under a second Duarte administration, businessmen fear new expropriations. Their cautious optimism about this country's future we observed last summer has turned to gloom, deepened by what they considered D'Aubuisson's failed campaign.

By sticking to patriotic, nationalistic themes, D'Aubuisson has welded support in San Vincente and other endangered areas. We want to a rally for him here attended by leaders of all parties other than the Christian Democrats. But nationwide, he has built no such coalition, and his business backers blame him for not preaching economic growth and jobs under democratic captalism.

In contrast to his prior tenure when he treated businessmen with haughty contempt, Duarte recently sent an emissary to them offering a hand of friendship. It was made clear, however, that hand does not extend to Duarte's most prominent private-sector critics, adding to the air of foreboring.

The businessmen can head for Miami, further debilitating the economy. D'Aubuisson and friends can head for the hills, guns in hand. This would be no traditional military coup. The high command, liberally pepered with Christian Democrats, distrusts ex-Maj. D'Aubuisson and does not want to displease Washington.

But the bulk of the 28,000-man army likely would support D'Aubuisson, were it not for the fact that the high command does not let them vote. Their course may be determined by Roberto D'Aubuisson's conduct in defeat. "I believe in the sovereign will of the people," he told us, pledging adherence to the election. But he confides to friends he will become a Salvadoran "contra" if Duarte makes a deal with the guerrillas.

Campaign invective is now unrestrained, with mutual accusations of political murder and labels of "communist" and "fascist." That raises doubts whether a victorious Duarte can display true conciliation toward conservative views about prosecuting the war and encouraging the private sector. If he cannot, the election outcome long dreamed of at the State Department could yield bitter fruit for President Reagan's fight against communism in Latin America.

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE

SUBMISSION OF CONCURRENT AND SENATE RESOLUTIONS

The following concurrent resolutions and Senate resolutions were read, and referred (or acted upon), as indicated:

By Mr. BENTSEN:

S. Res. 385. A resolution urging continuation of tax deductibility of residential mortgage interest payments; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. HOLLINGS (for himself, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. WEICKER, Mr. NUNN, Mr. BOREN, Mr. LONG, and Mr. PERCY):

S. Con. Res. 109. A concurrent resolution expressing the sense of the Congress that the Federal Government take immediate steps to support a national STORM program; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. ANDREWS (by request):

S. 2619. A bill to extend programs under the Indian Education Act through fiscal year 1985; to the Select Committee on Indian Affairs.

EXTENSION OF INDIAN EDUCATION PROGRAMS

● Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a bill to extend the authorization for title IV, Indian Education Act programs through the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985, by request of the administration. This bill will allow the administration to begin planning the fiscal year 1986 budget for these programs, and will continue the programs for 1 more year.

During the coming months, the Senate Select Committee on Indian Affairs, which I chair, will be taking a look at a comprehensive reauthorization of the title IV programs, holding field hearings, and analyzing possible changes to the law. Based on what we learn, I plan to introduce a comprehensive, 5-year, reauthorization of title IV next session. For now, I agree with the administration's position that a 1-year reauthorization be made by Congress, so that planning for the fiscal year 1986 title IV budget can begin.●

By Mr. MATTINGLY:

S. 2620. A bill entitled the "Federal Reserve Reform Act of 1984;" to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

FEDERAL RESERVE REFORM ACT OF 1984

● Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, today I am introducing the Federal Reserve Reform Act of 1984. This legislation contains several provisions which would open the decisionmaking process of the Federal Reserve's monetary policy. However, the traditional relationship between the Federal Reserve and the Congress would be unchanged.

Specifically, the Federal Reserve Reform Act would accomplish the following:

First, the 4-year term of the Chairman of the system shall begin in February of the calendar year after the year in which the President's term begins. This would make the President's and the Chairman's terms concurrent except for a 1-year lag.

Second, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisors shall be made ex officio members of the Federal Open Market Committee. The Treasury Secretary was a member of the Federal Reserve Board for many years, until the 1930's. This provision would restore his or her earlier status and would also include the Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisors. In doing so, it would increase the input of the administration into the making of monetary policy.

Third, the terms of the seven members of the Board of Governors would be reduced from 14 to 7 years each. This would permit a somewhat faster turnover of the membership. However, a 7-year term would still provide continuity in policymaking, since it is longer than the terms of U.S. Senators, Presidents, or Congressmen.

Finally, the Federal Open Market Committee shall announce changes in its policy on the day the decisions are adopted. This provision would end volatile speculation in the financial markets due to rumors and uncertainty about Federal Reserve policy. Under current law, there is no requirement that decisions be published. By custom, a brief summary of FOMC proceedings is released a month or two after each meeting. The new provision would end this delay.

Mr. President, the Joint Economic Committee and Subcommittee on Economic Policy of the Senate Banking Committee, which I chair, will hold a joint hearing on Federal Reserve accountability. At that hearing, the Federal Reserve Reform Act of 1984 will be considered and discussed. This measure would modernize the Federal Reserve, bringing its practice of decisionmaking to the threshold of the 21st century.

Mr. President, I ask for the appropriate referral of this legislation.●

S. 2622. A bill to revise and extend title X of the Public Health Service Act, relating to family planning; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

FAMILY PLANNING AMENDMENTS OF 1984

● Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, today, Senator HATCH and I are introducing S. 2622, the proposed "Family Planning Services and Population Research Amendments of 1984."

The bill authorizes the continuation of the family planning services and population research program authorized under title X of the Public Health Service Act, with some changes, for an additional 2 years. The Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981, Public Law 97-35, extended the program for 3 years, until September 30, 1984. During the last 3 years, the Subcommittee on Family and Human Services has conducted six hearings on the title X program. As chairman of that subcommittee, I have had the opportunity to explore closely the implementation and administration of the programs authorized under title X.

I will say candidly that, unfortunately, hearings on the family planning program during the past 3 years have raised several serious questions about the way that federally funded family planning clinics operate. First, there is the widespread, as well as deeply held, view that some family planning clinics receiving title X funds are doing little to reduce the incidence of abortion. Second, I and many other parents have strong convictions that most adolescents should not receive "sexuality counseling" and prescription contraceptive drugs and devices from federally funded family planning clinics without the involvement of their parents. I am convinced that the bill that we are introducing today will help remedy these problems, even as it extends the title X program.

In 2 days of hearings held during this session, the subcommittee heard testimony from the administration, State officials, representatives of the family planning community, and concerned individuals about the continued need for family planning services to low-income families. Moreover, the subcommittee received suggestions about how we can make improvements in the family planning program. When combined with the findings of the five other hearings that the subcommittee has held in the last 3 years, the results of these hearings, I believe, point toward the formulation of several important changes in the title X program. As chairman of the subcommittee, I have joined the chairman of the full committee to introduce a piece of legislation that, I believe, both supporters and critics of title X will find acceptable.

What follows is an outline of the more important changes to the program contained in S. 2622.

First, the bill will contine to authorize the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services to make grants to and enter into contracts with family planning projects across the country. We know that the majority of women receiving family planning services under title X programs are poor and that the Federal Government can and should assist in making comprehensive voluntary family planning services available to those couples who otherwise might not be able to afford them.

In addition, the bill will establish two independent demonstration projects that will enable the Secretary to make grants to entities able to provide pregnancy testing and counseling and to entities able to help alleviate the problems of infertility.

Pregnancy testing is one of the most frequent reasons for an initial visit to a family planning facility. The current title X law makes no special provision for pregnancy diagnosis and counseling and it is time to codify and emphasize the importance of these services.

Likewise, involuntary childlessness is a problem which affects a growing number of couples. Yet, comprehensive infertility services are still beyond the reach of most average- and low-income couples, because of the complexities and high costs of diagnosis and treatment.

Although all title X grantees are required by law to make basic infertility services availabe to clients, they have been cautioned by regulations to exercise great care in budgeting for infertility services. Title X grantees, however, have a good basic capacity suitable for expanding infertility care to low- and middle-income couples. Again, the time has come to provide permanent statutory incentives to those clinics willing to provide higher levels of infertility services.

As a part of the continuation of current family planning grants and the establishment of demonstration projects in pregnancy testing and counseling, the new law will establish basic guidelines for patient counseling. In the sensitive area of human sexuality, government agents and grantees must exercise extreme care when offering advice or direction to patients.

The title X act should spell out clearly that individuals requesting services are entitle to information on the risks and benefits of all methods of pregnancy prevention. Furthermore, if the individual is pregnant, she should be presented with the courses of action that she may take on her own initiative, including the benefits and services available to her in carrying the fetus to term, and in raising and caring for the child or in placing the child for adoption.

Second, the bill will repeal the unused section of the law which permits formula grants to States for family planning.

Third, the bill will expand the section in the law which permits the Secretary to provide funds for training personnel to include the training of obstetric-gynecological nurse practitioners, educators, and counselors. This expansion of the training authority will be particularly important as it relates to the establishment of the demonstration projects in infertility and pregnancy testing and counseling.

Fourth, the research provisions of the law will be modified to specify that research in infertility and natural family planning methods is permissible. In addition, it will clarify that research in program implementation intended to improve the management and delivery of family planning services is permissible.

Fifth, in line with the family involvement amendment passed in 1981, the bill will place special emphasis on the production of family planning educational materials that emphasize the role of the parents in transmitting values of family life and sexual responsibility.

In 1981, the subcommittee held a hearing that focused on education curricula produced under title X. The material was critiqued by mental health professionals on the basis of educational merit, appropriateness for the designated age groups, psychological implications, and overall quality of both content and design. The witnesses raised serious concerns about the appropriateness and the quality of the curricula. Based on these findings, we have added a language to the information and educational materials section of title X to prohibit the production of curricula designed for use in public elementary and secondary schools.

Sixth, with regard to the regulations and payments section of the law, the bill we are proposing will continue to guarantee that unemancipated minors will not be denied services on the basis of economic status, but that the financial base of parental support and the discretionary income of the teen will be considered in determining the amount of subsidy that the Federal Government will provide. There are large numbers of low-income adult women who are in need of subsidized family planning services. In a time of budget constraints, we need to be particularly concerned that we are not diverting resources away from those least able to bear the cost of family planning services.

Seventh, the bill will provide two subsections to reassert the principles embodied in the "conscience clause" amendments adopted in the past to govern all programs authorized by the Public Health Service Act. Together, these clauses would assure that the Secretary could not require a grantee or an individual to advise regarding, refer patients for, or provide, particular birth control methods, abortion or sterilization procedures when such activity would be contrary to the religious or moral principles of either the grantee or the individual.

Eighth, the legislation will place a strong prohibition against any funds being used to promote, encourage the use, refer for, or provide abortion as a method of family planning. The General Accounting Office, in its 1982 report entitled, "Restrictions on Abortion and Lobbying Activities in Family Planning Programs Need Clarification," made the following recommendations:

> We recommend that the Secretary establish clear operational guidance by incorporating into the Title X program regulations and guidelines, HHS' position on the scope of the restriction in section 1008; and,
> In doing so, we recommend that the Secretary consider the grantee practices discussed in this report and in the Inspector General's reports with a view toward providing as explicit guidance as possible on the activities that are and are not allowed.

No official guidelines governing the separation of nontherapeutic abortion activities have been published by the administration and no steps have been taken to implement the recommendations made by the General Accounting Office. It is painfully obvious, however, that some grantees are currently performing abortions on the same site as the family planning clinic. Furthermore, many title X grantees are actively involved in encouraging and promoting the use of nontherapeutic abortion as a method of family planning. This is not what Congress intended when it created the title X program in 1971, nor should we countenance such behavior after rejecting direct Federal funding of abortions year after year. Our national policy on this issue must be consistent and clear.

Ninth, the bill will specify that the Secretary has the duty to collect annual data on the number of individuals served, the types of services chosen, and the sources of funding for subsidized family planning.

Tenth, we will add a provision to the law that would permit the States to establish their own policies with respect to the provision of services to minors. The State of Utah was declared ineligible for the receipt of all title X funds because its State legislature passed a law requiring parental notification before an adolescent could receive contraceptives. The sovereign States ought not face a loss of vital family planning funds on this basis.

Finally, Mr. President, the bill will establish authorization levels indicated by a chart that I ask be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the chart was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[In millions of dollars]

	Fiscal year—
	1984 appropriation (estimated)	1985 authorization proposed under S. 2622	1986 authorization proposed under S. 2622
Family planning project grants	133.0	136.0	142.0
Training	3.1	3.25	4.250
Information and education	.53	.63	.690
Infertility projects		3.0	5.0
Pregnancy testing and counseling projects		1.0	1.5

LEGISLATION DEALING WITH INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, today, I am joined by the distinguished ranking minority member of the Judiciary Committee, Senator JOSEPH R. BIDEN, JR., and the able chairman of the Subcommittee on Security and Terrorism, Senator JEREMIAH DENTON, in introducing, on behalf of the administration, four bills dealing with international terrorism.

During the last two decades, the methods used to change governments and public policy have become increasingly violent. A compilation of information on terrorist activity in the United States by the Federal Bureau of Investigation shows that acts of terrorism committed in the country during 1983 included bombings, an assassination, arson, as robbery, and a rocket attack, Of equal importance is the fact that those who use violent and life-threatening means have shown that no place in this country is safe from such lawlessness. This stark reality was brought home to the Members of this body by the November 7, 1983, bombing here in the U.S. Capitol Building by the so-called "Armed Resistance Unit."

While these violent acts have in the past almost always been perpetrated by organizations or cadres operating without offical support, a new and extremely worrisome brand of terrorism has begun to surface. This new strain of terrorist activity, called official or state terrorism, consists of acts of violence that have either the direct or indirect support of a national government. As pointed out by President Reagan in his message accompanying the four bills which I am introducing today, state terrorism accounts for the great majority of the terrorist murders and assassinations which have occurred around the world in recent months. The senseless bombing of the U.S. Marine barracks in Beirut, Lebanon, which took the lives of over 250 American servicemen, is a prime example of such state-supported terrorist activity.

Another more recent example of government-sanctioned terrorism occurred only last month when a London police officer was killed by a gunman who opened fire on an anti-Libyan student demonstration. The perpetrator of this wanton act was given refuge in the Libyan Embassy and eventually allowed to leave Britain with impunity because he was protected by the diplomatic immunity accorded representatives of the Libyan Government.

While the aims of some of the organizations who are responsible for acts of violence may have some merit, the means which they have chosen to enable them to reach those goals are immoral and cannot be condoned. We must, however, do more than simply deplore acts of terrorism which often kill or maim innocent people. As members of the National Government, it is our responsibility to take every step necessary to ensure that American citizens, wherever they may be, are kept as free from the threat of terrorist attack as is humanly possible. Our citizenry must have this security when they travel outside this country, as well as when they are at home.

Accordingly, the administration has formulated a package of proposed legislation designed to accomplish several things. First, two of the four bills introduced today will implement international accords militating against the taking of hostages and affecting the safety of civilian aircraft. The United States has previously ratified the Montreal Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Civil Aviation dealing with terrorist acts such as air piracy and aircraft sabotage. However, specific legislation is needed to counter the increase in incidents of airplane hijacking because these actions jeopardize the lives of innocent persons, threaten the overall security of our Nation, and operate as a detriment to the smooth conduct of interstate and foreign commerce. Passage of this implementing legislation will bring this country into full compliance with the principles of this international accord both in this country and within our special aircraft jurisdiction.

The United States has also become a party to the International Convention Against the Taking of Hostages. However, since September 1981, the need for implementing legislation has prevented this treaty from being officially recorded. Needless to say, the taking of hostages—whether civilian, military, or diplomatic—is an offense against the rule of law among nations and places our national security in serious jeopardy. Approval of this measure will amend the Federal kidnaping statute so that it would apply to this common terrorist tactic. Enactment of this legislation will allow this country to meet its obligation to the world community to change its domestic law to make hostage-taking an offense against the United States.

A third measure would provide for the payment of rewards by the United States for information leading to the prevention of terrorist acts or the apprehension of persons having committed them, whether in this country or abroad.

The fourth proposal would make it a Federal offense to provide training, mechanical, logistical, or maintenance support to any international terrorist group or foreign government acting in support of terrorist activity.

Mr. President, the implementation of these measures will demonstrate to international forums and other members of the world community that the United States is serious about its efforts to combat international terrorism. I believe that these are important proposals necessary to bring us into the forefront of those nations committed to counteracting international terrorism. I strongly urge my colleagues to study these pieces of legislation and join in support of their prompt approval.

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I proudly join with my distinguished colleague from South Carolina, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, to introduce, on behalf of the administration, four bills to address the growing problem of terrorism.

Mr. President, we are seeing a disturbing and alarming trend in the use of terrorism. It is the direct use of terror by a number of sovereign foreign states. We have seen several examples of that state-sponsored and state-executed terrorism during just the past year: The bombing of our Embassies in Beirut and Kuwait, the bombing of the headquarters of the U.S. Marine peace-keeping unit in Beirut, and most recently the machinegun killing, by someone inside the Libyan Embassy in London, of a British policewoman and the wounding of 11 Libyans who were peacefully demonstrating against the Qadhafi regime. That act of terrorism was, according to recent press accounts, ordered by the Libyan Government.

In addition, state-provided training, financing, and logistical support for terrorists and terrorist groups is a profoundly serious and growing source of danger to the United States, and to our friends and allies abroad.

The legislative package proposed by the President complements and augments several pieces of antiterrorist legislation that I introduced earlier in this session: S. 2395, which would amend the Freedom of Information Act by providing an exemption for information relating to terrorism and foreign counterintelligence; S. 2469, the Anti-Terrorism Act of 1984, which would make terrorism a Federal crime and give the FBI primary investigative jurisdiction over the crime of terrorism; and S. 2470, the Anti-Nuclear Terrorism Act of 1984, which would give nuclear power reactor licensees access to the FBI's national criminal history files and thus enable licensees to check for criminal histories of potential employees who would have unescorted access to nuclear power facilities.

I want to outline the President's proposals:

ACT FOR THE PREVENTION AND PUNISHMENT OF THE CRIME OF HOSTAGE TAKING

In September 1981, the President signed the instrument ratifying the International Convention Against the Taking of Hostages, which was adopted by the United Nations on December 17, 1979. The convention has not, however, been implemented domestically through enabling legislation. This bill would implement the 1979 convention by amending the Federal kidnaping statute to provide for Federal jurisdiction over any kidnaping in which a threat is made to kill, injure, or continue to detain a victim in order to compel a third party to do or to abstain from doing something. When the President signed the instrument of ratification, the Congress was informed that the instrument of ratification would not be deposited with the United Nations until enabling legislation had been enacted. To demonstrate to other governments and international organizations that the United States is serious about its efforts to deal with international terrorism, it is essential that the Congress approve the enabling legislation required for our full implementation of the Hostage-Taking Convention.

AIRCRAFT SABOTAGE ACT

The United States became a party in 1969 to the Tokyo Convention, which covers certain offenses or acts committed aboard aircraft, and in 1971 to the Hague Convention, which concerns the suppression of unlawful seizure of aircraft. The Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Civil Aviation was adopted at Montreal in 1971 and ratified by the United States in November 1972. It requires that all states party to it establish jurisdiction over certain offenses affecting the safety of civil aviation.

The Congress has approved enabling legislation for the first two conventions, but not for the Montreal Convention. In consequence, certain criminal acts related to aircraft sabotage or hijacking are not adequately covered by U.S. law. The gap in the law sends a false signal to terrorists. It also indicates to other governments that we may not be as serious as we should be, and as in fact we are, in our efforts to combat international terrorism. Action by the Congress now would provide the basis for the long-overdue implementation of the Montreal Convention.

ACT FOR REWARDS FOR INFORMATION CONCERNING TERRORIST ACTS

Current law authorizes the payment of rewards for information concerning domestic crimes, but it is outdated. The maximum rewards are inadequate, and terrorism is not specifically included as a basis for paying a reward. Moreover, there is no authority for the payment of rewards for information about acts of terrorism abroad.

The proposed legislation, which is modeled on an existing statute that allows payment of rewards for information concerning the unauthorized manufacture of atomic weapons, recognizes that payment of a reward in connection with acts of domestic terrorism raises a matter of law enforcement that is properly within the jurisdiction of the Attorney General, but that the payment of a reward in connection with an act of terrorism abroad poses a political and foreign relations problem within the jurisdiction of the Secretary of State. By increasing the amounts of rewards that may be paid, and by authorizing rewards for information about terrorist acts committed abroad, the bill would markedly improve the ability of the Departments of Justice and State to obtain information leading to the freeing of hostages or the capture of the perpetrators of acts of terrorism. By passing this legislation, the Congress can further underscore the intent of the United States to take every appropriate and necessary step to protect its citizens and property from terrorist acts.

PROHIBITION AGAINST THE TRAINING AND SUPPORT OF TERRORIST ORGANIZATIONS ACT OF 1984

The training and support of terrorist groups and activities by a number of countries has reached alarming proportions. In addition, the increase in the number of states now using terrorism as an instrument of foreign policy is highly disturbing. Activities by U.S. nationals to provide assistance to countries that support terrorism and use terrorism as a foreign policy tool has thus become a matter of grave concern to our national security. This bill, together with revised and strengthened regulations that the Department of State intends to issue shortly, would enhance the ability of the Department of Justice to prosecute persons involved in the support of terrorist activities and of states using terrorism. Enactment of the legislation would be a strong contribution to the effort to combat terrorism.

The time has come, Mr. President, for the Congress to take forceful and effective measures against terrorism by passing the four legislative proposals as soon as humanly possible. In an effort to expedite that effort, the Subcommittee on Security and Terrorism, which I chair, has already scheduled a series of hearings on the bills. The first hearing will be held on June 5.

I believe it vital, Mr. President, that at those hearings we have a full and fair airing of the pros and cons of the legislation and make sure that we hear views from every responsible quarter. We certainly should not rush to judgment as the Washington Post did in its lead editorial on May 1 in which, without benefit of any hearings on the issues, it termed the President's package "Bad legislation" and an effort "to fight terrorism with hysteria."

One of the problems with the Washington Post editorial, Mr. President, is that it only addresses one of the four bills in the President's legislative package—the Prohibition Against the Training or Support of Terrorist Organization Act of 1984. The Post editorial completely ignores the three other bills in the package, two of which are enabling legislation for treaties to which the United States is already a signatory.

Instead of hasty and ill-considered reactions, like those manifested by the Post, the country deserves a dispassionate, objective review of the President's proposals. An editorial that appeared on April 24 in the Florence Times Daily in my home State of Alabama reaches the heart of the problem that we face by pointing out that, like other terrorists, Col. Qadhafi of Libya——

> Must be taught that the more civilized nations of the world will not tolerate his militaristic tactics. His threats must be countered with adequate protections. His actions must be reprimanded. His use of Embassies to carry out intimidation of his exiles must stop. His lawlessness must end or at least be confined within the borders of Libya.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the Times Daily editorial, entitled "Get Tough With Libyans," be printed in the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

I believe it vital, Mr. President, that after full and fair hearings we move the bills through committee and on the floor for action.

I urge all of my colleagues to lend their support to the four bills in an effort to weaken, if not eliminate, the growing threat posed by international terrorism.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GET TOUGH WITH LIBYANS

Britain has rightfully decided to end diplomatic relations with Libya.

Last week, an occupant of the Libyan Embassy in London poked a machine gun out the window and fired on a group of protesters. A policewoman monitoring the protest was killed. Ten other people were wounded.

British police surrounded the embassy. The killer remained inside, protected from justice by diplomatic immunity. The British government could not storm the embassy, because under international law permission of Libya is required before entry to the embassy is allowed.

At the same time, the Libya government put troops around the British Embassy in Tripoli. Later, those troops were removed. The police around the Libyan Embassy in London remained.

Libyan leader Moammar Khadafy continued to refuse permission for British police to enter the embassy. The British wanted to question the occupants and look for weapons.

Some reports said that just before the deadly shots an American spy satellite picked up a message from Libya to the embassy. The message instructed the embassy staff to use force in response to the taunts from the protesters outside.

By Sunday, British diplomats in Libya will return home and Libyan diplomats in Britain are supposed to go home. The standoff will be over. Until then, however, the police will continue to surround the embassy.

When the Libyan diplomats come out of the embassy, a killer will be walking with them. It seems unfair to the family of the slain policewoman. She was protecting the Libyans and now she is dead at the hands of a Libyan.

However, we must praise Britain's decision to cut diplomatic relations. It is tough action. It may not match the crime, but it puts the radical Khadafy regime on notice.

Khadafy must be taught that the more civilized nations of the world will not tolerate his militaristic tactics. His threats must be countered with adequate protections. His actions must be reprimanded. His use of embassies to carry out intimidation of his exiles must stop. His lawlessness must end or at least be confined within the borders of Libya.

Our prayers go to the 8,000 British citizens living in Libya. We hope that they will be unharmed.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that these four bills and the message of the President to Congress which accompanied these proposals be printed in the RECORD in their entirety following the conclusion of my remarks.

Thank you.

S. 2623

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Aircraft Sabotage Act."

STATEMENT OF FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

SEC. 2. The Congress hereby finds that:

(a) The Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Civil Aviation (ratified by the United States on November 1, 1972) requires each contracting State to establish its jurisdiction over certain offenses affecting the safety of civil aviation;

(b) Such offenses place innocent lives in jeopardy, endanger national security, affect domestic tranquillity, gravely affect interstate and foreign commerce, and are offenses against the law of nations;

(c) The purpose of this Act is to implement fully the Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Civil Aviation and to expand the protection accorded to aircraft and related facilities.

SEC. 3. (a) Section 31 of Title 18, United States Code, is amended—

(1) in the first paragraph by

(A) striking out "and" before the term "spare part" and inserting "and 'special aircraft jurisdiction of the United States'" after the term "spare part"; and

(B) striking out "Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938" and inserting in lieu thereof "Federal Aviation Act of 1958";

(2) by striking out "and" at the end of the third undesignated paragraph thereof;

(3) by striking the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof ";" ; and

(4) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraphs:

"'In flight' means any time from the moment all the external doors of an aircraft are closed following embarkation until the moment when any such door is opened for disembarkation. In the case of a forced landing the flight shall be deemed to continue until competent authorities take over the responsibility for the aircraft and the persons and property on board; and

"'In service' means any time from the beginning of preflight preparation of the aircraft by ground personnel or by the crew for a specific flight until twenty-four hours after any landing; the period of service shall, in any event, extend for the entire period during which the aircraft is in flight.".

(b) Section 32 of Title 19, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"(a) Whoever willfully—

"(1) sets fire to, damages, destroys, disables, or interferes with the operation of or makes unsuitable for use any aircraft in the special aircraft jurisdiction of the United States or any civil aircraft used, operated, or employed in interstate, overseas, or foreign air commerce;

"(2) places or causes to be placed a destructive device or substance in, upon, or in proximity to, or otherwise makes or causes to be made unworkable or unusable or hazardous to work or use, any such aircraft, or any part or other materials used or intended to be used in connection with the operation of such aircraft;

"(3) sets fire to, damages, destroys, or disables any air navigation facility, or interferes with the operation of such facility, if such fire, damaging, destroying, disabling, or interfering is likely to endanger the safety of any such aircraft in flight;

"(4) with the intent to damage, destroy, or disable any such aircraft, sets fire to, damages, destroys, or disables or places a destructive device or substance in, upon, or in proximity to, any appliance or structure, ramp, landing area, property, machine, or apparatus, or any facility or other material used, or intended to be used, in connection with the operation, maintenance, loading unloading or storage of any such aircraft or any cargo carried or intended to be carried on any such aircraft;

"(5) performs an act of violence against or incapacitates any individual on any such aircraft, if such act of violence or incapacitation is likely to endanger the safety of such aircraft;

"(6) communicates information, knowing the information to be false, thereby endangering the safety of any such aircraft in flight; or

"(7) attempts to do anything prohibited under paragraphs (1) through (6) of this subsection—shall be fined not more than $100,000 or imprisoned not more than 20 years or both.

"(b) Whoever willfully—

"(1) performs an act of violence against any individual on board any civil aircraft registered in a country other than the United States while such aircraft is in flight, if such act is likely to endanger the safety of that aircraft;

"(2) destroys a civil aircraft registered in a country other than the United States while such aircraft is in service or causes damage to such an aircraft which renders that aircraft incapable of flight or which is likely to endanger that aircraft's safety in flight;

"(3) places or causes to be placed on a civil aircraft registered in a country other than the United States while such aircraft is in service, a device or substance which is likely to destroy that aircraft, or to cause damage to that aircraft which renders that aircraft incapable of flight or which is likely to endanger that aircraft's safety in flight; or

"(4) attempts to commit an offense described in paragraphs (1) through (3) of this subsection—shall, if the offender is later found in the United States, be fined not more than $100,000 or imprisoned not more than 20 years, or both.".

(c) Section 101(38)(d) of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 (49 U.S.C. 1301(39(d)), relating to the definition of the term "special aircraft jurisdiction of the United States", is amended—

(1) in clause (i), by striking out "; or " and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon;

(2) at the end of clause (ii), by striking out "and" and inserting in lieu thereof "or;" and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new clause:

"(iii) regarding which an offense as defined in subsection (d) or (e) of Article I, Section I of the Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Civil Aviation (Montreal, September 23, 1971) is committed if the aircraft lands in the United States with an alleged offender still on board; and".

(d)(1) Chapter 2 of Title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 36. Imparting or conveying threats

"Whoever imparts or conveys any threat to do an act which would be a felony prohibited by section 32 or 33 of this chapter or section 1992 of chapter 97 or section 2275 or chapter 111 of this title with an apparent determination and will to carry the threat into execution shall be fined not more $25,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.".

(2) The analysis of chapter 2 of title 18 of the United States Code is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"36. Imparting or conveying threats.".

SEC. 4. (a)(1) Section 901 of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 (49 U.S.C. 1471) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsections:

"(c) Whoever imparts or conveys or causes to be imparted or conveyed false information, knowing the information to be false, concerning an attempt or alleged attempt being made or to be made, to do any act which would be a crime prohibited by subsection (i), (j), (k), or (l) of section 902 of this Act, shall be subject to a civil penalty of not more than $10,000 which shall be recoverable in a civil action brought in the name of the United States.

"(d) Except for law enforcement officers of any municipal or State government or officers or employees of the Federal Government, who are authorized or required within their official capacities to carry arms, or other persons who may be so authorized under regulations issued by the Administrator, whoever while aboard, or while attempting to board, any aircraft in, or intended for operation in, air transportation or intrastate air transportation, has on or about his person or his property a concealed deadly or dangerous weapon, which is, or would be, accessible to such person in flight shall be subject to a civil penalty of not more than $10,000 which shall be recoverable in a civil action brought in the name of the United States.".

(2) That portion of the first section of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 which appears under the side heading "Sec. 901. Civil penalties." is amended by inserting at the end thereof:

"(c) Conveying false information.

"(d) Concealed weapons.".

(b) Section 901(a)(2) of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 (49 U.S.C. 1471(a)(2)) is amended by inserting the words: "penalties provided for in subsections (c) and (d) of this section or" after the words "Secretary of Transportation in the case of".

(c)(1) Section 902(l)(1) of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 (49 U.S.C. 1472(l)(1) is amended by striking the term "$1,000" and inserting in lieu thereof the term "$10,000".

(2) Section 902(l)(2) of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 (49 U.S.C. 1472(l)(2)) is amended by striking the term "$5,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$25,000".

(d)(1) Section 902(m) of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 (49 U.S.C. 1472(m)) is amended to read as follows:

"FALSE INFORMATION AND THREATS

"(m)(1) Whoever willfully and maliciously, or with reckless disregard for the safety of human life, imparts or conveys or causes to be imparted or conveyed false information, knowing the information to be false, concerning an attempt or alleged attempt being made or to be made, to do any act which would be a felony prohibited by subsection (i), (j), (k), or (l) of this section, shall be fined not more than $25,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

"(2) Whoever imparts or conveys or causes to be imparted or conveyed any threat to do an act which would be a felony prohibited by section (i), (j), (k), or (l) of this section with an apparent determination and will to carry the threat into execution shall be fined not more than $25,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.".

(2) That portion of the table of contents contained in the first section of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 which appears under the side heading "Sec. 903. Criminal penalties." is amended by striking out

(f) The second sentence of section 903(b)(1) of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 (49 U.S.C. 1473(b)(1)) is amended by striking out "Such" and inserting in lieu thereof "Except with respect to civil penalties under sections 901(c) and (d) of this Act, such".

SEC. 5. This Act shall become effective on enactment.

S. 2624

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Act for the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Hostage-Taking".

STATEMENT OF FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

SEC. 2. The Congress hereby finds that:

(a) the International Convention Against the Taking of Hostages (adopted by the United Nations, December 17, 1979) requires all States parties to it to prohibit the offense of hostage-taking as defined in the Convention;

(b) hostage-taking affects domestic tranquility, interstate and foreign commerce, and foreign relations, endangers national security, and is an offense against the law of nations;

(c) the purpose of this title is to fully implement the International Convention Against the Taking of Hostages.

SEC. 3. (a) Section 1201 of title 18, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by deleting in subsection (a)(3) the words "section 101(36) of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958, as amended (49 U.S.C. 1301(36))" and inserting in lieu thereof "section 101(38) of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958, as amended (49 U.S.C. 1301(38))";

(2) by deleting "or" at the end of subsection (a)(3);

(3) by deleting the comma at the end of subsection (a)(4) and inserting "; or" in lieu thereof;

(4) by adding a new subsection (a)(5) after subsection (a)(4) as follows:

"(5) a threat is made to kill, injure or to continue to detain the person in order to compel a third party to do or abstain from doing any act as an explicit or implicit condition for the release of the person,";

(5) by amending subsection (d) to read as follows:

"(d) Whoever attempts to violate subsection (a)(4) or subsection (a)(5) shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than twenty years.";

(6) by amending subsection (e) to read as follows:

"(e) If the victim of an offense under subsection (a) is an internationally protected person, or if a threat is made to kill, injure, or to continue to detain the victim in order to compel a third party to do or abstain from doing any act as an explicit or implicit condition for the release of the victim, the United States my exercise jurisdiction over the offense if the offense was committed within the United States; the alleged offender is a national of the United States; the victim or purported victim was a national of the United States; or the offender is present within the United States, irrespective of the place where the offense was committed or the nationality of the victim or the alleged offender. As used in this subsection, the term "United States" includes all areas under the jurisdiction of the United States including any of the places within the provisions of sections 5 and 7 of this title and section 101(38) of the Federal Aviation Action of 1958, as amended (49 U.S.C. 1301(38)) and the term "national of the United States" has the meaning given to it in section 101(a)(22) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(22)).";

(7) by amending subsection (f) to read as follows:

"(f) In the course of enforcement of subsection (a)(4) or subsection (a)(5), and any other sections prohibiting a conspiracy or attempt to violate subsection (a)(4) or subsection (a)(5), the Attorney General may request assistance from any Federal, State, or local agency, including the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Air Force, any statute, rule or regulation to the contrary notwithstanding."; and

(8) by inserting a new subsection (g) to read as follows:

"(g) Nothing in this section shall be construed as indicating an intent on the part of Congress to prevent any State, commonwealth, territory or possession of the United States, or the District of Columbia, from exercising jurisdiction over any offense over which it would have jurisdiction in the absence of this section, nor shall anything in this section be construed as depriving State and local law enforcement authorities of responsibility for prosecuting acts that may be violations of this section and that are violations of State and local law, nor shall anything in subsection (a)(5) of this section be construed as authorizing the United States to exercise jurisdiction over an offense occurring in the United States in which the alleged offender is the parent, child, spouse, brother or sister of any victim or in which the alleged offender and any victim live in the same household and are related by blood or marriage.".

(b)(1) The heading of section 1201 of title 18, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"§ 1201. Kidnaping and hostage-taking"

(2) The analysis for chapter 55 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by deleting the item relating to section 1201 and inserting in lieu thereof the following new item:

"1201. Kidnaping and hostage-taking:"

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 4. Sections 2 and 3 of this Act shall become effective only when the International Convention Against the Taking of Hostages has come into force and the United States has become a party to it.

S. 2625

Be it enacted by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SEC. 1. This Act may be cited as the "Act for Rewards for Information Concerning Terrorist Acts".

SEC. 2. (a) Title 18 of the United States Code is amended by adding the following new chapter after chapter 203:

"CHAPTER 204—REWARDS FOR INFORMATION CONCERNING TERRORIST ACTS

"Sec. 3071. Information for which rewards authorized; maximum amount.
"Sec. 3072. Determination of entitlement; consultation; Presidential approval; conclusiveness.
"Sec. 3073. Aliens; waiver of admission requirements.
"Sec. 3074. Hearings; rules and regulations.
"Sec. 3075. Protection of identity.
"Sec. 3076. Exception of governmental officials.
"Sec. 3077. Authorization for appropriations.
"Sec. 3078. Eligibility for witness security program.
"Sec. 3079. Definitions.

"SEC. 3071. INFORMATION FOR WHICH REWARDS AUTHORIZED; MAXIMUM AMOUNT.

"Any individual who furnishes information—

"(a) leading to the arrest or conviction, in any country, of any individual or individuals for the commission of an act of terrorism against a United States person or United States property; or

"(b) leading to the arrest or conviction, in any country, of any individual or individuals for conspiring or attempting to commit an act of terrorism against a United States person or property; or

"(c) leading to the prevention, frustration or favorable resolution of an act of terrorism against a United States person or property may be rewarded in an amount not to exceed $500,000.

"SEC. 3072. DETERMINATION OF ENTITLEMENT; CONSULTATION; PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL; CONCLUSIVENESS.

"The Attorney General shall with respect to acts of terrorism primarily within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, and the Secretary of State shall with respect to acts of terrorism primarily outside the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, determine whether an individual furnishing information pursuant to section 3071 is entitled to a reward and the amount to be paid. Before making a reward under this chapter in a matter over which there is federal criminal jurisdiction, the Secretary of State shall advise and consult with the Attorney General. A reward of $100,000 or more may not be made without the approval of the President or his designee. A determination made by the Attorney General, the Secretary of State, or the President under this chapter shall be final and conclusive and no court shall have power or jurisdiction to review it.

"SEC. 3073. ALIENS; WAIVER OF ADMISSION REQUIREMENTS.

"If the information which would justify a reward under this chapter is furnished by an alien, the Attorney General, after consulting with the Secretary of State, may determine that the entry of such alien into the United States is in the public interest and, in that event, such alien and the members of his immediate family may receive immigrant visas and may be admitted to the United States for permanent residence, notwithstanding the requirements of the Immigration and Nationality Act [8 U.S.C. sec.1101 et seq.].

"SEC. 3074. HEARINGS; RULES AND REGULATIONS.

"The Attorney General and the Secretary of State, respectively, are authorized to hold such hearings and make, promulgate, issue, rescind, and amend such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this chapter. The provisions of subchapter II, chapter 5 of title 5 United States Code do not apply to this chapter.

"SEC. 3075. PROTECTION OF IDENTITY.

"Any reward granted under this chapter shall be certified by the Attorney General or the Secretary of State, respectively. If it is determined that the identity of the recipient of a reward or of the members of the receipient's immediate family must be protected, the Attorney General or the Secretary of State, respectively, may take such measures in connection with the payment of the reward as deemed necessary to effect such protection.

"SEC. 3076. AUTHORIZATION FOR APPROPRIATIONS.

"Such sums as necessary are authorized to be appropriated for the purpose of this chapter.

"SEC. 3077. EXCEPTION OF GOVERNMENTAL OFFICIALS.

"No officer or employee of any governmental entity who, while in the performance of his official duties, furnishes the information described in section 3071 shall be eligible for any monetary reward under this chapter.

"SEC. 3078. ELIGIBILITY FOR WITNESS SECURITY PROGRAM.

"Any individual who furnishes information which would justify a reward under this chapter and his immediate family may, in the discretion of the Attorney General, participate in the Attorney General's witness security program authorized under Title V of the Organized Crime Control Act of 1970.

"SEC. 3079. DEFINITIONS.

"204. Rewards for information concerning terrorist acts ..... 3071".

S. 2626

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Prohibition Against the Training or Support of Terrorist Organizations Act of 1984".

SEC. 2. Title 18 of the United States Code is amended by adding the following new chapter after chapter 113:

"CHAPTER 113A—TERRORISM

"Sec. 2331. Military and intelligence assistance to certain foreign governments, factions, and international terrorist groups.

"§ 2331. Military and intelligence assistance to certain foreign governments, factions, and international terrorist groups

"(a) Except as provided in subsections (h) and (i), it shall be unlawful for any national of the United States, any permanent resident alien of the United States, or any United States business entity to willfully perform or attempt to perform anywhere in the world any of the following acts:

"(1) serve in, or act in concert with, the armed forces or any intelligence agency of any foreign government, faction, or international terrorist group which is named in a determination in effect under subsection (d);

"(2) provide training in any capacity to the armed forces or any intelligence agency, or their agents, of any foreign government, faction, or international terrorist group named in a determination in effect under subsection (d);

"(3) provide any logistical, mechanical, maintenance, or similar support services to the armed forces or any intelligence agency, or their agents, of any foreign govenment, faction, or international terrorist group named in a determination in effect under subsection (d); or

"(4) recruit or solicit any person to engage in any activity described in subparagraphs (1) through (3) of this paragraph.

"(b) Except as provided in subsections (h) and (i), it shall be unlawful for any person or entity within the boundaries of the United States, its territories or possessions, to willfully perform or attempt to perform any of the following acts:

"(1) provide training in any capacity to the armed forces or any intelligence agency, or their agents, of any foreign govenment, faction, or international terrorist group named in a determination in effect under subsection (d);

"(2) provide any logistical, mechanical, maintenance, or similar support services to the armed forces or any intelligence agency, or their agents, of any foreign government, faction, or international terrorist group named in a determination in effect under subsection (d); or

"(3) recruit or solicit any person to engage in any activity described in subparagraphs (1) or (2) of this paragraph.

"(c) Whoever violates this section shall be fined not more than five times the total compensation received for such violation, or $100,000, whichever is greater, or imprisoned for not more than ten years, or both, for each such offense.

"(d) Whenever the Secretary of State finds that the acts or likely acts of international terrorism of a foreign government, faction, or international terrorist group are such that the national security, foreign relations, or the physcial security of the person or property of a private entity of the United States warrant a ban on the foreign government's, faction's or international terrorist group's receipt of services or other assistance in support of such acts as described in subsections (a) or (b), he may issue a determination naming such foreign government, faction, or international terrorist group for which such finding has been made. If the Secretary of State finds that the conditions which were the basis for any detemination issued under this subsection have changed in such a manner as to warrant revocation of such determination, or that the national security or foreign relations of the United States so warrant, he may revoke such determination in whole or in part. Any determination issued pursuant to this subsection shall cease to have any effect one year from the date of its publication unless renewed at or before that time by the Secretary of State. Any determination, or the renewal or revocation thereof, issued pursuant to this subsection shall be published in the Federal Register and shall become effective immediately on publication. Any revocation or lapsing of a determination shall not affect any action or proceeding based on any conduct committed prior to the effective date of such revocation or lapsing.

"(e) For the purposes of this section, any finding of fact made in any determination or renewal issued pursuant to subsection (d) shall be conclusive. No question concerning the validity of the issuance of such determination or renewal may be raised by a defendant as a defense in or as an objection to any trial or hearing if such determination or renewal was issued and published in the Federal Register in accordance with subsection (d).

"(f) An affirmative defense shall exist with respect to any act committed outside of the United States within thirty days after the effective date of any determination affecting such person if the act was performed pursuant to an agreement or contract entered into prior to the effective date of the determination.

"(g)(1) Whoever has been convicted of a violation of this section, in addition to any other penalty prescribed by this section, shall forfeit to the United States—

"(A) any property constituting, or derived from, any proceeds he obtained, directly or indirectly, as a result of such violation; and

"(B) any of his property used, or intended to be used, to commit, or to facilitate the commission of, such violation.

"(2) The procedures in any criminal forfeiture under this section, and the duties and authority of the courts of the United States and the Attorney General with respect to any criminal forfeiture action under this section or with respect to any property that may be subject to forfeiture under this section, are to be governed by the provisions of section 1963 of this title.

"(h) This section shall not be construed to prohibit the provision of medical services or medical training for humanitarian purposes, or the recruitment or solicitation thereof.

"(i) Nothing in this section shall be construed to create criminal liability for any activities conducted by officials of the United States Government, or their agents, which are properly authorized and conducted in accordance with federal statutes and Executive orders governing such activities.

"(j) for the purposes of this section—

"(1) the term 'foreign government' has the meaning given it in section 1116(b)(2) of this title;

"(2) the term 'armed forces' includes any regular, irregular, paramilitary, guerrilla, or police force;

"(3) the term 'faction' includes any political party, body of insurgents, or other group which seeks to overthrow the government of, become the government of, or otherwise assert control over or influence any foreign country or territory, possession, department, district, province, or other political subdivision of any such foreign country through the threat or use of force of arms;

"(4) the term 'group' means an association of persons, whether or not a legal entity;

"(5) the term 'international terrorist group' means a group which engages in international terrorism;

"(6) the term 'international terrorism' has the meaning given to it in section 101(c) of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978 (50 U.S.C. 1801(c));

"(7) the term 'intelligence agency' means any entity which engages in the collection, analysis, or dissemination of information concerning the activities, capabilities, plan or intention of governments, organization, or persons, in whole or in part by covert means;

"(8) the term 'United States business entity' means any sole proprietorship, partnership, company, association, or corporation organized under the laws of, or having its principal place of business within, the United States, any State, the District of Columbia, or any territory or possession of the United States;

"(9) the term 'national of the United States' has the meaning given to it in section 101(a)(22) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(22));

"(B) an employee or contractor of the United States Government, regardless of nationality, who is the victim or intended victim of an act of terrorism by virtue of that employment;

"(C) a sole proprietorship, partnership, company or association composed in whole or in part of nationals or permanent aliens of the United States; or

"(D) a corporation organized under the laws of the United States, any State, the District of Columbia, or any territory or possession of the United States and any foreign subsidiary of such corporation.".

SEC. 3. The chapter analysis of part I of title 18 is amended by adding the following new item after the item relating to chapter 113:

"113A. Terrorism ..... 2331".

SEC. 4. Section 3238 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by—

(1) striking out "The" and inserting in lieu thereof "(a) Except as provided in subsection (b), the"; and

(2) adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(b) The trial of any offense under section 2331 of this title which is committed out of the jurisdiction of any particular State or district may be in any district. Nothing contained in this subsection may be construed to restrict any right of a defendant under any rule in effect under section 3771 of this title.".

SEC. 5. Section 11 of title 18 is amended by striking out the phrase "as used in this title except in sections 112, 878, 970, 1116, and 1201," and inserting in lieu thereof: "as used in this title except in sections 112, 878, 970, 1116, 1201, and 2331,".

To the Congress of the United States:

I am sending to the Congress today four separate bills to attack the pressing and urgent problem of international terrorism.

In 1983 more than 250 American citizens were killed in terrorist attacks, the largest number in any year of record. In the wake of the tragic deaths of our diplomats and Marines, as well as French and Israeli soldiers in Lebanon, in light of the cynical murder of four South Korean cabinet officers and many others by North Korean terrorists in Burma, and as a result of the attack on our embassy in Kuwait, it is essential that we act immediately to cope with this menace and to increase cooperation with other governments in dealing with this growing threat to our way of life.

In the past fifteen years, terrorism has become a frightening challenge to the tranquility and political stability of our friends and allies. During the past decade alone, there have been almost 6,500 terrorist incidents. Over 3,500 people have been killed in these incidents, and more than 7,600 people have been wounded. American citizens have been the victims of more than 2,500 terrorist incidents. Of special concern to me has been the toll inflicted on our diplomats and members of the Armed Forces. I am also deeply concerned, however, about attacks against other American citizens, who have been the victims of forty percent of the terrorist incidents over the past decade.

In recent years, a very worrisome and alarming new kind of terrorism has developed: the direct use of instruments of terror by foreign states. This "state terrorism," starkly manifest in the recent dreadful spectacles of violence in Beirut, Rangoon, and Kuwait, accounts for the great majority of terrorist murders and assassinations. Also disturbing is state-provided training, financing, and logistical support to terrorists and terrorist groups. These activities are an extremely serious and growing source of danger to us, our friends and our allies, and are a severe challenge to America's foreign policy.

The protection of our citizens, our official personnel, and our facilities abroad requires the close cooperation and support of other governments. We depend on other governments to provide security protection to more than 250 United States diplomatic and consular posts abroad. We look to other governments to maintain the normal protections of law in their countries for our citizens living and traveling abroad and for our business representatives and business properties.

In 1983, this Administration sent to the Congress legislation to enable us to provide adequate protection for foreign officials in the United States. Not only is their protection essential to meet the obligations of the United States under international treaties, it is equally important to demonstrate to officials of other governments that they can count on full protection while they are in the United States.

I also asked the Congress to provide legislative authority for anti-terrorism training, and in some cases equipment, to foreign governments in order to enhance cooperation with governments on whom we must depend for protection abroad. In my view, the more effective and knowledgeable local law enforcement officials and officers are, the greater will be their ability to provide the kind of security both they and we need. I commend the Congress for providing a two-year authorization for this program and an appropriation of $2.5 million for 1984.

I am determined that my Administration will do whatever is necessary to reduce the incidence of terrorism against us anywhere in the world and to see that the perpetrators of terrorist acts are brought to justice. I believe it is essential, however, that the Executive branch, the Congress and the public clearly understand that combatting terrorism effectively requires concerted action on many different fronts. With trained personnel, effective laws, close international cooperation, and diligence, we can reduce the risks of terrorism to our people and increase the deterrent to future acts of terrorism.

Dealing with the immediate effect of terrorist violence is only part of the challenge, however. We must also assure that the states now practicing or supporting terrorism do not prosper in the designs they pursue. We must assure that international forums, such as the United Nations, take a balanced and practical view of who is practicing terrorism and what must be done about it. We must assure that governments that are currently passive—or inactive—respecting this scourge understand the threat that terrorism poses for all mankind and that they cooperate in stopping it. We must work to assure that there is no role in civilized society for indiscriminate threatening, intimidation, detention, or murder of innocent people. We must make it clear to any country that is tempted to use violence to undermine democratic governments, destabilize our friends, thwart efforts to promote democratic governments, or disrupt our lives that it has nothing to gain, and much to lose.

The legislation I am sending to the Congress is an important step in our war against terrorism. It will send a strong and vigorous message to friend and foe alike that the United States will not tolerate terrorist activity against its citizens or within its borders. Our legislative package consists of four separate bills, each of which is outlined below.

Act for the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Hostage Taking

In September 1981, I signed the instrument ratifying the International Convention Against the Taking of Hostages, which was adopted by the United Nations on December 17, 1979. The convention has not been implemented domestically through enabling legislation, however. This legislation would implement the 1979 convention. It would amend the Federal kidnapping statute to provide for Federal jurisdiction over any kidnapping in which a threat is made to kill, injure, or continue to detain a victim in order to compel a third party to do or to abstain from doing something. This is a common ploy of terrorists. At the time I signed the instrument of ratification, the Congress was informed that the instrument of ratification would not be deposited with the United Nations until enabling legislation had been enacted. To demonstrate to other governments and international forums that the United States is serious about its efforts to deal with international terrorism, it is essential that the Congress provide the necessary enabling legislation, so that we may fully implement the Hostage-Taking Convention.

Aircraft Sabotage Act

The United States became a party to the Tokyo Convention, which covers certain offenses or acts committed aboard aircraft, in 1969 and the Hague Convention, concerning the suppression of unlawful seizure of aircraft, in 1971. The Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Civil Aviation was adopted at Montreal in 1971 and ratified by the United States in November 1972. The Montreal Convention requires all states party to it to establish jurisdiction over certain offenses affecting the safety of civil aviation.

The Congress has approved enabling legislation for the first two of these conventions but not for the Montreal Convention. This means that certain criminal acts related to aircraft sabotage or hijacking are not adequately covered by United States law. This gap in the law sends a false signal to terrorists, and it also indicates to other governments that we may not be as serious as we should be, and as in fact we are, in our efforts to combat international terrorism. Action by the Congress now would provide the basis for long-overdue implementation of this convention.

Act for Rewards for Information Concerning Terrorist Acts

Current law authorizes the payment of rewards for information concerning domestic crimes but is outdated. Maximum rewards are inadequate, and terrorism is not specifically included as a basis for paying a reward. Moreover, there is no authority for the payment of rewards for information on acts of terrorism abroad.

The proposed legislation, which is modelled on an existing statute that allows payment of rewards for information concerning the unauthorized manufacture of atomic weapons, recognizes that payment of a reward in connection with acts of domestic terrorism raises a matter of law enforcement that is properly within the jurisdiction of the Attorney General, but that the payment of a reward in connection with an act of terrorism abroad poses a political and foreign relations problem within the jurisdiction of the Secretary of State. By increasing the amounts of fines that may be paid, and by authorizing rewards for information concerning terrorist acts committed abroad, this Act would markedly improve the ability of the Departments of Justice and State to obtain information leading to the freeing of hostages or the capture of the perpetrators of acts of terrorism. In passing this legislation, the Congress can further underscore the intent of the United States to take every appropriate and necessary step to protect its citizens and property from terrorist acts.

Prohibition Against the Training or Support of Terrorist Organizations Act of 1984

The training and support of terrorist groups and activities by a number of countries has reached alarming proportions. In addition, the number of states now using terrorism as an instrument of foreign policy is both increasing and highly disturbing. The provision of assistance to countries that support terrorism and use terrorism as a foreign policy tool has thus become a matter of grave concern to national security. This Act, together with revised and strengthened regulations that the Department of State intends to issue shortly, would enhance the ability of the Department of Justice to prosecute persons involved in the support of terrorist activities and of states using terrorism. Enactment of this legislation would be a strong contribution to the effort to combat terrorism.

We must recognize that terrorism is symptomatic of larger problems. We must dedicate ourselves to fostering modernization, development, and beneficial change in the depressed areas of the world. We must renew our commitment to promoting and assisting representative and participatory governments. We must attack the problem of terrorism as a crime against the international community whenever and wherever possible, but we must strive to eradicate the sources of frustration and despair that are the spawning places and nutrients of terrorism.

The legislative proposals that I am sending to the Congress today will, when approved, materially benefit our Nation and help us to assist friendly countries. I believe that they are extraordinarily important, and I strongly urge that the Congress undertake their timely consideration and speedy passage.

RONALD REAGAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 26, 1984.

By Mr. D'AMATO (for himself, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. STEVENS, Mr. CRANSTON, and Mr. WILSON):

S.J. Res. 287. Joint resolution to authorize and request the President to designate January 27, 1985, "National Jerome Kern Day"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL JEROME KERN DAY

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a Senate joint resolution to declare January 27, 1985, "National Jerome Kern Day."

Jerome Kern is internationally recognized as one of the foremost Broadway composers. Indeed, he is considered to be "The Father of the American Musical Theatre." Jerome David Kern was born in New York City in 1885. January 27, 1985, will mark the 100th anniversary of his birth.

As indicated in the resolution, Kern composed over 1,000 songs and 108 complete theatrical scores during his lifetime. The pinnacle of the composer's career was reached in 1927 with the production of his most popular score, "Show Boat." That score contains five songs well known by all of us: "Bill," "Can't Help Lovin' Dat Man," "Make Believe," "Why Do I Love You,?" and "Ol' Man River."

This brief space does not allow the listing of all of the composer's songs but a few which will bring back memories are: "Lovely to Look At," "Smoke Gets in Your Eyes," and "Look For the Silver Lining."

Jerome Kern died at the age of 60 on November 11, 1945. As predicted in the New York Times editorial, his "music will not die." President Harry Truman spoke for the Nation at the time with these words:

"I am among the grateful millions who have played and listened to the music of Jerome Kern, and I wish to be among those of his fellow Americans who pay him tribute today. His melodies will live in our voices and warm our hearts for many years to come, for they are the kind of simple, honest songs that belong to no time or fashion. The man who gave them to us earned a lasting place in his nation's memory."

These words hold true today as Kern's music still entertains us. The music industry is planning a centennial year-long tribute to the composer's memory in 1985. Plans for the tribute include stage productions in New York City and Washington, D.C. featuring the composer's works, television and radio shows, the programing of Kern movies featuring Kern's scores, and a Songwriter's Hall of Fame tribute.

I would hope the Congress would come forth and join in the celebration of Jerome Kern's life and the work which has enhanced the esthetic quality of all of our lives.●

ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS

S. 719

At the request of Mr. THURMOND, the name of the Senator from Nebraska (Mr. EXON) was added as a cosponsor of S. 719, a bill to amend subchapter II of chapter 73 of title 10, United States Code, to eliminate the social security offset against annuities provided for under such subchapter to the extent that the social security benefits of the annuitant are based on the annuitant's own employment.

S. 1059

At the request of Mr. DENTON, the name of the Senator from Alabama (Mr. HEFLIN) was added as a cosponsor of S. 1059, a bill to provide that it shall be unlawful to deny equal access to students in public schools and public colleges who wish to meet voluntarily for religious purposes and to provide district courts with jurisdiction over violations of this act.

S. 1651

At the request of Mr. CRANSTON, the names of the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. DODD), and the Senator from Vermont (Mr. LEAHY) were added as cosponsors of S. 1651, a bill to amend title 38, United states Code, to provide for presumption of service connection to be established by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs for certain diseases of certain veterans exposed to dioxin or radiation during service in the Armed Forces; to require the Administrator to develop, through process of public participation and subject to judicial review, regulations specifying standards for the presumptions applicable to the resolution of claims for disability compensation based on such exposures; to require that such regulations address certain specified diseases; and to require that all claimants for Veterans' Administration benefits be given the benefit of every reasonable doubt in claims adjudications, and for other purposes.

S. 1730

At the request of Mr. DIXON, the name of the Senator from Michigan (Mr. LEVIN) was added as a cosponsor of S. 1730, a bill to amend the Small Business Act to increase small business participation in the procurement process, thereby reducing costly noncompetitive procurements and increasing defense preparedness, and for other purposes.

S. 1942

At the request of Mr. DIXON, the name of the Senator from Indiana (Mr. QUAYLE) was added as a cosponsor of S. 1942, a bill to amend the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 to provide that Government generated cargoes transported on U.S.-flag or foreign vessels shall be shipped at the lowest landed cost, and that the transport of such cargoes shall be subject to a competitive bidding system.

S. 2014

At the request of Mr. SPECTER, the name of the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HART) was added as a cosponsor of S. 2014, a bill to amend the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act of 1974 to provide for assistance in locating missing children.

S. 2116

At the request of Mr. MATSUNAGA, the name of the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY) was added as a cosponsor of S. 2116, a bill to accept the findings and to implement the recommendations of the Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians.

S. 2358

At the request of Mr. PROXMIRE, the name of the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS) was added as a cosponsor of S. 2358, a bill to prohibit the U.S. Synthetic Fuels Corporation from making new awards of financial assistance before the comprehensive strategy (as set forth in the Energy Security Act) is approved.

S. 2417

At the request of Mr. BAUCUS, the name of the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. FORD) was added as a cosponsor of S. 2417, a bill to amend the Sherman Act to prohibit a rail carrier from denying to shippers of certain commodities, with intent to monopolize, use of its track which affords the sole access by rail to such shippers to reach the track of a competing railroad or the destination of shipment.

S. 2433

At the request of Mr. DANFORTH, the name of the Senator from Maine (Mr. COHEN) was added as a cosponsor of S. 2433, a bill to amend chapter 35 of title 44, United States Code, relating to the coordination of Federal information policy, and for other purposes.

S. 2436

At the request of Mr. GOLDWATER, the names of the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. BURDICK), the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. HUDDLESTON), and the Senator from Michigan (Mr. RIEGLE) were added as cosponsors of S. 2436, a bill to authorize appropriations of funds for activities of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, and for other purposes.

S. 2563

At the request of Mr. D'AMATO, the name of the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. LAUTENBERG) was added as a cosponsor of S. 2563, a bill to amend section 1201 of the National Housing Act to extend the crime insurance program.

S. 2565

At the request of Mr. DENTON, the names of the Senator from Indiana (Mr. LUGAR), and the Senator from Nevada (Mr. LAXALT) were added as cosponsors of S. 2565, a bill to extend programs under the Head Start Act, and for other purposes.

S. 2568

At the request of Mr. PACKWOOD, the names of the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. PRESSLER), the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. ANDREWS), and the Senator from Oregon (Mr. HATFIELD) were added as cosponsors of S. 2568, a bill to clarify the application of title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, the Age Discrimination Act of 1975, and title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

S. 2616

At the request of Mr. DENTON, the names of the Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. NICKLES), and the Senator from Florida (Mrs. HAWKINS) were added as cosponsors of S. 2616, a bill to extend the adolescent family life demonstration program.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 129

At the request of Mr. PRESSLER, the names of the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. HUDDLESTON), and the Senator from Michigan (Mr. RIEGLE) were added as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 129, a joint resolution calling upon the President to seek a mutual and verifiable ban on weapons in space and on weapons designed to attack objects in space.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 229

At the request of Mr. MOYNIHAN, the names of the Senator from Indiana (Mr. QUAYLE), and the Senator from Illinois (Mr. PERCY) were added as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 229, a joint resolution to proclaim the week beginning April 22, 1984, as "National Dance Week."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 246

At the request of Mr. EXON, the name of the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. LONG) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 246, a joint resolution strongly urging the President to secure a full accounting of Americans captured or missing in action in Southeast Asia, and for other purposes.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 253

At the request of Mr. PRESSLER, the name of the Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 253, a joint resolution to authorize and request the President to designate September 16, 1984, as "Ethnic American Day."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 270

At the request of Mr. COCHRAN, the name of the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. CHAFEE) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 270, a joint resolution designating the week of July 1 through July 8, 1984, as "National Duck Stamp Week" and 1984 as the "Golden Anniversary Year of the Duck Stamp."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 273

At the request of Mr. THURMOND, his name was added as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 273, a joint resolution to designate the week of May 13, 1984, through May 19, 1984, as "Smokey Bear Week."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 274

At the request of Mr. INOUYE, the names of the Senator from Florida (Mr. CHILES), the Senator from Nebraska (Mr. ZORINSKY), the Senator from Maryland (Mr. SARBANES), the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. DODD), the Senator from Nevada (Mr. HECHT), the Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH), the Senator from California (Mr. WILSON), the Senator from Kansas (Mrs. KASSEBAUM), the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. HEINZ), the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. FORD), the Senator from Missouri (Mr. EAGLETON), the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. COCHRAN), the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. ABDNOR), and the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER) were added as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 274, a joint resolution to authorize and request the President to designate May 6, 1984, as "National Nurse Recognition Day."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 275

At the request of Mr. DIXON, the names of the Senator from Iowa (Mr. GRASSLEY), the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY), the Senator from Georgia (Mr. MATTINGLY), the Senator from Alabama (Mr. HEFLIN), the Senator from Nevada (Mr. LAXALT), the Senator from Nebraska (Mr. EXON), the Senator from Nebraska (Mr. ZORINSKY), the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH), and the Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE) were added as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 275, a joint resolution to designate the month of October 1984 as "National Spina Bifida Month."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 279

At the request of Mr. KASTEN, the name of the Senator from Montana (Mr. BAUCUS) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 279, a joint resolution to designate the week of November 11, 1984, through November 17, 1984, as "Women in Agriculture Week."

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 62

At the request of Mr. MATTINGLY, the name of the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PELL) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Concurrent Resolution 62, a concurrent resolution to direct the Commissioner of Social Security and the Secretary of Health and Human Services to develop a plan outlining the steps which might be taken to correct the social security benefit disparity known as the notch problem.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 100

At the request of Mr. MITCHELL, the names of the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER), the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY), the Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN), the Senator from California (Mr. WILSON), the Senator from Washington (Mr. GORTON), the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. COCHRAN), the Senator from Kansas (Mrs. KASSEBAUM), the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. STENNIS), the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. JOHNSTON), the Senator from Arizona (Mr. DECONCINI), and the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. LONG) were added as cosponsors of Senate Concurrent Resolution 100, a concurrent resolution concerning the drilling ship Glomar Java Sea.

SENATE RESOLUTION 127

At the request of Mr. ANDREWS, the name of the Senator from Washington (Mr. EVANS) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Resolution 127, a resolution to make the Select Committee on Indian Affairs a permanent committee of the Senate.

SENATE RESOLUTION 368

At the request of Mr. PRESSLER, the name of the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. BOSCHWITZ) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Resolution 368, a resolution condemning chemical warfare wherever it occurs and calling for a ban on chemical weapons.

SENATE RESOLUTION 372

At the request of Mr. SIMPSON, the name of the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. WALLOP) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Resolution 372, a resolution expressing the sense of the Senate regarding exposure of members of the Armed Forces to ionizing radiation and to herbicides containing dioxin.

AMENDMENT NO. 3043

At the request of Mr. GRASSLEY, the names of the Senator from Washington (Mr. EVANS), the Senator from Montana (Mr. MELCHER), the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS), the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. PRYOR), the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. HUMPHREY), and the Senator from Iowa (Mr. JEPSEN) were added as cosponsors of Amendment No. 3043 proposed to H.R. 2163, a bill to amend the Federal Boat Safety Act of 1971, and for other purposes.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 109—NATIONAL STORM PROGRAM

Mr. HOLLINGS (for himself, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. WEICKER, Mr. NUNN, Mr. BOREN, Mr. LONG, and Mr. PERCY) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation:

S. CON. RES. 109

Whereas the most severe weather problem in the United States is the unanticipated, destructive, and hazardous occurrence of small-scale weather disturbances, which disrupt the economy through serious impacts on transportation, agriculture, and industry, and which result in a staggering average annual economic loss of $20 billion and an average annual loss of life approaching 1,000;

Whereas the Congress finds that recent advances in atmospheric science and related technology make it possible to improve the protection of the public and increase the productivity of the Nation's economy through modernization of the Nation's weather services over the next decade by improved observation and prediction of storm-scale weather phenomena such as squall lines, thunderstorms, flash floods, freezing rain, and dense fog;

Whereas an increased capability in storm-scale weather prediction and services for the people of the United States will require implementation of observation, data collection, processing, and dissemination technology and an associated research effort aimed at the development of improved forecasting procedures and field programs to acquire the necessary data to test procedures and technology;

Whereas there is a widespread consensus in the scientific community that recent developments in technology and scientific understanding of storm-scale wheather phenomena make it timely to undertake a national storm-scale operational and research meteorology program (STORM) which can yield the desired improvements over the next decade in the Nation's weather services;

Whereas the Federal Government is currently pursuing plans to modernize the Nation's operational weather capability by implementing new technology such as Next Generation Radar (NEXRAD) and the next generation of Geostationary Operational Environment Satellite (GOES);

Whereas significant improvements in storm-scale weather prediction can be achieved by a modest but sustained annual increase over the next decade in the Nation's present investment in weather services and research; and

Whereas a national STORM program should be implemented by the Federal agencies involved, including the Departments of Commerce, Defense, Interior, and Transportation; the Environmental Protection Agency; the National Aeronautics and Space Administration; and the National Science Foundation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That (1) it is the sense of the Congress that the Federal Government take immediate steps to support funding for such a program under the leadership of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration of the Department of Commerce, with the cooperation of other interested and appropriate departments and agencies; (2) on or before January 1, 1985, and each fifth year thereafter the President should transmit to the Congress a plan setting forth the proposed activities of the national STORM program and the budgetary requirements needed to meet the program's goals and objectives; (3) such plan should contain a statement of the activities to be conducted and specify the department or agency of the Government which will conduct the activities; and (4) on or before January 1, 1986, the President shall transmit to the Congress a report on progress made in implementing the national STORM program.

● Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I introduce today the STORM concurrent resolution that will greatly benefit the citizens of the United States. The STORM resolution proposes a program to increase our capabilities to predict storm-scale weather through a national storm program. Storm-scale weather consists of weather systems as large as 300 to 400 miles or as small as a mile square. Tornadoes, downbursts, severe squall lines, thunderstorms, flash floods, and local heavy snows are some of the damaging types of storm-scale weather. These disrupt transportation, agriculture, industry, and national security, and account for a staggering annual economic loss of $20 billion. The average annual loss of life approaches 1,000. The STORM resolution proposes that the Federal Government act as the catalyst in a nationwide system of coordinated weather reporting, prediction, and research for storm-scale weather. Most important, this program will provide better and more precise prediction capability so that lives can be saved and economic damage from severe storms can be drastically reduced.

I am deeply saddened, Mr. President, by the recent events in Mississippi, South Carolina, and North Carolina. On late Wednesday, March 28, 1984, a severe storm system moved into the eastern seaboard. The southern part of the front spawned a series of damaging tornadoes in northern Georgia. The storm also left a large swath of destruction in my own State of South Carolina, from our capital of Columbia through eastern North Carolina to the Virginia border. The death toll has already reached 63 people, with hundreds of millions of dollars in property damage. Then on Easter weekend, April 21-22, a series of tornadoes struck four Southern States with Mississippi taking the brunt of the weather. The death toll has reached 15 people with over 100 people injured. The tornadoes almost completely flattened the town of Water Valley, MS, and damage will be in the tens of million of dollars. More recently, areas in Illinois, Oklahoma, Wisconsin, and Minnesota have been subjected to similar fates. These are precisely the types of weather-related disasters that the storm program will address, and it is these tragic effects it will mitigate.

WHAT IS STORM-SCALE WEATHER?

Storm-scale weather consists of localized weather systems that may be as large as 300 to 400 miles or more, or as small as a mile square. Storm-scale weather—or mesoscale weather as it is called scientifically—includes such things as tornadoes, downbursts, severe squall, or thunderstorm lines, rain-caused flash floods, and local heavy snows.

In an average year approximately 800 tornadoes strike the United States killing 95 people. On April 3-4, 1974, a series of tornadoes struck a broad area from the Mississippi River eastward to the Appalachians and northward to New York. In that brief period over 5,000 people were injured, and 315 people were killed. Property damage was estimated at $600 million.

Downbursts are storm-scale weather phenomena associated with thunderstorms. Masses of cold air drop creating a downdraft of damaging wind on or near the ground. The winds from a downburst are capable of reaching 200 miles an hour; and the damage from downbursts has, until recently, often been mistaken for tornado damage. On July 16, 1980, a series of downbursts cut a destructive 30-mile-wide swath from Chicago, IL, to Detroit, MI. The four identifiable downbursts on that day caused an estimated damage of $500 million. Downbursts are of particular concern to the aviation community. On July 9, 1982, a Pan American World Airways flight from New Orleans crashed on takeoff with the loss of all 145 people aboard the plane and 8 persons on the ground. The National Transportation Safety Board determined that the probable cause of the accident was wind shear caused by a the plane's encounter with a small downburst. Weather-related aviation accidents annually cause the loss of a minimum of $50 million and 800 lives.

About 100,000 thunderstorms occur each year in the United States. Hail often accompanies these storms. A number of these thunderstorms reach severe levels and cause on the average 400 deaths per year with damage exceeding $2 billion. Lightning alone kills approximately 100 people each year and is responsible for more than 10,000 fires. Hail damage to crops from these storm-scale systems runs to over $4 billion. On May 7, 1978, a large thunderstorm system produced severe weather in an area covering most of Arkansas, Louisiana, and Mississippi. The severe weather included electrical storms, hail, tornadoes, downbursts, and flash floods. Several people were killed, and property damage exceeded $100 million.

Flash floods are brought about by intense thunderstorms or severe rain where large volumes of rain fall in a very short period of time. The volume of rain is too great for adequate ground drainage, and flash floods result. These cause over 200 deaths per year. Damages from floods and flash floods now average about $4 billion per year, with over 90 percent of all Presidential declarations of disaster being flood related. In 1976, an intense storm dropped more than 12 inches of rain in 4 hours into Big Thompson Creek, CO. One hundred and thirty-nine people lost their lives and the property damage was over $500 million.

As you can see, the economic damage from storm-scale weather is mammoth. The toll on human lives and suffering is incalculable. We are at a crossroads. We can go on coldly ignoring these losses. We can stand by mutely while people continue to be injured or killed, and billions of dollars are lost to our economy and not develop and deploy the technology available to us now. Or we can recognize that these catastrophic circumstances can be mitigated. We can voice our strong support for a national program which will further understanding and prediction for storm-scale weather.

But, before I go any further, let me briefly recount some of the advances made by the atmospheric sciences and the strong guiding role that the Federal Government played in those advances.

THE BACKGROUND OF SCIENTIFIC WEATHER PREDICTION

In 1961 when the science of weather prediction was in its infancy, the United States and other countries established the world weather program. This was a cooperative international program under the auspices of the World Meteorological Organization. I remind my colleagues that a concurrent resolution was passed by Congress at that time recognizing the value of that program and Congress went to support the world weather program with funding. This laid the foundation for understanding global weather patterns.

Much has occurred since the inception of that program. In 1966 the National Academy of Sciences called for a global experiment on worldwide weather data collection. This led to an international experiment that took place over 15 months in 1978 and 1979. The experiment collected a vast amount of meteorological information. It has advanced our scientific capabilities for predicting large-scale weather patterns, from systems covering 700-800 miles to those thousands of miles wide that span continents.

In contrast to these large-scale global weather systems is storm-scale weather. We are simply not as well equipped in our understanding and prediction of these smaller systems. That lack, as we saw recently, can have terrible consequences.

We have laid the foundation for understanding storm-scale weather. The first step was the introduction of weather radar after World War II. The second step was the launching of a satellite based weather monitoring system in the mid-1960's. This gave us radically new platforms to observe storm-scale weather. Further research has been carried out at universities and laboratories across the Nation. In spite of these steps, real progress has been painfully slow and severely limited by lack of both funding and a comprehensive, coordinated program.

But onetime revolutionary equipment is now outdated and obsolete. The National Weather Radar System, installed 26 years ago, must be replaced—an antiquated vacuum tube-type system, parts are no longer available. Maintenance must be carried out by cannibalizing other old radar units, and we are running out of them.

The old radar was technically superseded several years ago by new types of radar that can far more accurately measure atmospheric motion. This capability makes it possible to monitor storm-scale weather systems and issue far more accurate severe storm warnings, ranging from the spotting of tornadoes well before visual sighting to the detection of downbursts around airports. The technical superiority of the new radar systems has already been recognized by the Federal Government. Under the leadership of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, the Federal Aviation Administration, and the Department of Defense, the Government made a commitment to replace the aging system with the long overdue new technology. But the full installation of the system has been pushed back to at least the mid-1990's because of major difficulties in obtaining appropriations for the modernization effort.

WHAT ARE OUR NEEDS

Our scientists strongly believe that we are on the verge of making radical progress in storm-scale weather analysis and prediction to the same degree as the phenomenal advances in understanding global weather patterns. But, those advances will not come about without a firm commitment to take full advantage of technology now on hand rather than wait 10 to 15 years. In view of the costs to human lives and property, it is simply too foolish to wait any longer.

The substantial array of technology now available makes it possible to solve the basic problems of storm-scale observation and prediction. But two essential elements are missing. The first is a well thought out plan of action including a detailed design for a national system of coordinated research and operations. The second is a funded procurement program. Each of these needs will be met by the national STORM program.

WHAT IS THE STORM PROGRAM, AND HOW WILL IT MEET THESE NEEDS

The STORM program—STORM, derived from Stormscale Operational and Research Meteorology—is a national effort aimed at increasing our knowledge and ability to respond to dangerous storm-scale weather. The program has two major components. The first is STORM operations. The operational aspect of the STORM program is designed to use existing knowlege of storm-scale weather and available technology in the service of society. This part of the overall program will deploy the technology required to observe, analyze, predict, and disseminate storm-scale weather information. It will also train forecasters in the use of new predictive techniques. The second component is STORM research. This will improve our abilities to understand storm-scale weather by developing better conceptual and mathematical of storm-scale weather. The research and operations efforts will include the final development or deployment of the following technologies: a modern radar network—NEXRAD—additional remote sensors for our existing weather satellites; ground-based remote sensors to measure wind motion; automated surface weather stations; refined communication systems that yield rapid forecasts and warnings; and refined digital computer systems necessary for rapid analysis and prediction.

The new radar system will measure the intensity of rain and other forms of precipitation necessary for the forecasting and warning of flash floods; find the precise location of tornado-spawing clouds so warnings can be issued 30 minutes to an hour in advance to cities and towns in the path of the weather system—presently we may have only a few minutes of warning before a tornado hits; identify specific wind gusts associated with squall lines or downbursts, information essential for aviation safety.

With existing and new remote sensors on our weather satellites, we can measure atmospheric and surface temperatures—particularly important to agriculture for predicting killer frosts—and with the finalization of sensors using microwaves and lasers, we can anticipate more detailed information from inside these storm systems. NASA had been pursuing this research, for installation of these sensors on NOAA's weather satellites, NASA has now abandoned this effort due to lack of funds. Ground-based remote sensors, based on the new radar development, can be used in clear air to find turbulence and wind motion.

Automated surface weather stations, ranging from simple, inexpensive stations that take a limited number of measurements, to stations equipped to measure the full range of meteorological parameters.

The present communications system operating in the National Weather Service—AFOS—cannot now transmit or display either radar or satellite pictures to show the development and motion of weather systems; however, existing technology can be utilized, with additional software development and engineering, to accomplish this task.

With storm-scale weather often short lived, it is essential that the digital computer systems respond to provide information necessary for more precise prediction in an extremely rapid manner. Developing the modeling capability and making it operational is central to the STORM program.

WHO WILL PARTICIPATE IN THE PROGRAM?

The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration will be the lead agency charged with carrying out the STORM program, in conjunction wiironmental Data and Information Service, and the National Earth Satellite Service.

For national security reasons there are operational weather forecasting services and research activities in the Department of Defense. The Air Weather Service of the Air Force and the Oceanography Command of the Navy now participate in ongoing weather observation programs. The Army maintains an active R&D program concerning battlefield environments. Storm-scale meteorology is of major importance to our national defense.

The Department of Interior is active in research concerning the improvement of the Nation's environment and water supply. Interior's Bureau of Reclamation supports a substantial effort in weather modification and was a cosponsor with the National Science Foundation in a project to analyze rain-producing storm-scale weather systems.

The Federal Aviation Administration is a major user and supplier of local weather information. The ability to detect downbursts on or near airfields or to determine the severity of squall lines, for example, are capabilities currently being sought by the FAA. These would be provided by the STORM program. In addition, the FAA has proposed a network of automated weather stations at less-used airfields. This network would play a vital role in the national STORM program.

The Environmental Protection Agency works to assure adequate air quality. The EPA relies on NOAA's Air Resource Laboratory and, as such, is involved in environmental impact statements and the relation between weather processes and air quality.

The National Aeronautics and Space Administration handles the procurement and launching of weather satellites. In addition to this role, NASA plays a role in increasing our understanding of severe storms and the scientific modeling of weather patterns.

The National Science Foundation is the Federal agency that supports basic scientific research. It funds atmospheric-related projects at universities across the Nation and at the National Center for Atmospheric Research. This research covers a broad spectrum of storm-scale weather phenomena. The results of this research have played and will continue to play—under the STORM program—a central role in our knowledge about and ability to predict storm-scale weather.

WHAT ARE THE COSTS AND THE BENEFITS?

This is an era of tight fiscal policy—at least in many budget areas. In view of this, it is prudent to take a close look at any suggested program increases. In hard dollars, the total incremental cost of the national STORM program over the next decade—the installation period—will be from $60–$100 million per year.

While this appears to be a substantial cost, remember that the annual economic loss to this country from storm-scale weather is on the order of $20 billion. And the average annual loss of life approaches 1,000 with countless thousands more injured. In fact, the annual cost of the STORM program represents only one-quarter of 1 percent of the cost of the MX missile system, or one quarter of the cost of only one B–1 bomber. That is about one wing, part of the engine and tail section, and two wheels of a B–1. Surely we can spare that.

The benefits from the STORM program will be immense. For example, if we are able to reduce property damage by storm-scale weather by a mere 5 percent, the total saved in damages is estimated to be $1 billion—1982 dollars—per year. In all likelihood, the savings would be greater than that. If we were able to make more informed weather-related economic decisions and could reduce economic damage by 1 percent each year, the savings would still be more than enough to cover the entire yearly projected cost of a national STORM program. That should make good economic sense.

More importantly, a rapid dissemination of warnings about dangerous storm-scale weather is going to save lives by providing people with time to find safety from dangerous weather conditions. We cannot put a price on the hundreds of human lives lost each year from storm-scale weather. But we can make the decision to do something to reduce the toll on human life and suffering.

CONCLUSION

The STORM program represents a major program initiative. But it is exactly the type of program that is a proper function of government. It is not a pork barrel program that will benefit only one State or region. It is a national effort, and its benefits will be felt nationwide.

The new technology is at hand or under development. We are faced with staggering and unnecessary costs in both the economy and human misery. We can sit back and be a cold witness to more of this pointless tragedy, or we can set our feet on the path to a coordinated comprehensive program that will reduce these costs and more than pay for itself doing so. Not to act is unconscionable, in my opinion. I urge my colleagues to support this effort and cosponsor Senate Concurrent Resolution 109, the STORM resolution.●

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I am very pleased to be an original cosponsor of this resolution being introduced today by my distinguished colleague from South Carolina, Mr. HOLLINGS.

Mr. President, over the last 2½ decades we have greatly enhanced our ability to predict weather patterns. This enhanced ability is the result of installation of weather radar, the deployment of a satellite-based weather monitoring system, and research efforts.

For 26 years now, our weather radar system has served us well. Hardly any one could question the benefits derived from this system since its installation in 1958. However, along with this progress have come technological developments that have made the current weather radar and monitoring system obsolete. Technology exists today that, if utilized, would greatly improve our prediction capabilities.

Mr. President, as my distinguished South Carolina colleague has indicated, there is particular concern with regard to our ability to predict so-called storm-scale, or mesoscale weather, including tornadoes, downbursts, severe squall or thunder storm lines, rain-caused flash floods, and local heavy snows. I recently had the painful experience of viewing first-hand the massive destruction inflicted upon my home State of South Carolina as a result of a series of tornadoes occurring on March 28, 1984. The loss of life and destruction of property in both South Carolina and North Carolina was devastating.

While I am acutely aware of the resulting hardships the citizens of South Carolina have experienced and are still enduring as they attempt to recover from these traumatic events, disasters such as the one that occurred in South Carolina in March are not limited to any one State. They are a national problem and can only be addressed by a concerted national effort.

Mr. President, the Storm-scale Operational and Research Meteorology (STORM) program is designed to increase our knowledge and ability to react to storm-scale weather. Once fully implemented, our ability to anticipate, predict, and prepare for dangerous weather conditions should be greatly improved. This concurrent resolution is a step toward implementation of this important program. It expresses the sense of Congress that the Federal Government should take immediate steps to support funding for a STORM program.

This is the type of program that is a legitimate function of the Federal Government. The program of predicting storm-scale weather is a national problem and one that can only be addressed by a concerted effort by the Federal Government. Much of the technology needed for advancing our current prediction capabilities is available and should be utilized. New technologies for enhancing our capabilities should likewise be developed and deployed.

I join with Senator HOLLINGS in commending this resolution, and the proposed STORM program, to my colleagues.

SENATE RESOLUTION 385—RELATING TO DEDUCTIBILITY OF RESIDENTIAL MORTGAGE INTEREST PAYMENTS

Mr. BENTSEN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

S. RES. 385

Whereas a prime social responsibility of the Federal Government is to promote the maintenance of an adequate supply of reasonably priced housing for all Americans;

Whereas, the maintenance of that supply is directly jeopardized by the soaring budget deficits which will total nearly $900 billion in fiscal years 1984, 1985, 1986, and 1987 on a rising trend;

Whereas, Treasury financing of these deficits are crowding out private investment in the midst of a rebounding demand for funds to rebuild inventories and renew aging plants, with interest rates rising one percentage point since February and two percentage points in a year, and mortgage rates exceeding 13 percent and rising;

Whereas, the National Association of Home Builders has predicted an increase in mortgage rates to 15 percent in 1985 due to soaring deficits and crowding out, which will reduce new housing construction starts to 1.5 million units annually, and push new housing costs above 40 percent of the typical family's income;

Whereas, the projected reduction in housing construction will result in fewer than eight additional housing units being provided for every ten additional households from 1984 to 1989;

Whereas, a critical component of the Federal responsibility to promote adequate housing is the deductibility from individual income taxes of interest paid on residential mortgages;

Whereas, the Administration is evaluating a wide variety of proposed changes to the individual tax system under direction of the Department of the Teasury and the President by his statement of April 12 during public discussion in Dallas has not ruled out elimination of the home mortgage interest deduction which would severely reduce housing supply and increase housing costs; and

Whereas, the federal government should promote home ownership, should respect home ownership as the largest and most viable form of individual wealth in the United States, and should honor its basic commitment to affordable, decent housing for all citizens; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, that it is the sense of the Senate that the Administration honor the basic obligation to promote affordable and decent housing by retaining the current home mortgage interest deduction as an essential component of an equitable tax system intended to promote national living standards.

● Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, for the first time within my memory, a sitting President of the United States is waivering in his support for decent and affordable housing. And that diminished commitment is occurring when the availability of such affordable decent housing is rapidly approaching crisis proportions. The Senate resolution I am offering today is designed to buck up the President's courage to honor that commitment when it is most needed.

THE PRESIDENT'S POSITION

Three weeks ago, on April 12, during a public discussion in Dallas, the President refused to promise to retain the deductibility of home mortgage interest in the tax system. That provision has been and remains pivotal to ensuring a flow of national resources sufficiently large to keep home ownership costs within reach of many families. Yet, the President was quoted as offering a rationale for eliminating this key housing incentive in the tax system should administration officials reviewing the tax system "come in with some entirely different form of taxation aimed at something different than income."

I will be the first to acknowledge that we need fair and equitable tax reform. And, it may be that other economic factors—consumption expenditures is one prominently mentioned—could serve some complementary role to income as an equitable tax base. That prospect may warrant examination. After all, the administration is studying tax alternatives, in part under pressure created by a resolution I introduced in June, 1982 (S.J. Res. 206) calling for a simpler tax system. Yet, the basic national commitment to encourage adequate housing for all Americans through the deductibility of mortgage interest is a strong one. And the key component of that policy certainly need not be sacrificed in order to improve and simplify the Tax Code. Indeed, it is misleading to suggest that the tax system can only be improved at the expense of this Nation's traditional commitment to fair, affordable, and decent housing or to homeownership. The two goals are not mutually exclusive. They can be pursued together—and should be, I believe. The President is flat wrong in refusing to support retention of the singlemost important Federal policy to promote homeownership.

THE HOUSING CRISIS

Inadequate supply. That refusal is particularly distressing in light of the housing crisis facing our Nation. Both the supply and price of housing are moving to limit access to home ownership for years to come. This crisis has its roots in our burgeoning deficits.

The President has not honored his commitment to hold Federal spending down. Indeed, in his third budget it is approaching 24 percent of GNP when the President had promised to shrink it to 19 percent. In combination with his foot dragging on taxes, this failure caused deficits to double and then nearly double again since the President took office. And, the swelling flood of red ink would be even larger had not Congress exercised reasonable restraint in military spending.

These deficits are being financed by the Treasury with borrowed savings. During the 1981-82 recession, Treasury deficit financing did not actually increase interest rates. Demand for capital was sufficiently soft that interest rates diminished and remained relatively stable. However, let me hasten to add that Treasury deficit financing pressure prevented interest rates from falling to their traditional low levels during recessionary periods. Indeed, the prime interest rate never fell below 10.5 percent due to the deficit, and mortgage rates never even dropped to 12 percent for the same reason. The current administration scarcely warrants praise for lower interest rates when the lowest interest rate level attained by the Reagan administration was far above the highest levels ever recorded in the Nation prior to 1974.

The administration failed to aggressively propose steps to balance the Federal budget and eliminate these deficits, which grew from $58 billion in 1981 to $111 billion in 1982 and $195 billion last year. Moreover, the President actively opposed congressional action to shrink deficits while proposing to put fiscal responsibility on the back burner by studying it to death. In combination with diminished income during the recession, this policy has spelled disaster for housing as costs continued rising while incomes fell.

Since January, the debilitating impact on the housing outlook of the deficit has become even more apparent. Genuine crowding out has begun to occur with interest rates climbing a point or more. The Federal funds rate, the prime rate, mortgage rates, and CD's have all risen at least 1 percentage point in the last 3 months and they are continuing to increase.

The housing industry knows what this means. They can see past the White House rhetoric of recovery and good times ahead to the falling sales and recurring recession being foreshadowed by today's rising mortgage rates. Housing was off in 1981. It was off again in 1982; 1983 was a good year for housing—as the first year of recoveries invariably are. But 1984 may be down—and the surge of interest rates due to deficit crowding out guarantees that 1985 will be a bad year. Michael Sumichrest, of the National Association of Home Builders, has predicted that crowding out will push the prime rate to 15 percent by 1985, with mortgage rates hitting 15.75 percent.

Henry Kaufman of Salomon Bros. has made a similar interest rate prediction. It is awfully hard to counter these predictions based on the $900 billion in deficits facing this Nation over the next 4 years. That is especially true in light of the only weak assault on them proposed by the administration.

Both Lehman Bros. and the Joint Economic Committee's econometric simulations found that the administration's proposed $144 billion deficit reduction package does not have the muscle even to reverse the rising deficit fund. By 1987, it will still be in the $200 billion range. Interest rates will remain high. And the JEC report projects that housing starts through 1989 will sag and remain at the low 1.5 million unit rate widely predicted by others for 1985.

This predicted impact of the deficit on housing activity will be disastrous for some families. As the attached table shows, the 1980–82 recession cut growth in the housing supply to only 37 percent of the growth in new family formations. From 1984 to 1989, the stagnation in housing due to the deficit will continue that pattern. According to a JEC analysis, fewer than 8 additional housing units will be supplied for every 10 new households. This week housing outlook for the balance for the decade is in sharp contrast with that sector's experience during the two previous decades.

From 1960 to 1979, the housing stock grew an average 2 percent faster than the number of households. From 1984 to 1989, however, better than 20 percent of all new families will be forced to double up with relatives or friends. By 1989, the term "crowding out" will come to have a uniquely different meaning to millions of Americans.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, for a table entitled "The Housing Outlook" to appear at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE HOUSING OUTLOOK

	1960–79	1980–82	1984–89
Change in the Housing Stock [1]	1.3	0.78	1.25*
Change in total households [1]	1.27	2.07	1.63
Ratio of housing stock/household change	1.02	0.37	0.77*

[1] Million of housing units per year.

RISING COST

Mr. President, the declining availability of housing argues powerfully for retention of the present deductibility of home mortgage interest payments despite administration objections. An equally powerful argument is economic: Deficit-driven rising mortgage costs are pricing homeownership out of the reach of all but the very wealthy.

The median new house sells today for $78,000. Most new families would finance that home with a $60,000 mortgage. Mortgage lenders realize that no more than 25 percent of a family's income can be safely set aside for housing costs. As a result, rising interest costs are forcing more and more families to forgo homeownership and the stabilizing ties to a community they create. The U.S. League of Savings Institutions reports that the number of first-time home buyers needing a second income to afford housing has risen above 65 percent. As Ellen Goodman put it in a recent column, "Today we need two jobs to support one mortgage."

The culprit is the deficit and its impact on interest rates. With interest rates at 8 percent, 30 percent of all families can meet mortgage requirements while devoting no more than one-quarter of their income to housing and related costs. At a 10-percent mortgage rate, the share drops to 22 percent. And if mortgage rates move as predicted to 15 percent, the deficits since 1979 will have cut the number of families able to afford homeownership by over one-half. Indeed, the impact of crowding out on mortgages will reduce the number of families able to afford homeownership to a scant one in nine.

Failure to rapidly reverse the deficit trend will reduce the flame of homeownership to a flicker. It will be doused by Treasury red ink to the detriment of new families and our society. Homeownership has a remarkably stabilizing influence on communities and families. That influence should be promoted, for it means more involvement in public affairs, ranging from school matters to political issues. The Federal Government has an obligation to maximize that influence. Indeed, the President has just spent nearly a week expounding on these same virtues to the People's Republic of China. And well he should, for homeownership gives a family a greater stake in their community and our Nation. And integral to promoting that stake is the present tax treatment of homeownership.

The deductibility of home mortgage interest should be retained to continue promoting community stability and involvement. Moreover, it should be retained for equity considerations. Homeownership is the most diverse and largest form in which household wealth is held in the United States. So, for current home owners, when, where and how to purchase a home were decisions made in years past based on a wide variety of factors, including tax considerations. It is simply not good public policy to whimsically yank the rug out from under the feet of tens of millions of homeowners, as the President has hinted he may do.

It is not good public policy. It is not good economic policy. It is not good social policy. It was not good policy in 1981 when the Senate unanimously adopted my resolution in support of continuing the deductibility of home mortgage interest. That sent a message.

My resolution is designed to send that same message again in a clear and strong voice to the President. The deductibility of home mortgage interest should remain in place. It achieves its purposes well. And Congress will not permit him to change it. My father once told me, "if it isn't broken, don't fix it." That is good advice for President Reagan, too.●

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED

FEDERAL BOAT SAFETY ACT

CHILES AMENDMENT NO. 3044

Mr. CHILES proposed an amendment to amendment No. 3027 proposed by Mr. BAKER (and others) to the bill H.R. 2163, an act to amend the Federal Boat Safety Act, and for other purposes, as follows:

Strike all matters appearing on page 19, and insert in lieu thereof:

(a) "SEC. . It is the Sense of Congress that total Budget Authority available for appropriations for Budget Function 050 National Defense) and for non-defense discretionary programs shall not exceed $431.3 billion for FY1985; of which $290.8 billion is intended to be for National Defense and $140.5 billion is intended to be for non-defense discretionary programs; that for FY1986, the total Budget Authority for these activities shall not exceed $462.8 billion, of which $321.0 billion is intended to be for National Defense and $141.8 billion for non-defense discretionary programs; and that for FY1987, the total Budget Authority for these activities shall not exceed $497.5 billion of which $354.3 billion is intended to be for National Defense and $143.2 billion is intended to be for non-defense discretionary programs."

(b) SEC. . Delay for 2 years of cost-of-living adjustments to tax tables.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Subsection (f) of section 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to adjustments in tax tables so that inflation will not result in tax increases) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(6) SPECIAL RULE FOR 1985 AND 1986.—Notwithstanding the provisions of this subsection, for taxable years beginning before January 1, 1987, no increase shall be made under clause (ii) of paragraph (2)(A) of this subsection and no adjustment shall be made under paragraph (2)(C) relating to such increase."

(b) BASE YEAR.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Subparagraph (B) of section 1(f)(3) of such Code (relating to cost-of-living adjustment) is amended by striking out "1983" and inserting in lieu thereof "1985".

(2) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by paragraph (1) shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1986.

NOTICES OF HEARINGS

COMMITTEE ON ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I would like to announce for the information of the Senate and the public, the scheduling of a public hearing before the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources to consider Senate Joint Resolution 286, to approve the "Compact of Free Association," and for other purposes. The hearing will be held on Thursday, May 24, beginning at 10 a.m. in room SD-366 of the Dirksen Senate Office Building.

Those wishing to testify or who wish to submit written statements for the hearing record should write to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

For further information regarding this hearing you may wish to contact Mr. Jim Beirne or Ms. Becky Barbour of the committee staff at 224-2564.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, I would like to announce for the information of the public that the Select Committee on Indian Affairs will be holding hearings on May 9, 1984, beginning at 1:30 p.m., in Senate Dirksen 124 on S. 2614, a bill to amend the Indian Finance Act of 1974, and S. 2619, a bill to reauthorize title IV, Indian Education Act programs, and to be followed by a business meeting on the following bills, and for other purposes:

S. 1735. A bill entitled the "Shoalwater Bay Indian Tribe-Dexter by the Sea Claim Settlement Act".

S. 1999. A bill to provide for the statutory designation of the position of Assistant Secretary of the Interior for Indian Affairs, eliminate the position of Commissioner of Indian Affairs, make conforming amendments, repeal unnecessary provisions of law referring to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

S. 2166. A bill to reauthorize the Indian Health Care Improvement Act, and for other purposes.

Those wishing additional information should contact Paul Alexander of the committee at 224-2251.

AUTHORITY FOR COMMITTEES TO MEET

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE, NUTRITION, AND FORESTRY

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry be authorized to meet during the sessions of the Senate on Wednesday, May 2, to hold a business meeting to mark up the following bills:

S. 1994, a bill to amend the National School Lunch Act to reinstate income eligibility criteria for family or group day care home participants in the child care food program;

S. 2545, Nutrition Programs Reform Act;

S. 1913, a bill to provide for improvements in the school lunch and certain other child nutrition programs; a proposed measure by Senator Dole; and

S. 2599, a bill to simplify the administration, contain escalating costs and create greater flexibility in the operation of programs under the National School Lunch and the Child Nutrition Act of 1966.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PERMANENT SUBCOMMITTEE ON INVESTIGATIONS

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, of the Committee on Governmental Affairs, be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Wednesday, May 2, at 10 a.m., to hold an oversight hearing on the Hotel Employees and Restaurant Employees International Union.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND HUMAN RESOURCES

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Labor and Human Resources be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Wednesday, May 2, to hold a hearing on the nomination of Mr. Frank Casillas to be Assistant Secretary of Labor for Employment and Training.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

THE AMERICAN STEEL INDUSTRY: MYTH VS. REALITY: 1

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, today I begin a series of brief statements that will appear periodically in an effort to elevate the level of debate on the crisis in the steel industry.

One of the things I have observed in the Senate is that many people have little experience with and therefore little understanding of the steel industry. Instead of such understanding we get cliches and stereotypes—the industry is poorly managed; its workers are overpaid; it has been protected from imports but has squandered the opportunity. All these statements are misleading, yet they represent what passes for debate on steel issues in Washington.

In an effort to provide a better factual basis for that debate—which will be a major topic of discussion in the Congress and the executive branch this summer—I want to explore, one at a time, some myths and realities about the industry. This exercise will not produce agreement about what course of action is appropriate for the industry or even on what the problems are, but it may help to provide a common set of facts from which we can all work.

MYTH

American steel producers are not as efficient as foreign steel producers.

REALITY

Despite aging equipment and a lower percentage of continuous casting than either Japan or Europe, American steelmakers are more efficient in their use of some inputs than their foreign counterparts.

In 1983, American steel producers had a higher percentage yield at actual operating rates than either France or the United Kingdom.

At actual operating rates, labor productivity for American steel manufacturers is higher than that of Japan and Europe.

The strong raw materials position of U.S. producers, together with the basic strengths of the American economy (for example highly developed capital markets, access to advanced technology, large home market) still provide American steelmakers with significant long-run production advantages over foreign producers.

MYTH

The American steel industry has been protected from imports for the past 10 years.

REALITY

In 1974, foreign imports claimed 13.4 percent of the American steel market. Last month foreign steelmakers claimed over 26 percent of the U.S. market. Such penetration, in absolute terms, hardly constitutes protection.

In relative terms, U.S. steel producers have been protected much less than Japanese and European steel makers. In Japan, the Government restricted steel imports to 1 million tons yearly from 1950-78. (In contrast 1983 U.S. imports were 17 million tons.) Nontariff barriers excluded both European and American producers from the market. In Europe, the European Community has sought to coordinate an extensive program of market controls since 1975. Prices have been regulated by the Government and markets have been strictly allocated. By 1978, moreover, agreements had been reached with all major exporters to the European market, stringently limiting imports into the Community. A bilaterial agreement with Japan limits Japanese imports. (It is significant to note that Japan sold 75 times as much steel to the United States as it did to Europe in 1981.)

MYTH

In the face of stiff competition, U.S. steel producers have failed to improve their operations.

REALITY

The American steel industry has made vigorous efforts to improve operations in recent years. Many technological innovations have been introduced, including recycling and resource recovery from waste materials, process control and sensor development and rapid in process analysis of liquid metal. Significant improvments include the following:

Average blast furnace output has increased by over 50 percent since 1971.

Continuous casting capacity will double in the next 5 years.

Overhead costs have been reduced by approximately 25 percent.

Stringent energy conservation measures have been adapted by the industry.

MYTH

American steel producers are suffering losses because the United States can no longer produce steel competitively. Inefficiency, not foreign imports, lies at the heart of the industry's problems.

REALITY

The major cause of the American steel crisis is the existence of excess capacity abroad and foreign government interference in the steel industry. Instead of cutting back production in the face of lower global demand, governments are subsidizing continued production in inefficient steel plants in order to avoid the political problems associated with increased unemployment.

Fully 70 percent of all the steel companies in Europe are dependent on the state. Since 1975, these companies have received over $25 billion in subsidies. Before 1985, these producers will receive an additional $20 billion. In Japan, the Government has aided steelmakers by controlling raw materials prices (including oil) through buying cartels.

Massive governmental interference in foreign steel industries has distorted the operation of the market mechanism in steel trade. Private steel producers in the United States cannot compete with the resources of foreign governments. As a result of European government subsidies for steel during the period of 1979–81, American steel shipments dropped by 6.5 million tons and gross revenue losses totaled $3.2 billion.●

MISSING CHILDREN

● Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, missing children represent a growing national tradgedy. The U.S. Department of Health and Human Services has estimated that each year approximately 1.8 million children are missing from their homes for varying periods of time. Of that number at least 100,000 children are abducted by parents locked in child custody and visitation disputes; 70 percent of these children will probably never be seen by the other parent again.

Marian C. Abram, an attorney with the Cleveland, OH, law firm of Walter, Haverfield, Buescher & Chockley, has authored a timely article entitled "How To Prevent or Undo a Child Snatching" which was published in the May 1984 edition of the American Bar Association Journal.

I ask that the text of the article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

HOW TO PREVENT OR UNDO A CHILD SNATCHING

(By Marian C. Abram)

The marriage of Nicholas and Susie Bonis was in trouble. She left their home in Colorado and moved to Brooklyn with their young daughter. Nicholas filed an action in Colorado for dissolution of the marriage. Susie got notice of the petition but was not formally served with it. She moved to Miami Beach with their daughter and filed her own dissolution petition there.

When he was served with the Florida petition, Nicholas quickly traveled to Miami, and in what Susie called a "devious fashion" snatched the six-year-old girl from a day care school. He took the child to Massachusetts for a month. When they returned to Colorado, police took custody of the girl, acting on a court order Susie had obtained in Florida. He contended that Susie had previously snatched the girl while the youngster was in Miami for a visit.

A Florida appellate court, noting that "child snatching is one of the evils" of custody fights, decided to let the Colorado courts decide the internecine feud. (Bonis v. Bonis, 420 So.2d 104 (1982).)

THE 100,000 CHILD SNATCHINGS

Estimates indicate that more than 100,000 children each year are abducted by parents locked in child custody and visitation disputes; 70 percent of these children probably will never see the other parent again.

Many child snatching incidents involve confrontation or violence. The child is often reluctant, and the abducting parent often carries away a kicking, screaming and weeping youngster.

The parental kidnap victim is rarely placed in a stable environment. Spite, revenge or pride—and not love and genuine concern—are the reasons why most parents kidnap their children. The potential for harm is increased if the abducting parent is abusive or alcholic or both.

The abducting parent lives in constant fear of discovery by law enforcement officers or private investigators. He or she, therefore, may change his or her name and the name of the child and obtain new social security numbers. The fleeing parent may stay constantly on the move, perhaps living in motels and working odd jobs to obtain the bare essentials.

Lawyers easily can learn how to prevent the abduction of a client's child or respond to a successful child snatching. There are several basic, yet often ignored, strategies that can be employed to prevent or undo a parental abduction.

Several federal statutes have been enacted to help a parent whose child has been snatched by the spouse or former spouse, but the effectiveness of these laws will be no better than the lawyers who use them.

PREVENTING ABDUCTIONS

Until recent years, the legal system's response had been passive and ineffective. The Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act (UCCJA) was promulgated in 1969, recognizing that child snatching was encouraged by the ease with which an abducting parent could obtain a conflicting custody decree. The UCCJA utilized the "established home principle" of custody jurisdiction to confine child custody jurisdiction to one state.

The UCCJA now has been adopted in 48 states. However, judicial interpretations of the act have undermined its utility by expanding the opportunities for jurisdiction to rest in more than one state. Furthermore, the act fails to provide effective enforcement procedures and offers no means to locate and punish an abducting parent.

Congress responded to the recognized need for a comprehensive, national solution by enacting the Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act (PKPA) in 1980. Its general purposes are to "promote cooperation among the states in enforcement of custody and visitation orders, discourage continuing interstate controversies and conflicts, and deter interstate abduction of children," and it sets up a four-part scheme to fulfill these purposes.

First, the act directs states to give full faith and credit to valid foreign state custody decrees. 28 U.S.C. § 1738A(a). Second, it adopts the language of the UCCJA in establishing proper state jurisdiction over child custody orders. 28 U.S.C. § 1738A(b-g). Third, it expands the services available under the Federal Parent Locator Service, thus providing a national system for locating parents and children. 42 U.S.C. § 653. Finally, the act expands the Fugitive Felon Act to aid enforcement of existing state parental kidnapping felony laws. 18 U.S.C. § 1073.

The preventive aspects of the PKPA include the uniform child custody jurisdiction requirements and the full faith and credit requirement. The expansion of the Federal Parent Locator Service and the Fugitive Felon Act, however, apply in post-snatch situations and are geared to enhance the success of locating and punishing parental child abductors.

INITIAL STEPS AFTER A SNATCHING

When a child snatching has occurred, the best advice a lawyer can give the client is to remain calm. Although that is understandably a difficult request, extreme emotionalism thwarts calculated logic and constructive planning.

The attorney also should impress on the client the importance of refraining from illegal actions. Not only might that behavior subject the client to legal sanctions, it also may reflect adversely on the searching parent's fitness to retain custody. The chances of locating the child are greatly enhanced when a recovery strategy is adopted to make the most of every available legal measure.

The first essential step is for the client to report the abduction to local police. The sooner the police are contacted, the better the chances that promote investigation will uncover worthwhile clues. You also should consider if a criminal prosecution will be appropriate. In states where child abduction by a parent is a felony, criminal charges are necessary to trigger the investigative provisions of several federal statutes. Nonetheless, the client's feelings on the matter take priority.

If criminal charges are appropriate, the client or the lawyer should submit to the local authorities a missing persons report and a request for an "NCIC entry." The National Crime Information Center (NCIC), operated by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, can prove helpful once a warrant has been issued in a state where child snatching is a felony. Local officials enter identifying information into NCIC, and if an absconding parent is stopped in antoher state, the parent can be arrested and extradited to the original state.

PERSISTENT FOLLOWUP

Local prosecutors often are reluctant to institute criminal charges, even in states where child snatching is a felony. You must be persistent in following up on the criminal complaint filed by or on behalf of the client. The attorney should inform the client of any snags encountered in the criminal process and what action has been taken in response. This may minimize the feelings of frustration and helplessness that often cause a client to resort to illegal measures.

The investigative services of the FBI may be utilized through the provisions of the Fugitive Felon Act (18 U.S.C. § 1073), which was expanded by the PKPA to encompass parental kidnapping.

Although the prerequisites for triggering the provisions of the Fugitive Felon Act are numerous, they are more liberal than those in effect before 1982. First, parental kidnapping must be a felony in the state in which it occurred. Second, a state felony prosecution must have been initiated and a warrant issued. Third, the local prosecutor must apply to the U.S. attorney general for issuance of a federal "unlawful flight to avoid prosecution" warrant, which will issue if the first two prerequisites have been satisfied.

Once the federal warrant is secured, the FBI will try to locate the abducting parent. After being found, the abducting parent can be extradited to the original state, and the pending criminal prosecution can then proceed.

INVESTIGATIVE TECHNIQUES

Another option available to the searching parent is the Federal Parent Locator Service (FPLS, 42 U.S.C. § 663). The PKPA also expanded the coverage of this federal statute to assist existing state parent locator services.

Again there are a number of prerequisites. First, a voluntary agreement must exist between the state and the federal government allowing the state to utilize the FPLS. Second, only an "authorized person," not the client or the attorney, may apply directly to the FPLS for assistance. An authorized person may be the court or agent of a court having jurisdiction to make or enforce a child custody decree, or an agent or attorney of the United States or a state that has the duty to investigate, enforce or prosecute the wrongful taking or restraint of a child. Thus, the role of the attorney is to petition the court or to prompt the local prosecutor to request FPLS assistance.

Unfortunately, a computer search through the FPLS may have limited success. The search uses the known social security number of the abducting parent to provide the home and work addresses of that parent. Unless the present employer of the abducting parent has updated an active employee list, the FPLS will show the abducting parent unemployed, or employed at the job held prior to the abduction. If the abducting parent changes identities and obtains a new social security number, the search will be fruitless. So the FPLS, although theoretically useful, should not be relied on as the exclusive means to locate the abducting parent.

The attorney also may encourage the client to use other investigative practices. First, the client may employ a reputable private investigator. The searching parent should also contact his or her friends, neighbors and close relatives—as well as the friends, neighbors, relatives and co-workers of the abducting parent. These people may supply helpful information concerning the plans and whereabouts of the abducting parent, and they should be encouraged to offer any additional information they may receive if the abducting parent contacts them.

School officials should be contacted to determine if and where the child's records were transferred. The bank, post office or credit card companies that served the abducting parent should be contacted. A state bureau of motor vehicles recently may have registered a car and issued a new license in the abducting parent's name. Finally, once a particular state of locale has been identified, telephone and utility companies may be able to provide a new listing for the abducting parent.

PREVENTING A SNATCH

When your client fears that a child snatching may occur, you should respond as quickly as possible to prevent it. The attorney should petition the court for a temporary custody order or an ex parte possession order if a divorce or legal separation proceeding is pending and a child custody decree has not yet been issued. A court decree also gives leverage to the parent who later seeks return of the child, should an abduction occur.

Because the client may not recognize that an abduction is imminent, the attorney must review the facts to be able to foresee that possibility. Marshall Wolf, a Cleveland lawyer who testified at the UCCJA legislative hearings in Ohio, offers several helpful guidelines. He believes that the key is the flexibility of the suspected parent's lifestyle. For example, the abducting parent may have the kind of skills or career that make it easy to find a job elsewhere. The individual may hold no stable tie to his or her present community and have a support system of out-of-state friends or close relatives.

The practitioner should look beyond the obvious question of how the suspected parent relates with the children and discover, if possible, how the individual behaves outside the home environment. For example, if the suspected parent is financially irresponsible and has several creditors pressing delinquent bills, the chances of abduction are increased.

THE CHILD CUSTODY DECREE

If the threat of child snatching exists, the child custody decree should anticipate and comprehensively address the abduction issue. Almost without exception, removing the child should require the custodial parent's written consent. Custody decrees may require the removing parent to post a surety bond. A liquidated damage clause also may be included to compensate the custodial parent for any expenses incurred in enforcing the custody provisions.

Finally, the circumstances may warrant a provision specifying the custodial parent's right or intention to seek police assistance on the parent's wrongful taking of the child. For additional suggestions, you should read Hoffman, Schulman, Volenik and O'Daniel, Interstate Child Custody Disputes and Parental Kidnapping, American Bar Association, Child Custody Clearinghouse and Information Exchange, Washington, D.C. (1982).

An additional safeguard may be found in the Federal Educational Rights and Privacy Act (FERPA, 20 U.S.C. § 1232 et seq.), which allows either parent to inspect and review their child's educational records. The right of the suspected parent to have the records transferred to another school may be restricted by a court decree. This is a rather drastic measure, however, which should be employed only when the threat of child snatching is great, because of the potential for engendering deeper hostility between the parents.

Where the child custody decree limits the noncustodial parent's rights under the FERPA, the custodial parent must file a copy of the decree with the school to ensure that it will be obeyed. Even if the custody decree does not restrict the noncustodial parent's FERPA rights, should the child be abducted, the other parent may obtain the name, address and telephone number of the school to which the child's educational records have been transferred.

FLEEING THE COUNTRY

Several approaches are available to minimize the possibility of international flight. First, removal limitations in the custody decree may be drafted to cover both interstate and international travel. The custody decree also may prohibit the noncustodial parent from seeking a passport for the child or may require prior written consent from the custodial parent. A copy of the custody decree should be filed with the State Department Office of Passport Services to ensure compliance. In addition, the custodial parent may retain a passport issued in the child's name; thus precluding the issuance of another passport in the child's true name.

The attorney, however, should be cautious not to draft a custody decree that is so adverse, threatening and demeaning to the noncustodial parent that child snatching is encouraged rather than avoided. The provisions already discussed should be drafted in neutral terms to minimize the frustration and anger of the potential abductor.

For example, a clause completely prohibiting the child's removal from the locale or state is rather threatening, but it is sometimes necessary. Usually, however, removal and visitation rights may simply be restricted as to place, time or duration, or some other reasonable contingency, such as the age of the child.

JOINT CUSTODY ISSUES

Using joint custody decrees to prevent child snatching has generated much commentary. Proponents argue that joint custody reduces the frustration and anger that lead a parent, whose rights have been ignored by the court, to seek revenge through child abduction. Opponents, however, contend that joint custody is a legal cop-out. Joint custody often covers up and prevents the parents from addressing important issues concerning the child's welfare. In addition, the problems that led to the divorce may remain unresolved, and parental frustration and anger may be intensified rather than dissipated.

Marshall Wolf opposes the indiscriminate use of joint custody. He believes that joint custody works only in those rare situations when both parents overcome their personal differences to recognize and address the needs of the children. Joint custody, according to Wolf, only prolongs the inevitable. "One who will snatch their child, will snatch," he says, regardless of what label is attached to the custody decree.

Other available preventive techniques are worthy of mention. Perhaps the simplest solution, although not always the most practical, is to instill in the child an obligation to notify the custodial parent of his or her whereabouts. In this manner, even if in the company of the other parent, a responsible child will attempt to contact the custodial parent. Likewise, if the abducting parent has told the child that the other parent is dead or seriously injured, the insightful client will have instructed the child to call a relative, neighbor or friend "just in case anything ever happens to me."

The client should take periodic photographs of the child, such as school pictures. If the child is abducted, efforts by law enforcement officers to locate the child will be enhanced greatly if the authorities are supplied with a recent photograph of the child. The younger child should be photographed more often than the older child. Success in locating the child also will be enhanced if the local police are provided with a set of the child's fingerprints, which should be taken periodically as the child grows.

WHISKED AWAY DESPITE PLANS

No prevention plan is foolproof. Despite thorough planning, a child may still be kidnapped by one parent and whisked across state lines. The best a practitioner can do is anticipate that possibility, strive to prevent it and hope that the worst never occurs.

All is not lost, however, if the client's child is kidnapped. The PKPA offers several investigative aids that, in combination with local enforcement efforts, may help in locating the abducting parent and child. In addition, the jurisdictional and full faith and credit requirements of the act strengthen the legal right of the custodial parent to have the child returned. In the final analysis, however, responsibility for reducing the incidents of parental child abduction rests in the hands of the practitioner.

TOURISM IS OUR LARGEST BUSINESS

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, as a founder and a cochairman of the Senate Tourism Caucus, I want to take this occasion to herald what might be another first: The emergence of travel and tourism as the Nation's largest and most important business, and as the Nation's largest employer.

Eric Friedheim, the editor of Travel Agent magazine, makes a convincing case for this claim in an editorial contained in a recent issue of the publication. I shall submit the text of the article for the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

If this is indeed the case and if travel and tourism is the largest business in America, it lends added significance to the commemoration later this month of National Tourism Week. Appropriately, it is the Memorial Day holiday weekend that launches National Tourism Week; it is this same holiday weekend which launches the summer vacation season—and all the travel and tourism it entails—for most Americans.

For those Americans who are a part of the industry, and for those of us concerned about the vitality of the industry, the 1984 Memorial Day weekend and National Tourism Week, 1984, will provide us with an occasion to emphasize the industry's importance.

First or second in size, the travel and tourism industry's significance has never been lost on the members of the Senate Tourism Caucus. Nor has it been anything but paramount among my own concerns.

Take my home State of Tennessee for instance. My family and I spend a great deal of vacation time in the State. During 1981, we traveled across the State, visiting and staying at some of the hundreds of tourist attractions Tennessee has to offer, and attending some of the festivals and events one will find at any time of the year in the State.

The U.S. Travel Data Center says that during that year—the most recent for which such figures are available—travel and tourism generated 73,000 jobs in Tennessee. This is 4.2 percent of all the jobs in the State, making it the States second largest employer. The industry's payroll exceeded a half-billion dollars; represented over $2.7 billion in expenditures; provided $113.4 million in taxes to the Federal Government, $97.5 million to the State, and $30.1 million to Tennessee's local governments; and made the State realize $25.09 for every dollar it budgeted for tourism.

First or second largest, the significance and importance of the industry to my home State is clear—as it is to the 26 other States in which the industry is the first or second largest.

It should not really matter whether such an economic force is first or second largest. For Americans in 1984 the establishment of travel and tourism as the Nation's largest industry could help, however, to promote greater appreciation and understanding of the industry's role during National Tourism Week. Toward that end, I commend the case made in Travel Agent magazine.

The article follows:

THE FIGURES PUT TRAVEL ON TOP

(By Eric Friedheim)

Is tourism America's largest business and employer? Yes, says Somerset Waters, veteran economist and author of the authoritative Travel Industry World Yearbook.

In his 1984 edition, Waters disagrees with President Reagan who put travel in second place among the nation's trades. The president offered this assessment while signing a proclamation fixing May 24-June 2 as National Tourism Week.

The chief executive conceded that tourism is extremely important to the U.S. because of its substantial contributions to employment, prosperity, international understanding and world commerce.

Waters and a few others, including this magazine, challenge the way the government gathers its statistics on how much money and how many jobs our industry generates.

Since few congressmen and policy-makers display more than a smattering of facts and figures. Waters supplies data from several federal bureaus to back up his claim putting travel on top of the heap. Up to now, the principal sources of computing how much is spent on travel have been the Census Bureau and the U.S. Travel Data Center, a national non-profit research center for travel and tourism.

For its estimates, Census only computes trips of at least 100 miles from home. This is fine as far as it goes. But what about trips closer in, say 25 to 99 miles?

People just don't remember such trips when filling out questionnaires, claims Census.

This is not only ridiculous, arbitrary and a disservice to the trade, it flies in the face of some rather authoritative definitions of what constitutes a trip.

Congress came up with its own when it passed the National Tourism Policy Act in 1981. It describes the travel industry as one that provides services to those journeying outside the same community for any purpose not related to day-to-day activity.

Some years earlier, the National Tourism Resources Commission defined a tourist as one who travels at least 50 miles from home for any purpose except commuting.

The Travel Industry Association of American (TIA) accepts the congressional definition which has no minimum mileage.

Based on Census' 100-mile concept, the industry provides 4.5 million jobs. However, if all travel except local and commuter traffic is counted, the figure is more like 11 million.

Waters builds his case on a rather solid statistical foundation. He uses Canadian travel patterns as well as a new study by the General Accounting Office.

The Canadians not only count journeys of more than 100 miles, they also tabulate trips of 25 to 99 miles. These shorter hauls account for 39 percent of the country's entire domestic expenditures, say officials north of the border.

Now consider America's short-haul picture. Substantial numbers of Americans also take trips of less than 100 miles. Waters notes, for example, that in California 80 percent of the population lives less than 40 miles from the beach, to which thousands of local vacationers flock. For that matter, the Census Bureau itself says that nearly a third of all Americans live within 50 miles of either the East or West Coasts.

Waters offers more ammunition for the short-haul argument. He points out that there are mainly two classes of travel: city to city and city to resort. Many are less than 100 miles apart such as Washington and Baltimore (each with many attractions. Waters points out); New England and Cape Cod; Midwest cities and the Great Lakes; New York and Atlantic City. Many U.S. attractions, state fairs and other events depend on luring residents of nearby communities. Short-haul motorcoach trips and tours, car rentals and weekend hotel and resort packages are proliferating.

Though there has been no significant U.S. research on the dollars and jobs generated by short-distance touring, Waters believes valid assumptions can be made out of the Canadian experience.

"If we accept the Canadian figure of 39 percent as representing this traffic, then we have an estimate of total domestic travel spending in the U.S. for trips over 25 miles from home that comes to $298 billion in 1982," says Waters.

"We arrive at this by using the accepted figure produced by the U.S. Travel Data Center of $182 billion for trips over 100 miles (representing 61 percent of the total), and $116 billion (representing 39 percent of the total).

"Is this Canadian percentage applicable in the U.S.? One way to check is to use data produced by the U.S. Department of Transportation. According to DOT surveys, 30.1 percent of all domestic passenger miles, by all modes of transportation, take place on trips 21 to 100 miles from home."

Waters says that $13 billion spent by foreign visitors in 1982 should be added to the $298 billion in domestic spending on trips of at least 25 miles for a grand total of $311 billion.

For his research, Waters induced a Senate committee to ask the General Accounting Office to estimate how many jobs tourism creates. GAO computed that each $1 billion created 35,602 jobs.

"With total spending for travel and tourism reaching approximately $311 billion in 1982, the industry represents 10 percent of the GNP," Waters concluded. "This puts tourism spending well ahead of spending at food stores ($253 billion) or at auto dealers ($182 billion). In fact, even if our estimates are not precise, it is safe to conclude that the business of travel and tourism is by far the largest private business in America."●

WESTERN MEDIA MISSING MESSAGE IN SOUTH AFRICA

● Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, a young graduate student at the University of Missouri-Columbia School of Journalism, recently shed some new light on the South Africa question. What is interesting about Mr. Louis Heyneman's article is that he presents the policy issues in an honest, forthright manner, something other journalists would do well to try once in a while, especially when dealing with matters that need careful study and wisdom, not prejudicial polemicism.

I commend Mr. Heyneman. He is a new brand of journalist who, unlike the easy journalists of hollow rhetoric, seeks to stimulate his readers to consider real answers.

I ask that the article, "Western Media Missing Message in South Africa" by Louis Heyneman be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

[From the Columbia (MO) Daily Tribune, Apr. 1, 1984]

WESTERN MEDIA MISSING MESSAGE IN SOUTH AFRICA

(By Louis Heyneman)

When it comes to the violation of human rights, the Republic of South Africa probably has the worst reputation among all nations. The South Africa domestic policy of separate development, known as apartheid, had driven a wedge between the Western world and South Africa. Worldwide, South Africa has become a symbol of repression.

But how many people outside South Africa have first-hand knowledge of that country's situation?

The mass media form the opinions of millions of U.S. citizens, who have no reason not to accept the views and analysis of journalists about South Africa. But as a South African journalist, I have become disillusioned by the manner in which events in South Africa are reported in the U.S. media. Their views are so biased that U.S. citizens are simply not getting the full picture of my country.

A prime reason is that the news media and the outside world expect discrimination and racial conflict in South Africa—a perception that has been built up during years. Therefore, any event that might point to conflict or racial disharmony in South Africa is widely reported. Events like these fulfill the expectations and are conceived by the public as credible and newsworthy.

I am not trying to defend South Africa's apartheid policy in any way, but I strongly object to the media's lack of balanced coverage. The Western world is not being informed about the new generation in South Africa—people with a strong sense of moral obligation toward their fellow man regardless of the color of his skin.

While reporting about the Middle East, Central America or Northern Ireland, the mass media choose to objectively describe the facts and, perhaps, predict the outcome of conflicts in those places. But when reporting about South Africa, correspondents always make judgments. And a result, the South African government is almost always presented as the villain and bully.

As a result of this bias, peace initiatives by the South African government traditionally never receive any credit. Instead, any steps toward domestic peace or away from racial discrimination are described by "observers" as calculated steps to improve the government's image and credibility.

For instance, during the past months, South Africa initiated a peace drive with its neighboring countries. South Africa declared its willingness to resolve the Namibia border dispute "without any conditions except the realization of peace."

Recognizing the positive aspects of the South African peace drive, however, wouldn't be in the U.S.' interest; the Third World might perceive such support as favoring racism. Because of this thinking, the media never report progress made by the South African government, nor are its attempts to eliminate discrimination reported. To report that South Africa has increased the per capita expenditure for black education by 230 percent during 1975–1980 and again by 51 percent in 1981–82, to mention one example, would appear as if the United States is favoring South Africa in the dispute.

Financial disinvestment is a direct result of this attitude. The policy in the United States has been for years that economic sanctions and isolation are ways in which U.S. citizens can show their solidarity with the struggling and oppressed blacks in South Africa. In fact, any kind of investment by a U.S. company in South Africa is looked upon as approving and supporting racism and is subsequently heavily criticized.

What is overlooked, however, is this: Disinvestment harms South Africa, but it harms black South Africans first. Continued divestment would mean that thousands of black workers will lose their jobs.

Economic growth is an important key to social change.

The well-known South African industrialist Harry Oppenheimer, chairman of the Anglo-American Corp. of South Africa, summed it up in an interview with a Zurich financial newspaper: "Many people, particularly in the U.S. and Britain, are demanding two totally contradictory things. On the one hand, they want to help the blacks by not investing in South Africa, and on the other hand, they demand that wages and other conditions are improved. But you cannot achieve improvements in the field of wages and other working conditions if industry is not registering a steady growth."

In an interview with the London Daily Express, Oppenheimer said: "The only way to bring about peaceful change is to allow a modern economy to build up which cannot exist without the participation of vast numbers of black people holding skilled and highly paid jobs."

What is ironic, perhaps, is that local companies, influenced by the U.S. example, are struggling to follow it. After Henry Ford visited South Africa in 1976, he said: "We regard training and education as the key element in opening doors to equal opportunity. Equal pay for the same work is a firm policy of ours."

Even those who oppose apartheid the most have to realize that changes don't come overnight. The economic implications of a completely new order make immediate change a revolution when it could have been a peaceful evolution.

If the Western world demands an instant new order, they're demanding an immediate redistribution of wealth. That is a matter of choice between capitalism and socialism.

It's interesting to note that U.S. citizens would have been in a situation similar to South Africa's if 800 million native Americans were living in this country today.

If the native American community had a strong desire to keep its own language, culture and traditions—which are the right of all human beings—how many U.S. citizens would be convinced that the social values, language and education of Western civilization should be forced upon these people to ensure the economic development of the United States as a world leader in technology and production?

The crux of the matter is, have white South Africans changed in their hearts and minds? My answer is: yes.

Does everybody really believe that a civilized nation that reads books and newspapers and studies at schools and universities is not aware of the social implications and inhumanity of racial discrimination? Does the Western world really believe we are not trying to reform and that we are not committed to change to ensure a peaceful coexistence for both black and white in South Africa?

At the moment, South Africa is a handy scapegoat with which the Western world can clear its conscience of its own history of racial discrimination. No wonder some South Africans think they have to carry the blame for all the racism in the world today—as if racism doesn't exist in other parts of the world.

You can imagine how difficult if is for us to understand why one of the presidential candidates is telling voters he would like to close all U.S. airports to South African Airways. We see this as the politician's lip service to gain black support for his compaign.

My own experience in Columbia has been positive. I have met many people and have talked to students from various countries on this campus. In many ways, I think that I have broken through the barriers of isolation from which most young South Africans suffer.

Judging from the attitudes of people here, I have no reason to believe that the people of the United States are not willing to build bridges between their country and South Africa.

Even those that hold ideas different from mine and those who have preconceived ideas about South Africa are willing to discuss problems in a mature, civilized and understanding way. I have also had contact with black students from other African countries, and I have learned just as much from them as I hope they have learned from me.

Despite the problems, I still believe white South Africans can bring a complete about-face in that country and that a bloody revolution doesn't have to be the answer. History has shown us that power gained by violence is never freedom. It just becomes a new kind of oppression.●

MAINLAND HIGH SCHOOL RECOGNIZED FOR EXCELLENCE

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I want to share with my colleagues two articles written about the same school, Mainland High School in Daytona Beach, FL.

Mainland High School has been nominated as one of the top schools in the country; 10 of the 263 schools nominated nationwide are from Florida. The other schools nominated are: St. Petersburg High, Hialeah American Senior High, Jacksonville Terry Parker High, Hialeah Junior High, Dixie Hollins High of St. Petersburg, North Miami Beach Highland Oaks Junior High, Jacksonville's John Gorrie Junior High, Largo Middle School, and Thomas Jefferson Junior High of Merritt Island.

I ask that the editorial from the Daytona Times and news article from the Daytona Beach Evening News be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial and article follow:

[From the Daytona (FL) Times, Apr. 12-18, 1984]

MAINLAND HIGH SCHOOL: SYMBOL OF INTEGRATION

We would like to doff our hats in honor of Mainland Senior High School, and to congratulate the students on their inclusion as finalists in the 1984 Secondary School Recognition Program, announced last week in Washington, D.C., by Education Secretary T. H. Bell.

For Volusians, particularly Daytonans, who have been following progress in the school over the past years, the selection of Mainland Senior High in the nationwide school recognition program, comes with very little surprise. As Bell announced Tuesday, the recognition program is an effort to select and honor the nation's outstanding public and private secondary schools. The recent visit to the school by Dr. Joseph Richardson of Georgia State University, who is also a member of the recognition project, gives credence to the outstanding characteristics of Mainland Senior High.

In view of this, one wonders why the United States Department of Education has been so long in officially recognizing the meritorious work being done in the school. Mainland Senior High has long deserved national attention.

Mainland Senior High has clearcut academic goals, higher expectations for students, a positive school climate, and a well-articulated curriculum. Student performance on standard achievement tests and minimum competency tests have been outstanding. The percentage of students who pursue post-secondary education and training is unexcelled. A good number of students who graduate from the school have been successful at finding jobs.

Of particular importance to Daytonans is the cordial atmosphere under which students carry out their work in the school. Contrary to the atmosphere in some other schools in the city, Mainland Senior High draws no dichotomy between Black and white students of the school. It is the school where "students are students."

The philosophy of progress through harmony and racial interaction practiced at Mainland Senior High is worthy of emulation. At a time when some schools in the city, Seabreeze Senior High School, for example, are prosecuting a Black administrator for no justifiable cause, mainland Senior High has maintained excellent human relations with students, staff and faculty, under the leadership of Jack E. Surrette, principal. Through administrative efficiency, Surrette has created a network of family relationships within the school.

For Surrette, no incident is too small to be attended to. No student is above the law. Discipline, fairness and justice are the watchwords. Under Surrette's administration, the school recognizes the importance of student involvement and participation in every aspect of school activity. Lawlessness, tardiness and acts of licentiousness have no place in the school. The greatest concern of the Surrette administration is to train students to become responsible citizens of the community in which they live.

As the search for the nation's top schools continues, Daytonans would like to congratulate Surrette, student, staff and faculty on their achievements, hoping that other schools will learn from their good example.

MAINLAND HIGH NOMINATED AS ONE OF NATION'S BEST SCHOOLS

(By John Carter)

Mainland High School is one of only 10 secondary schools in Florida and 263 nationwide selected as a finalist in a federally sponsored search for the top public schools in America.

The Daytona Beach School was included on a list released Tuesday in Washington by Education Secretary T. H. Bell. The finalists were chosen from a list of 555 nominees submitted by state school superintendents.

Selection teams composed of nongovernment officials will visit each of the 263 schools between now and mid-May, then convene in Washington in early July to pick the winners. If last year's results are a guide, about half of the schools on the list will earn a visit to the White House for their principals and the right to fly 4 by 6 foot "Flags of Excellence" on their flagpoles.

Other Florida schools honored with Mainland, according to The Associated Press, are St. Petersburg Dixie Hollins High, St. Petersburg High, Hialeah American Senior High, Jacksonville Terry Parker High, Hialeah Junior High, North Miami Beach Highland Oaks Junior High, Jacksonville John Gorrie Junior High, Largo Middle School and Merritt Island Thomas Jefferson Junior High.

"We're elated," Mainland Principal Jack Surrette said of the selection this morning, "This recognition belongs to the total school family."

Criteria for the awards program cover every facet of school operation, with special emphasis on the demographics of the student population, how many students go on to college and how they fare in higher education and student scores on standardized tests. There is heavy emphasis on quality of the faculty and whether teachers are being assigned work that is in harmony with the specialties for which they have been trained. "We rank very high in that category. We have excellent teachers," Surrette boasted.

Also measured is the school's success in human relations, its treatment of minorities and the amount of support it receives from parents and others in the community. The nominees' short term and longrange academic goals also come under scrutiny.

Surrette said he plans no special preparation for the visit of the examining team. "It will be business as usual. There won't be any fanfare. We want them to observe us as we are. We believe that the way we operate every day is the right way and we can meet inspection requirements," the principal said.

Last year, President Reagan honored 152 schools chosen from a list of 396 nominees. The Department of Education is sponsoring a separate program to recognize outstanding private schools and recently awarded a $370,000 grant to the Council for American Private Education to carry out that search in the near future.●

DELAY OF TELEPHONE SERVICE COSTS

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, a major issue facing small businesses across this country is the prospect of increased telephone service costs.

As my colleagues know, the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTEN) and I recently invited our fellow Senators to join us in writing to the Federal Communications Commission to urge that implementation of telephone access charge costs on small businesses be delayed.

At this time, I want to call to the attention of my colleagues a letter from Mr. John Sloan, Jr., president of the National Federation of Independent Business to the Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission. On behalf of the 560,000 members of this distinguished organization, Mr. Sloan carefully and persuasively presents the reasons for such a delay.

I ask that Mr. Sloan's letter to the Commission be printed in the RECORD and that my colleagues give his comments their careful attention. I also ask that a copy of the letter Senator KASTEN and I initiated be printed in the RECORD.

The letters follow:

APRIL 26, 1984.

Hon. MARK S. FOWLER,
Chairman, Federal Communications Commission, Washington, DC.

DEAR CHAIRMAN FOWLER: The decision by the FCC to impose access charges on businesses with more than one telephone line, by June of this year, has raised concerns within the small business community. Preliminary results of a survey of NFIB members show 60 percent with more than one line, indicating that a significant number of small businesses will be affected by this decision.

I am writing, on behalf of the 560,000 members of NFIB, to ask that you consider delaying these access charges, as the FCC has done for residential and single-line businesses, until June of 1985. Comments from the FCC indicate that the decision to delay the charges for residential and single-line business was based on a need for further study of the impact these charges would have. I am asking that you accord the same consideration to businesses with more than one line. Why should the independent business community be singled out at this time to bear these additional costs?

There are alternatives to the access charge approach and NFIB believes that these alternatives should be fully examined. Our members do not object to cost-based pricing, but whatever approach is taken they feel it is only fair that it be applied across-the-board. Delaying the access charges for businesses with more than one line would allow time for full consideration of alternatives and potentially more equitable solutions.

The impact that these additional charges will have on small business underscores the need for equitable treatment. In a mid-1983 study done by NFIB, small business owners ranked "telephone rates" as their fourth most severe problem. As small businesses do not operate with the same margin and flexibility as larger companies, the overall increases in telephone costs could be devastating in some cases. Is it fair to add costs for only one segment of the public, particularly given the difficulties which many will encounter in absorbing those costs?

NFIB is currently conducting a survey of its members asking such questions as how many telephone lines they have, what percentage of their calls are local or long-distance, and what level of monthly cost increases would cause them to reduce service. I will be in Washington the week of May 14th, at which time the full results of the survey should be in. I would like to arrange a meeting with you at that time in order to share these results with you.

I appreciate your consideration of this matter and hope that we will be able to meet and discuss the issue in more detail.

Sincerely,

JOHN SLOAN, Jr.,
President.

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC.

Hon. MARK S. FOWLER,
Chairman, Federal Communications Commission, Washington, DC.

DEAR CHAIRMAN FOWLER: We are writing to express our concern regarding the long distance telephone access charges for all businesses with more than one line, scheduled to go into effect in June of this year.

The effect this decision will have on small and medium-sized businesses appears to have been overlooked, as most businesses of this size have more than one line. These additional charges, coupled with the rise in local phone service costs, would place a substantial monthly burden on their already limited resources.

While the FCC has already delayed imposition of these fees for residential customers and businesses with only one phone line until June 1985, we are asking that small businesses with more than one line also be included in that provision. This interim period would allow the FCC to consider the development of a more equitable alternative.

We believe that to do so would be in the best interest of this country's millions of small businesses and the phone system as a whole.

Thank you for your time and consideration. We look forward to hearing from you.

Sincerely,

Bob Kasten, Quentin N. Burdick, William Proxmire, Spark M. Matsunaga, David Pryor, Paula Hawkins, Larry Pressler, Robert T. Stafford, Wendell H. Ford.●

FEDERAL CHARTER FOR THE NATIONAL ACADEMY OF PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I am pleased to announce that H.R. 3249, companion legislation to S. 2102, a bill to charter the National Academy of Public Administration was signed into law by the President on April 10, 1984. I introduced this legislation on November 16, 1983, together with Senator EAGLETON, ranking minority member of the Committee on Governmental Affairs. It was unanimously reported out of the Committee on the Judiciary on March 15, 1984, and passed the Senate on April 10. I would like to take this opportunity to thank all of my colleagues for the strong support which they have given this bill.

Such charters are awarded carefully. No academy has received a Federal charter since 1863, when President Abraham Lincoln signed legislation to charter the National Academy of Sciences. I believe that the National Academy of Public Administration (NAPA) is fully deserving of joining this distinguished institution in holding a Federal charter.

NAPA is a nonprofit collegial society which was founded in Washington, D.C., in 1967 by James E. Webb, then Administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration. It was created to provide a trusted source of counsel on public management concerns. Its mission is to help the Government at all levels to work more effectively. NAPA is an experienced, nonpartisan management and operations research organization that Congress and the President may call upon for assistance.

Through countless studies conducted for Federal Government department and many agencies, the Congress, the courts, and State and local governments, the National Academy has carried out its mission admirably. Dealing with issues as diverse as the role of the Presidency in the 1980's, commercialization of space, state welfare reorganization, and civil service reform, the National Academy has seen many of its recommendations become public policy.

The unique resource of NAPA is its membership; it is composed of more than 300 practitioners and scholars of public administration—former Cabinet members and Governors, White House officials, professional government managers, and scholars specializing in public affairs. The National Academy's members are elected by their peers. Dr. Phillip S. Hughes, Under Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, lends his expertise to the organization by serving as Chairman of the Board.

I commend the National Academy of Public Administration for this honor, the Federal charter, and I congratulate its members wholeheartedly.●

COMMEMORATING THE 36TH ANNIVERSARY OF ISRAELI INDEPENDENCE

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, on May 7, 1984, we commemorate the 36th anniversary of Israeli independence, declared by David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first Prime Minister, on May 14, 1948. As the Declaration of the Establishment of the State of Israel stated in its opening paragraph,

Israel was the birthplace of the Jewish people. Here their spiritual, religious and political identity was shaped.

The Hebrews settled in the territory during the 18th century B.C. After a period of enslavement in Egypt, the Israelites, led by Moses, began their arduous journey back to the promised land. It was King David who consolidated the tribes of Israel into a unified kingdom and established Jerusalem as its capital. It was here that the first temple was built—the very center of Judaism. Despite the destruction of the temple, conquest by foreign powers, and centuries of dispersal, Israel has continued to have significance for Jews throughout the world. The history of Israel and her people have been marked by struggle, a struggle which continues to this day.

Many men and women sacrificed their lives in order to win independence for the Jewish State. Many more have fought to preserve Jewish heritage and identity. The enduring spirit of the Jewish people and their quest for freedom and liberty has not been broken and will not be broken.

I have visited Yad Vashem, the Israeli memorial to the 6 million Jews senselessly slaughtered by the Nazis during World War II. This site serves as a testament to the Holocaust and those who perished because of their Jewish faith.

Today, millions of Soviet Jews still are persecuted by Soviet authorities: They are denied the freedom to train their children in the Jewish faith, banned from teaching Hebrew, and denied the right to emigrate to Israel. As a member of the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe, I am painfully aware of the plight of Soviet Jewry. I have repeatedly spoken out for those denied even the most basic of human rights.

Israel is our only reliable ally in the Middle East. It is a nation dedicated to democratic principles and the preservation of freedom.

The Middle East has played, and will continue to play, an important role in the security interests of the United States. The continued instability of this region serves to highlight the importance of the United States-Israel relationship. The influx of terrorist organizations, such as the Palestinian Liberation Organization, into the Middle East has only exacerbated the current destabilized situation. In addition, the fierce fighting in the Iran-Iraq war points to the volatile character of the region.

In the midst of this hostile environment, Israel has offered us the use of military bases, as well as storage facilities for the American rapid deployment force, an important facet in U.S. security planning. It is important to the strategic interest of both the United States and Israel that this cooperation continue. We cannot forsake our commitment to Israel, a democracy which faced constant adversity.

Since 1948, the United States and Israel have developed strong bonds of friendship and cooperation. The United States was the first nation to recognize the State of Israel and has consistently supported that nation. It is appropriate that during this time of commemoration of Israeli independence we renew our commitment to this faithful friend and loyal ally.

I thank the Chair.●

POLISH CONSTITUTION DAY

● Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, this Sunday marks the 193d anniversary of the adoption of the Polish Constitution in 1791, one of the great achievements in Polish history and one of the world's great historic documents of political freedom and religious tolerance. The Polish people's indomitable spirit and their dedication to freedom allowed them to create, just 2 years after the adoption of the U.S. Constitution, a document abolishing class distinction and declaring the equality of all citizens under the law. It is with deepest respect and admiration that I join with citizens across the Nation in paying tribute to the gallant Polish people and their heritage of heroic dedication to freedom.

As Americans throughout the land celebrate Polish Constitution Day, we share a deep concern over the problems confronting Poland today and recall with sadness the tragic history of the Polish nation, which has been marred so often by partition and suppression. A brave people, long recognized for their chivalry and compassion, Poles have for generations struggled for liberty, a struggle which led them to carry on their national banner the motto "For Our Liberty and Yours." Though time and time again their land has been attacked and occupied by aggressive neighbors, the Poles repeatedly fought bravely against threats to their homeland. In 1683, King Jan Sobieski exemplified Polish determination when he and his 40,000 troops rescued Europe from invasion by turning back the Turkish onslaught at Vienna. Victories such as this are rare in Polish history, however; the nation has suffered many crushing defeats at the hands of foreign invaders. But through these tragic events—through Genghis Kahn's invasion of Europe in 1250, Turkish aggression in the 15th century, the partitioning of Poland in 1792 and 1795 which completely dissolved their independent State, and, more recently, Soviet occupation after World War II—the spirit of this great people has never died, neither in Poland nor in the lands where Poland's sons and daughters began life anew.

In recent years, we have seen a tragic injustice inflicted on the gallant people of Poland in the suppression of the broad movement within Polish society toward guarantees of basic human rights and a more open society, a movement both symbolized and led by Solidarity. Despite the brutal suppression of that movement, and the suspension of individual liberties, the unsinkable will and determination of the Polish people survives.

On Polish Constitution Day, we not only commemorate the proud triumph of 1791 when Poland immortalized her people's love of freedom in a democratic constitution, we also gratefully acknowledge the many contributions of the Polish people to this Nation. The Polish presence in America dates back to earliest colonial times when Polish artisans arrived in Jamestown and built America's first glass factory. During the American Revolution, two of Poland's most beloved sons, Thaddeus Kosciuszko and Count Casimir Pulaski, rallied bravely to the banner of our newborn country. We recall with respect the great Polish contributions to our Nation in the fields of science and the arts.

The contributions which Polish Americans made to colonial settlements in America and in the War for Independence have been repeated in each succeeding generation and have immeasurably enriched our national, political, cultural, and social life. Americans of Polish descent, who today number well over 10 million, contributed significantly to the growth of American industry at the turn of the century and greatly strengthened American labor. Polish Americans have distinguished themselves in every walk of life and have served our democratic institutions in countless positions in Federal, State, and local governments. Above all, they have always championed our Nation's freedom and honor.

In joining with Polish Americans throughout our land in commemorating Polish Constitution Day, let us recall the great contributions that Americans of Polish descent have made to our country. Let us recall that our national heritage is rich with the gifts of the Polish people, and let us hope that we will all see again a free Poland, fulfilling its heritage and destiny.●

COSPONSORSHIP OF S. 2565, A BILL TO REAUTHORIZE HEAD START PROGRAMS

● Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I am pleased to be an original cosponsor with Senators DENTON, DOMENICI, THURMOND, HECHT, and EAST of S. 2565, the Head Start Amendments of 1984. Through supporting the reauthorization of the Head Start program, we not only renew the lease on life for this worthy legislative achievement, but we also reaffirm our commitment to what I believe are fundamental principles on which Head Start must be based.

First, the Head Start program is an example of how the public and private sectors can work together. Unlike all too many public sector programs, the Head Start program has not dissuaded but encouraged local initiative. Today, there are over 500,000 citizens who volunteer their time and talents to local Head Start centers. In fact, there are seven volunteers for every paid staff person. These include high school and college students, homemakers, senior citizens, professionals, local and State business leaders, and workers of all trades. In Mississippi alone, private citizens have donated over $1.5 million in cash, merchandise, properties, and facilities.

Second, the Head Start program recognizes that the parents are the most important influence on a child. At a time when potential influence is too often ignored or circumvented, the Head Start program recognizes that the parent is and should be the child's primary teacher. Head Start regulations require parental participation at all levels. For every three children enrolled in Head Start at least two Head Start parents are giving volunteer time. Head Start administrators spend a good deal of their time actively encouraging and organizing parental participation in the program.

Furthermore, I am impressed with evidence that suggests that children, as adolescents, in programs like Head Start, are less likely to need remedial services as they grow older; that they are more likely to hold jobs after school hours; and that they demonstrate less antisocial and delinquent behavior. As the Head Start program matures and as the children of Head Start grow in age, they are also expected to increase in their employability. After all, the success of this program, as with any other federally funded social program, should be measured by the rate in which the program's beneficiaries become fully independent, productive, and contributing members of our national community.

This is why I believe reauthorizing the Head Start program is so important. The Utah Head Start program is a model success story with strong support by Utah citizens. S. 2565 provides a straightforward 3-year reauthorization of Head Start at an increased funding of $79 million. There are at present no statutory changes in this reauthorization bill; although the distinguished chairman of the Subcommittee on Family and Human Services, Senator DENTON, and I are amenable to discussing amendments to further improve the Head Start program.

A hearing on our reauthorization bill has been scheduled for May 3 in the Family and Human Services Subcommittee chaired by Senator DENTON. This legislation is a credit to Senator DENTON and his very fine legislative staff. It is worthy of our support, and I encourage my colleagues to expeditiously enact the bill in order to best meet the goals and objectives of the Head Start program.●

OLDER AMERICANS ACT REHABILITATION

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I am proud to join Senator GRASSLEY and many other of my distinguished colleagues in introducing legislation to reauthorize the Older Americans Act of 1965 for the years 1984 through 1987. I want to commend the chairman of the Subcommittee on Aging and his able staff for their dedicated efforts to draw up effective reauthorization legislation.

Since 1965, the Older Americans Act has gone through substantial changes. These changes have come about as a result of the Congress increased sensitivity to the variations in the needs of our elderly from region to region, sensitivity greatly honed by the information that the network of aging agencies has provided to us. The Older Americans Act has been gradually adapted and revised so that, over time, it has become increasingly responsive to senior citizens' needs.

This year's reauthorization legislation goes even further in responding to those needs. Among its major provisions are the following:

Includes in its statement of purpose an emphasis on the importance of development and maintenance of a continuum of care for serving the vulnerable elderly.

Requires the Commissioner on Aging to consult with the Bureau of the Census for purposes of publishing timely information on the demographics of aging and the social and economic characteristics of our aging population.

Changes the appointment procedures for members of the Federal Council on the Aging so that the President, the President pro tempore of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House each appoint a portion of the Council's members.

Includes provisions relative to age discrimination in employment.

Requires the Commissioner on Aging to coordinate with peer review organizations to strengthen policies related to community-based long term care.

Requires the publication of certain information relative to states' intrastate funding formulas.

Gives priority status for funding for supportive services for families of elderly individuals with Alzheimer's and other neurological diseases, and training for service deliverers.

Provides greater flexibility for the transfer of funds between supportive services and nutrition services (35 percent, as opposed to 20 percent under current law).

Requires improved procedures for reporting on claims for reimbursement under the USDA commodities program.

Gives priority status for Title IV grants to Long Term Care Gerontology Centers which develop models for care and assistance to victims of Alzheimer's disease, and their families.

Requires the Commissioner to make available information on grant awards made under Title IV of the Act, and to share the results of such studies.

Limits the amount of Title V monies which can be used for administration purposes.

Requires state agencies to submit to the Secretary of Labor an annual report on the distribution of Title V employment slots throughout the state.

Requires the development of programs to identify, treat, and prevent cases of elder abuse where an established need is not being met.

Mr. President, as I have said, this legislation seeks to adapt the mechanisms within the Older Americans Act to better serve our aging population, with a minimum of changes. The legislation preserves the original intent of the Congress back in 1965 to develop an effective network of nutritional and social services, employment opportunities, and a substantive information base on issues affecting the elderly of our Nation.

While the Senate and House versions of this legislation differ in several ways, I am hopeful that both Houses will move quickly on their respective packages, so that the conference committee can meet and we will see final passage in early May.

Once again, I thank the Senator from Iowa for his efforts on behalf of older Americans.●

OLDER AMERICANS ACT REORGANIZATION

● Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I am pleased to join as a cosponsor of S. 2603, legislation to reauthorize the Older Americans Act of 1965. This law has proved most successful in assuring our senior citizens improved health, housing, employment, community service, cultural and recreational opportunities. Today the Older Americans Act supports 662 area agencies on aging, over 8,600 service providers, over 13,000 congregate nutrition sites, and over 6,000 home-delivered nutrition providers. Senior citizens also participate in 54,000 community service jobs because of this important law.

In my home State of South Dakota, 13.2 percent of the population is made up of individuals 65 years of age or older. These individuals depend on their senior citizen centers, their nutrition programs, and the employment and community service jobs provided through programs established by the Older Americans Act. These programs literally serve as a lifeline to retired South Dakotans.

The Older Americans Act programs which were once only a dream of the 89th Congress are now a key means of assisting senior citizens in carrying out independent, productive, and healthy lives. I am pleased to join as a cospon-sor of S. 2603 and to work with the Members of the 98th Congress in continuing a tremendously successful effort.

The key change proposed by this year's bill is one of which I am most supportive. As a member of the Special Committee on Aging, I have been a leader in the fight against Alzheimer's Disease. Last year, I requested hearings on the tragedies of this disease and the research and training needed to deal with it. Two excellent hearing records on the need for increased research funding are now available to my colleagues because of that effort.

After those hearings, I wrote a letter to the chairman of the Health and Human Resources Appropriations Subcommittee, urging the committee to increase funding for research. Senators HEINZ and D'AMATO cosigned that letter requesting an additional $15 million for basic research and $4 million to support five centers specializing in research on Alzheimer's disease.

As a result of that effort, the committee provided $24 million for Alzheimer's disease in fiscal year 1984. The Senate also agreed to add $3.5 million for Alzheimer's research centers. While this is far from sufficient, it is a beginning step.

Increased attention and improved research have gone forward in 1984 because this Congress and administration have given Alzheimer's disease the priority consideration it requires.

Three bills offering answers to the staggering effects of the disease are currently before the Senate. As a cosponsor of all three measures, I am most pleased that the Committee on Labor and Human Resources has included the concepts of S. 2221 in the legislation reauthorizing and extending the Older Americans Act.

Passage of S. 2603 will thus result in State area agencies on aging giving priority funding to supportive services for families of Alzheimer's patients. Support will also be given to improved training for personnel needed to care for patients suffering from this form of dementia.

This encouraging step forward has my strong support. I am honored to be a supporter of S. 2603 which extends and improves an act which is vital to our country's future.

Through the foresight of the Older Americans Act, all Americans will face their golden years with increased hope that they can live independent, productive, and healthy lives. I urge my colleagues to speedily approve this important legislation.●

BILL GIANELLI'S RETIREMENT

● Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, in the past 3 years, the debate over water resource development policy was given direction and guidance by the Assistant Secretary of the Army (Civil Works), Bill Gianelli. At the end of this week, Bill returns to his California home, having served as the most accomplished Assistant Secretary in history.

Mr. President, Bill Gianelli's legacy to those of us who must continue to toil in the thorny garden of water policy is his clear vision that water resource development in the future cannot take place without changing the way in which water projects are funded and financed. Mr. President, as chairman of the Water Resources Subcommittee, I have heard Bill Gianelli testify on this subject many times. I will not soon forget the warmth of his personality, the courage of his convictions, and the depth of his intelligence. Mr. President, the Congress, the American people, and this Senator are going to miss Bill Gianelli's leadership.

Mr. President, Bill Gianelli also leaves a legacy of administrative leadership over the civil works program of the Corps of Engineers. In a period of severe budget and personel restraint, Bill has improved the management of the corps program in numerable ways.

He led the negotiations for an agreement with private industry establishing a reserved dredging fleet, he revitalized the corps' defense mobilization capability, he improved the response time of the corps permitting programs and he has led the corps in its mission as the Federal engineer.

I know my colleagues join me in thanking Bill Gianelli for a superb job as Assistant Secretary of the Army, in urging him to stay active in water resource development policy, and in wishing he and his wife Shirley our best wishes for their future endeavors.●

WHITE HOUSE CONFERENCE ON SMALL BUSINESS

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, small businesses provide not only the heart of our communities, but the backbone of our Nation's economy as well. Over 44 percent of the gross national product can be directly attributed to the small business community. In 1981 and 1982, it was reported that all net new jobs in this country were created by small businesses. The vital role small businesses play is often overlooked in spite of these statistics.

I am proud to be an original cosponsor of the resolution calling for a second White House Conference on Small Business. The first White House Conference, the authorizing legislation for which I also cosponsored, was a tremendous success, bringing together over 50,000 small business owners from each of the 50 States. The major areas of concern as outlined by the Conference participants were articulated in the form of 60 specific recommendations from which small business legislation for the past 3 years has been shaped.

As other difficulties within the small business community have arisen, it has become clear that another forum is needed for a thorough discussion of these problems, as well as an attempt to develop solutions.

I particularly want to commend the chairman and the ranking minority members of the Small Business Committee, the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER) and the senior Senator from Arkansas (Mr. BUMPERS) for their leadership on this issue. I am pleased that the Senate has approved the White House Conference on Small Business Authorization Act, and hope that the Conference will mean a fresh commitment to small businesses throughout the Nation.●

S. 1739, THE WATER RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT ACT OF 1983

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, recently, I joined Senators DOMENICI, EVANS, HUMPHREY, MITCHELL, and MOYNIHAN in writing to the majority leader to express support for S. 1739, the Water Resources Development Act of 1983.

New authorizing legislation for water resource development programs is crucial in order for our Nation to press forward with important and long/delayed projects and to assure the future efficient management of water resources.

S. 1739 provides for a continued Federal role in water resource policy at a time when our Nation must become increasingly selective in its water development investments. The bill encourages careful water resource planning by placing a greater emphasis on the commitment of non-Federal resources in many activities.

It is imperative for the Senate to end the 8-year delay in addressing water policy issues by taking up S. 1739 as soon as possible. There is broad bypartisan support for this omnibus legislation, and I hope my colleagues will join in working for the bill's speedy approval.

Mr. President, I ask that a copy of our recent letter to the majority leader be printed in the RECORD.

The letter follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC, April 30, 1984.

Hon. HOWARD H. BAKER, Jr.,
Majority Leader, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. MAJORITY LEADER: The Committee on Environment and Public Works has reported S. 1739, the Water Resources Development Act of 1983. The bill now awaits floor action, and we respectfully urge that you provide for early consideration of this measure.

It has been over seven years since Congress last enacted authorizing legislation for water resource development programs. This omnibus legislation was approved by the Committee in November following an exhaustive and painstaking effort by Senator Abdnor, Chairman of the Subcommittee on Water Resources, to arrive at a responsible approach to water development policy.

It would be impossible for any comprehensive water policy legislation to reconcile completely the many competing interests in this area. S. 1739 is a carefully crafted compromise. It reflects a recognition of the need for a continued federal role in water resource development and for a more narrow targetting of scarce federal dollars toward those projects for which a genuine need exists.

S. 1739 provides for the authorization of a number of important new projects and also places a greater emphasis on the commitment of non-federal resources in future activities. The bill increases non-federal cost-sharing obligations in a variety of water project categories and encourages a gradual move toward cost-recovery through charges on users of federally supported waterways.

These reforms are absolutely essential in order for our nation's efficient management of water resources to continue in the midst of pressing budgetary constraints.

We believe it would be extremely unfortunate for Congress to adjourn this year without examining water resource policy. S. 1739 offers a sound approach to water development, and we earnestly hope that this measure can be considered in the Senate at the earliest feasible time.

Sincerely,

GEORGE J. MITCHELL,
DANIEL P. MOYNIHAN,
GORDON J. HUMPHREY,
JOHN H. CHAFEE,
PETE V. DOMENICI,
DANIEL J. EVANS.●

LEFTY GORDON: A FRIEND OF YOUTH

● Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I wish to take this opportunity to bring to your attention a man who has earned the respect and admiration of countless San Franciscans.

Leonard "Lefty" Gordon has contributed years of selfless dedication to the youth of San Francisco. Currently the executive director of the Ella Hill Hutch Community Center, Mr. Gordon has served also as the program director of Youth for Service; as senior group worker, Booker T. Washington Community Center; and as recreation director, San Francisco Parks and Recreation Department.

Additionally, Mr. Gordon dedicates countless hours as a board member of many of San Francisco's charitable youth organizations.

He has received numerous awards for his efforts, incuding: Outstanding Service Award, South Park Community; Certificate of Recognition for Dedicated Service, Booker T. Washington Community Center; Certificate of Appreciation, United Way of the Bay Area; Outstanding Service Award, San Francisco Residential Support Center; and the Leadership to Youth and Dedicated Service Award, Adult Citizens of the Western Addition Community.

It is indeed appropriate that we reflect on the achievements of this remarkable individual who has contributed so mightily to our youth. Through Mr. Gordon's hard work, we are reminded of the enormous impact one person can have on the lives of so many.●

ORDERS FOR THURSDAY

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today, it stand in recess until the hour of 10 a.m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR THE RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, on tomorrow after the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. PROXMIRE) be recognized under a special order not to exceed 15 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, after the execution of the special order, I ask unanimous consent that there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business until 10:30 a.m. in which Senators may speak for not more than 2 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, having concluded the list of routine items to be disposed of this evening, let me state the program for tomorrow. I am advised that neither the manager of the bill nor the author of the amendment wish to proceed further with debate this evening. After the statement of the program, I will ask the Senate to stand in recess until tomorrow at 10 a.m.

PROGRAM

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, when the Senate completes its business today, it will stand in recess until the hour of 10 a.m. on tomorrow.

After the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. PROXMIRE) will be recognized on a special order of not to exceed 15 minutes.

After the execution of the special order, there will be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, to extend no later than 10:30 a.m., or sooner, if there is no requirement for morning business of that length.

At the expiration of the time for the transaction of routine morning business, the Senate will resume consideration of the unfinished business, at which time the Chiles amendment will be the pending question.

Mr. President, it is the hope of the leadership that we can finish this bill on tomorrow. It is anticipated that we very well may be in late tomorrow in an effort to do so. In any event, we are going to stay as long as productive work can be accomplished and as long as we can make progress toward completion.

As previously announced, there will not be a session of the Senate on Friday.

RECESS UNTIL TOMORROW AT 10 A.M.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I see no other Senators seeking recognition. I move, in accordance with the order previously entered, that the Senate now stand in recess until the hour of 10 a.m. tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to and the Senate, at 7:03 p.m., recessed until Thursday, May 3, 1984, at 10 a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Wednesday, May 2, 1984

The House met at 3 p.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Help us, gracious God, to know Your blessings in all the occasions of life. Encourage us when we know success and remind us of the need to be grateful, and when we experience disappointment, support us with Your presence and may Your spirit give us strength. In all the seasons of life, whether in joy and happiness or at moments of pain and loss, may we not feel alone or without recourse, but acknowledging Your love, may we by faith go from day to day with the awareness that You are always with us. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to clause 1, rule I, I demand a vote on agreeing to the Speaker's approval of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the Chair's approval of the Journal.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 353, nays 27, answered "present" 9, not voting 44, as follows:

Mr. OBERSTAR changed his vote from "yea" to "present."

So the Journal was approved.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Hallen, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill and a joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

H.R. 2733. An act to extend and improve the existing program of research, development, and demonstration in the production and manufacture of guayule rubber, and to broaden such program to include other critical agricultural materials; and

H.J. Res. 478. Joint resolution designating the week of April 29 through May 5, 1984, as "National Week of the Ocean."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 1135. An act to consent to the Goose Lake Basin Compact between the States of California and Oregon;

S. 1196. An act to confer jurisdiction on the U.S. Claims Court with respect to certain claims of the Navajo Indian Tribe;

S. 2184. An act to amend the Native American Programs Act of 1974 to impose certain limitations with respect to the administration of such act and to authorize appropriations under such act for fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987, and for other purposes; and

S.J. Res. 261. Joint resolution to provide for the designation of the last week in June 1984 as "Helen Keller Deaf-Blind Awareness Week."

The message also announced that the Vice President, pursuant to the provisions of sections 276h-276k, as amended, appoints Mrs. HAWKINS as a member of the Senate delegation to the Mexico-United States Interparliamentary Group during the 2d session of the 98th Congress, to be held in Washington, D.C., on May 17-20, 1984.

PERMITTING 1984 OLYMPIC TORCH RELAY TO BE RUN THROUGH U.S. CAPITOL GROUNDS

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 295) to permit the 1984 Olympic torch relay to be run through the U.S. Capitol Grounds.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BROWN of California). The Clerk will report the concurrent resolution.

The Clerk read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

H. CON. RES. 295

That, on May 14, 1984, or on such other day as the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives may jointly authorize, the 1984 Olympic Torch Relay may be run through the United States Capitol Grounds as part of the journey of the Olympic Torch from Olympia, Greece, to the XXIII Olympic Games in Los Angeles, California.

SEC. 2. The Capitol Police Board shall take such action as may be necessary or appropriate to carry out the first section of this resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, this summer the United States is once again privileged to host the summer Olympic games.

In keeping with the tradition of the modern Olympics, a torch lighted in Olympia, Greece, will be carried in a relay to the site of the 23d Olympic games in Los Angeles.

That relay will carry the Olympic flame through Washington, DC, on May 14.

This presents an appropriate occasion for the Congress, on behalf of the American people, to welcome the summer games to our country.

The resolution before us permits the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate to permit the torch relay to cross the Capitol Grounds.

Section 193 of the United States Code title 40, prohibits the transportation of firearms, dangerous weapons, explosives, and incendiary devices through the Capitol Grounds.

Clearly the Olympic torch is not the kind of incendiary device that Congress meant to prohibit. The law does allow this provision to be suspended for appropriate occasions by the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate, and I hope it is the desire of the House to suspend the provision in this case.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

□ 1520

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the concurrent resolution just agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION FOR SUBCOMMITTEE ON ENVIRONMENT, ENERGY, AND NATURAL RESOURCES OF COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS TO SIT ON TOMORROW DURING 5-MINUTE RULE

Mr. SYNAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Environment, Energy, and Natural Resources of the Committee on Government Operations be permitted to sit on Thursday, May 3, 1984, should the House be reading for amendment under the 5-minute rule at the time.

I am advised that this request has been cleared through the minority, and that there is no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

GREED, FAIRNESS, AND SELF-RESTRAINT

(Mr. LANTOS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, in 1983 Bill Anderson received $13.3 million in compensation; Phil Caldwell, $7.3 million; Dave Tendler, almost $7 million; Tom Murphy, over $6 million; Dan Burke, Bill Cook, and Ed Telling over $4 million each.

The names of these seven corporate executives are not exactly household words, yet the $46 million in compensation these seven men received last year is more than the total combined salaries of our President, Vice President, the 13 members of the President's Cabinet, the nine Justices of the Supreme Court, all 100 Members of the U.S. Senate, and all 435 members of the House of Representatives. It is also more than the combined salaries of over 3,000 average Americans.

Mr. Speaker, if top corporate executives cannot control their greed, how dare they expect the average American to heed their hypocritical calls for self-restraint and moderation?

INTEREST RATES BEGINNING TO CLIMB AGAIN

(Mr. TAUZIN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TAUZIN. Mr. Speaker, interest rates are beginning to climb again, and while the President may feel that the budget deficit is large enough to take care of itself, the Federal deficit may soon be big enough to do us all in. But two additional factors which help shore up high interest rates have been identified. They are: America's low saving rate and the high cost of money to American banking institutions. It should be no wonder that interest rates are in the midteens when the cost of money to American banks and savings and loan and credit unions now approximates 10 percent, as American savers have generally abandoned passbook savings for high yield certificates.

It is time, indeed, for a new idea. This month I and the other Members will be offering a bill which aims at producing more private savings, lower cost of money to American lending institutions, and lower interest rates for our country. It is a plan to give American savers a break and American borrowers a fair interest rate. In the days ahead I will have a lot more to say about it. Tune in tomorrow and feel free to contact my office for additional information.

REMOVAL OF NAME OF MEMBER AS COSPONSOR OF H.R. 4103

Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my name be removed from the list of cosponsors of H.R. 4103.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

BULLETPROOF VESTS SAVE POLICE LIVES

(Mr. BIAGGI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, the U.S. Justice Department reports that "an estimated 400 police lives" have been saved by bulletproof vests since 1975. William Johnson, an Alexandria, VA, deputy sheriff is one of those fortunate 400.

Deputy Johnson's close brush with death occurred on September 27, 1982, and the Washington Post described the incident this way:

> William Johnson struggled for the .357 magnum revolver held only inches from his chest. He watched the gun as it fired seconds later. He saw his shirt tear as the bullet struck. He felt its crushing force. And because the 62-year-old Alexandria deputy sheriff was wearing a bulletproof vest, he was alive yesterday to help convict the man accused of trying to kill him.

Like Deputy Johnson, more and more police officers are becoming convinced that bulletproof vests are worth wearing. They know the vests are confortable—weighing only about 3 pounds—and they know the vests will stop most handgun bullets used by criminals.

Yet, the police community also knows that bulletproof vests are totally useless against armor-piercing "cop killer" bullets that are legally available at gun shops across the country. That is why the police community is lobbying hard for a Federal ban against those high-powered projectiles. My bill, H.R. 953, seeks to enact such a ban. This legislation deserves prompt and favorable action.

AMERICA STANDS UNITED

(Mr. TORRICELLI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TORRICELLI. Mr. Speaker, during these last months I have risen in the well to speak of the uses of military power. On each occasion, I have tried to cite where I have found inappropriate use. Today I rise to speak of the essence of a new challenge to America. It is a challenge not to our Army; it is a challenge instead to civilization itself. The challenge is terrorism, and the weapons range from the cowardice of assassination to the possible future uses of nuclear weapons.

I have tried to use this floor in the past to send a message to the President; today I rise to send a different message. The message is that a free people need not wait to be struck. A free people need not wait for terrorism to act; a free people can go to the source of terrorism itself.

Let the Israeli raid on Baghdad serve as a guide. We will act prudently, we will act properly, we will act responsibly. But we will, as a nation, act. Let those who host terrorism know that America stands united.

NELLIS AIR FORCE BASE THUNDERBIRDS

(Mr. REID asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. REID. Mr. Speaker, in 1983 more than 16 million onlookers experienced the thrill of the precision aerobatics of the U.S. Air Force Thunderbirds.

That sense of excitement and exhilaration was nothing new for audiences. Since 1953 more than 170 million people in 46 countries have enjoyed this air team's precision performances.

The Thunderbirds, stationed at Nevada's Nellis Air Force Base, are the unofficial honor society of the Air Force.

Working on a 2-year rotation, 115 volunteers maintain and pilot the team's aircraft. The standards are high. Pilots, for example, must have at least 1,000 hours of flying time and no more than 10 years in commissioned service.

As far as equipment, the F-16 can fly at more than twice the speed of sound, has a 650-mile-per-hour cruising speed, and can climb at 30,000 feet per minute.

Because of these continuing top performances from man and machine, I am proud to salute the Thunderbirds on behalf of Nevada and the Nation.

GALLIPOLIS CAN'T WAIT

(Mr. WISE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker, economic tragedy has struck again on the Ohio River. This week a 15-barge unit trying to negotiate the tricky turn through the antiquated Gallipolis locks crashed into a partially opened lock gate. The structural damage will close the lock for 4 weeks.

This is only the latest in a long series of accidents in and around Gallipolis. The latest closure was from April 2 until April 26, with a total repair cost of $2.4 million. As you know, the authorization to rebuild Gallipolis has been reported by all committees and awaits floor action. I urge the leadership to bring this vital legislation to the floor immediately.

Built in 1937, the locks cannot accommodate modern barge traffic, and have become the worst bottleneck in our inland waterway system. Products from 19 different States move through Gallipolis. Congestion delays at Gallipolis are prolonged and mounting. It is conservatively estimated that in 1990, with a 60-percent increase in traffic expected, a resultant 32-hour delay per lock, per barge is anticipated.

Mr. Speaker, we cannot wait. The Ohio River is losing millions of dollars in business. The time to move is now let us fix Gallipolis this month. Let us rebuild it next year.

PLIGHT OF THE ELDERLY HOMELESS

(Mr. VENTO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, it is ironic that the Select Committee on Aging held hearings today dramatizing the terrible plight of elderly people who are homeless. Ironic because these hearings were held against the backdrop of a HUD study which minimizes the total homeless problem almost to the point of extinction.

One wonders if HUD continues to study the homeless, maybe it can eliminate them altogether by simply studying them to death.

Perhaps this is what we should expect from Ronald Reagan's HUD, after the chief Executive's heartless statement that people are homeless "by choice." What a tragic interpretation of the homeless problem in this Nation by President Reagan.

I have actively worked on this issue for 3 years. At my urging, and with bipartisan support, the House has passed measures providing $140 million in emergency assistance to assist the homeless. The Congress last year finally enacted into law a $60 million authorization in homeless shelter assistance and I know that the House Appropriations Committee intends to try to add money for the homeless again this year. Hopefully we can force it through the Senate. But the Reagan administration still reflects total indifference, not requesting initially or even at this late date a dime for homeless emergency assistance or shelters.

The record of committees of the Congress are replete with the staggering dimensions and growth of the homeless problem by some of the most qualified social scientists and professionals. But the Reagan administration seems to have a penchant for not letting the facts get in the way of its ideology—whether the subject is the homeless, the hungry, or the unemployed.

Nevertheless, if the Reagan administration believes its own propaganda on these numbers: Where is the program? Where is the housing? Where is the humanity? Based on the good work of the past administration and Congress, some public and assisted housing has been available in the pipeline, but the legacy of the Reagan administration will be less than 100,000 public and assisted starts a year. And yet Reagan's HUD defines in a single instance 350,000 people who are homeless. The challenge is yet to meet even this limited number, much less reality.

THE MARIE ANTOINETTE "LET THEM EAT CAKE" AWARD

(Mr. SCHUMER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, the unanimous winner of this year's Marie Antoinette Let Them Eat Cake Award is the Department of Housing and Urban Development, which yesterday announced a study showing that there are only 250,000 to 350,000 homeless people in America, almost 80 percent below previous estimates. In fact, the administration's own estimate was 2 million as recently as last November, when HHS Secretary Heckler announced a Federal food and shelter campaign. Has the campaign been enormously successful? Has economic recovery finally trickled down to those most in need of help?

Guess again. Instead, the Reagan administration which has steadfastly opposed any Federal legislation to help the homeless, it has discovered a more innovative way to solve a problem: define it out of existence. The way it works is simple: When you want to emphasize your compassion for the needy, exaggerate the size of the problem. Then, when the PR benefits of your announcement have died down, and when you want to make it seem like there's really nothing to worry about, wait a few months and reduce your estimate of the problem.

Who are these 350,000, the ones who could not even find room on a subway grate? Mr. Speaker, we should not be fooled by this numbers game. The main point is that whether there are 2 million or 250,000 homeless, or even if there are only 10,000, this administration just has no interest in doing anything about the problem. Mr. President, stop redefining the problem, do something about it.

TRADE RESTRICTIONS ON CORN GLUTEN AND SOYBEANS

(Mr. DURBIN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Speaker, today I have submitted a House resolution which calls on the President to firmly oppose any trade restrictions which will injure the U.S. corn gluten and soybean industries. If unilateral action is taken by the European Economic Community to inhibit the importation of corn gluten feed or vegetable fats and oils, the resolution calls on the President to restrict European Community imports of at least the aggregate value of the reduced and potentially reduced U.S. export products.

I introduced this resolution to counter European Community proposals to impose a consumption tax on vegetable fats and oils and a recent request by the EC Council of Ministers to enter into formal negotiations with the United States with the intention of changing the duty-free status of corn gluten.

Corn gluten is a nongrain feed ingredient popular in Europe as well as the United States; 3.6 million metric tons, valuing $562 million, were exported to Europe last year. Currently, while grains imported to the European Community are subject to tariffs, imported corn gluten, which does not compete directly with European agricultural products, is subject to no duty.

Despite claims to the contrary, it is not the duty-free binding on corn gluten feed which causes livestock producers to choose this feed stuff over European produced grains. Rather, it is the artificially high EC support prices which have made the European grain products noncompetitive within Europe. Another reason corn gluten feed is chosen for animal feeds is that it provides a better protein base which grain cannot provide.

To a large degree, the United States has been willing to sacrifice its own economic interests for the sake of desirable stabilization of the Western World. But, the European Community is now a large and growing agricultural exporter which threatens to impose new restrictions on its imports from the United States. It is time to insist that the Community act responsibly in trade and not transfer its internal agricultural policy burdens to our country. The crux of the matter is that the EC must find domestic solutions to the simultaneous farm-income and public-budget problems it faces.

By asking the President to continue to reject attempts by the European Economic Community to impose quantitative or tariff restrictions on corn gluten imports, we are drawing a line. We cannot afford to take any steps backward in our trade negotiations with Europe. It is time to insist on fair trade agreements, and the resolution I introduce today attempts to take an important step in that direction.

PROTECTIONIST POLICY ON JAPANESE AUTO IMPORTS

(Mr. GEPHARDT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, Ambassador Bill Brock's announcement that import quotas on Japanese cars will not be renewed next year is just wrong. It proves that the administration's shell game on trade policy is a sham. If the Brock policy becomes effective—an unlikely possibility—it will cause massive amounts of unnecessary pain.

The illogic of this policy is monumental. Just because greedy auto executives are getting big bonuses, he is ready to jeopardize the jobs of thousands of auto workers. They were not the ones who decided to give the executives the bonuses.

What we need is a trade policy that will make America more competitive. Import restrictions should be temporary and predicated on specific commitments from American industry to modernize and adjust behavior to become competitive. That was not done 3 years ago, yet, the domestic auto industry has made a lot of progress in the past few years, but it still has a long way to go.

The administration strategy of coupling a rhetorical free trade policy with a real protectionist policy has yielded only confusion. Our trading partners do not know what we really want. Domestic industry does not either. This new irrational move will yield an irrational result and make things worse.

If Ambassador Brock is serious about this issue, we should all—Government, industry, and labor—get together and start some serious negotiations about the future of the American auto industry. Press threats are not an adequate substitute for creditable policies.

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES ON S. 38, LONGSHOREMEN'S AND HARBOR WORKERS' COMPENSATION ACT

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate bill (S. 38) entitled the "Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act," with a House amendment thereto, insist on the House amendment, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky? The Chair hears none, and, without objection, appoints the following conferees: Messrs. PERKINS, CLAY, MILLER of California, KILDEE, MARTINEZ, OWENS, and HARRISON, Mrs. BURTON of California, and Messrs. ERLENBORN, PETRI, PACKARD, and MCCAIN.

There was no objection.

GREEN INTRODUCES BILL TO ELIMINATE SEX DISCRIMINATION IN THE UNITED STATES CODE

(Mr. GREEN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, together with my colleague from New York (Mr. FISH) I am today reintroducing a bill which will revise or eliminate over 150 gender discrimination provisions of the United States Code. A companion bill was introduced in, and was unanimously passed by the other body on April 26.

I have had major concerns about the ramifications of the gender discrimination provisions within our laws for a long period. As many of you are aware, I introduced a bill addressing these concerns during the lameduck session of the 97th Congress, and reintroduced it on February 17, 1983, as H.R. 1527. I am pleased to report that today's bill incorporates all of the provisions of H.R. 1527 and, further, addresses approximately 50 additional references subsequently identified as discriminatory by the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice. A large portion of the laws being amended involve the extension of family benefits in recognition that sex distinctions are obsolete, since women can be the primary wage earners and are no longer barred from entering certain career fields. In addition, inequities related to educational, training, and employment opportunities are covered, and unfair preferences to male family members and sex-based distinctions in definitions of criminal sexual activity are eliminated.

It is important to note, however, that this bill does not address every gender-based statute and purposely does not include sex references of a very controversial or highly technical nature. For example, the Selective Service and combat limitations found in title 10 and various statutes that require affirmative action on behalf of women are not addressed. These difficult issues need careful consideration and are more appropriately the subject of separate study and further action.

Although I sincerely believe that passage of this bill is extremely important and an essential step in insuring the equal treatment of women under the law, I do not feel that enactment will solve all the inequities women have faced in the past and continue to face each day. Additional legislative actions and attitudinal changes will be necessary to insure equality, and I intend to continue my strong support of women's rights, including advocacy of the ERA.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation attracted 81 bipartisan cosponsors when introduced last year and was passed by unanimous consent in the other body. This legislation transcends partisan politics, and I am confident that my House colleagues will agree that gender discriminatory laws can no longer be ignored, and join me in cosponsoring this important effort to eliminate unfair, unnecessary, and outdated sex distinctions in the United States Code.

REFORM THE EXCLUSIONARY RULE

(Mr. McCANDLESS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remark.)

Mr. McCANDLESS. Mr. Speaker, it is time to do something about the irrational application of the fourth amendment prohibition against unreasonable search and seizure. In a recent case in my district in southern California, the police, armed with a search warrant, seized 5 pounds of cocaine. Was there a trial and conviction? No. Because of a minor technical defect in the warrant itself, all charges were subsequently dismissed.

This common misuse of the intent of the fourth amendment destroys the confidence of our constituents in the criminal justice system. The Senate has already done its job, and passed legislation to reform the system, and the time has come for House consideration, instead of keeping this important bill bottled up in committee.

LYCOMING COUNTY, PA, RESIDENTS ONCE AGAIN DECLARED "NATIONAL CHAMPIONS IN ANTILITTER"

(Mr. GEKAS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, last year at just about this time 20,000 people of Lycoming County, PA, in my district, conducted a week-long antilitter campaign which resulted in tons and tons of debris and litter being removed from the roadsides of that county. I took the floor then to declare those people the "National Champions in Antilitter" and to this moment that declaration on my part has remained uncontradicted, unchallenged, and undenied.

I am here this year to do the same, only with new statistics even more remarkable, because 25,000 people this time participated, covering 1,100 miles of State and local roads, and 107 tons of litter were collected, 1,600,000 cans were collected from the homes of residents for recycling, et cetera, et cetera.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat my challenge and hope that we can engage in a contest with the remainder of the number of Members in the House of Representatives to see if we can clean up America in this fashion.

A TRIBUTE TO THE 22D MARINE AMPHIBIOUS UNIT FOR THEIR SERVICE IN GRENADA AND LEBANON

(Mr. CRAIG asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, they are home. After 7 months of duty in Grenada and Lebanon, the 22d Marine Amphibious Unit has returned to the United States.

The men of the 22d Marine Amphibious Unit—the most experienced combat unit since Vietnam—were reunited with family and friends yesterday after serving their Nation with honor, dignity, and pride.

This is the unit which was one of the first to land on Grenada and helped free a country from the grips of communism. This is the unit which was then immediately sent on to Lebanon to serve the cause of the peace, and this is a unit which deserves the thanks of this Congress and the people of the country.

Just before we went on the Easter break, I introduced House Concurrent Resolution 289 which calls on President Reagan to present the 22 MAU a Presidential unit citation for their heroic and unselfish duty in combat.

This is an opportunity for Congress to show appreciation for the efforts of those who serve in the Armed Forces. This is a small thing to ask for Americans who put their life on the line in defense of freedom and the ideals for which our Nation stands for.

PAC CONTRIBUTIONS AND THE MONDALE CAMPAIGN

(Mr. THOMAS of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Speaker, on February 12, 1983, Walter Mondale announced he was a candidate for President of the United States. In his speech he said, "Where I grew up, we believed in some old American values * * *." He went on to say in his announcement speech, "My campaign will accept no contributions from political action committees. And I will work to slap controls on PAC's, clamp ceilings on campaign spending, close the independent committee loopholes * * *."

Candidate Walter Mondale, when faced with a possibility worse than death—defeat—lost sight of his values, turned his back on his promises, and held his hand out to labor political action committees. Apparently one of those values he learned so well was that the end justifies the means. That is, the law is meaningful only if you feel comfortable with the delegate count.

All you Mondale supporters gather over there under the banner that reads: "Let's put a hypocrite in the White House."

CANDIDATE MONDALE RETURNS PAC CONTRIBUTIONS BUT KEEPS THE DELEGATES

(Mr. FRENZEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, this year's Democratic Presidential campaign has exploded the myth of expenditure limits under taxpayer financing of elections.

Committees supporting former Vice President Mondale raked in contributions from political action committees which allowed his campaign to exceed the expenditure limitations, and apparently allowed friendly labor PAC's to avoid contribution limits as well. Most of all they allowed Mondale to stop the Hart surge, while at the same time posing as a pure PAC-free candidate.

With his hand in the cookie jar, his foot in his mouth, and GARY HART at his throat, Mondale finally recanted. He ordered committees previously described as "autonomous" to return PAC contributions. But they did not give the delegates back. They cannot return momentum. And they cannot scrub off the taint, nor banish the odor.

Supporters of taxpayer financing laws ought to thank the former Vice President for showing them the error of their ways. It took one of their own to demonstrate how easily their favorite law could be subverted.

A TRIBUTE TO THE LATE JOE BURCH, A CAPITOL HILL EMPLOYEE

(Mr. HORTON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, last Saturday, Joe Burch, a Capitol Hill employee, passed away. He was one of those unsung Federal employees who faithfully, courageously, and patriotically performed his duties without publicity or acclaim.

I knew Joe Burch for the entire 19 years he worked on the Hill. He was a friendly, nice, highly respected man, who, for the most part, was stationed in the basement garage of the Rayburn Building at the South Capitol Street entrance.

Over the years, Joe was the first person I would see as I would drive in to park in the Rayburn garage. He was always congenial and courteous, but more than that, he was a good friend.

In recent years, because of his illness, I would miss him when he was not at his usual place. Each time, he would return. Earlier this year, he was not at his usual post and then after an illness for several weeks, he passed away. Much is written about Federal employees, Members of Congress, and the Federal bureaucracy and most of it is not complimentary. The vast majority of Federal employees are hard working, faithful, and feel they have an important job to perform, which they do. Joe Burch was one of those and he will truly be missed not only by me but by other Members of Congress and employees on the Hill. To his wife, Patricia, and family, Nancy and I extend our deepest sympathy. Also, our pride in the job well done by Joe Burch.

IF YOU CAN'T BEAT THEM, JOIN THEM UP

(Mr. LUNGREN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks)

Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Speaker, in the past I have expressed my dismay at the Democratic leadership's seeming lack of interest in dealing with criminal reform issues this year. Well, I was, at least in part, wrong.

Indeed, the Monday, April 30 edition of the Washington Times reports that a group of Democrats, under the banner of "The Committee to Abolish Prison Slavery", are working with civil liberties groups and convicts in nearly a dozen States to persuade eligible prisoners to register to vote. According to the sponsors, these incarcerated citizens are natural candidates for registration in the Democratic Party.

Now, I am assuming that this must be part of a Democratic plan to get tough on crime. First, register the prisoners and then subject them to a tirade of candidate speeches. But while this will certainly serve as a deterrent to those unwary individuals now contemplating a life of crime, will not it be considered cruel and unusual punishment for those already in prison?

Mr. Speaker, maybe we should, instead, be offering these Democrats an award for their efforts to promote participatory Democracy. The Committee to Abolish Prison Slavery has stated that its long-term goal is to amend certain 13th amendment restrictions on prisoners, and extend voting rights to all robbers, rapists, and highwaymen. In 1986, we may even see a host of new candidates on the Democratic ticket campaigning before jail cells.

Whatever the reason behind this effort one thing is for certain: If you cannot stop crime you can at least register the criminals.

THE HOUSE HAS IGNORED PRESIDENT'S COMPREHENSIVE CRIME CONTROL ACT

(Mrs. VUCANOVICH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. VUCANOVICH. Mr. Speaker, each of us has been victimized by the bombing of this beautiful building in which we have the privilege to serve. Yet this body has in the most deplorable, casual fashion simply ignored the President's Comprehensive Crime Control Act. S. 1762 is designed to protect all Americans by updating our criminal law.

The most important measures in S. 1762 improve the efficiency of existing resources. For example, bail reform, sentencing reform, and forfeiture reform improve the existing procedures now in place. The current processes in these areas are in shambles and negatively impact on the entire criminal justice system:

What good are 1,000 police when a person arrested is immediately released to the streets and commits additional crimes?

What good are stiff sentences enacted by this Congress if criminals are soon released on probation or parole?

What good is the forfeiture of drug trafficking assets when they are vandalized or fall apart during the many years this process takes?

This budget conscious body should be favorably disposed toward any effort to improve the efficiency and effectiveness of existing resources. The President's Comprehensive Crime Control Act is just such a bill and we should be allowed to seriously consider it now.

INACTION OF CONGRESS ON NATIONAL CRIME PROBLEM

(Mr. SHUMWAY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Speaker, many people believe the inaction of this Congress is in and of itself a crime.

Unfortunately, inaction is not a part of our voting record. I cannot comprehend a constituency that would prefer that Congress ignore the national problem of crime. Yet, that is exactly the current course of action for this body.

Ten months ago the Judiciary Committee passed insanity defense reform. Why has this important bill not been brought to the floor in over 10 months? The Senate passed a compromise child pornography bill 3 weeks ago. Why has the House, which passed its version by a vote of 400 to 1, refused to act on the completely negotiated child pornography reform compromise?

I sincerely wish that our voting record included those bills avoided as well as those bills voted. S. 1762 is before this Congress today. To ignore this measure is simply to stick our heads in the sand while our constituents are victimized.

THE FAMILY FARM MUST BE PRESERVED

(Mr. ROTH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROTH. Mr. Speaker, the family farm must be preserved. The family farm is just another one of our American institutions that is under attack.

In the State of Wisconsin, we had a total of 195,000 farms in 1954. Today, we have 95,000 farms. That is a loss of more than half of our farms in only 30 years. Other States are experiencing a similar frightening trend.

The best friend the American consumer has is the American farmer. In America we spend only 18 cents out of every earned dollar on food. That makes food the consumers best bargain. We are the best fed and best clothed Nation in the world because our farmers are so productive. The productivity of the American farmer is the envy of the world.

The family farm is a unique American institution, a unique American blessing; however, this institution is being hard pressed by the corporate milk factories. Many of these corporate milk factories, I suspect and fear, are producing largely for the Commodity Credit Corporation.

To save our family farmer, this Congress must address two issues of vital importance: First, we must continue the dairy diversion program; and second, tap the amount that dairy processors can sell to the CCC.

GLACIER-LIKE SPEED OF DEMOCRATIC LEADERSHIP ON PRESIDENT'S COMPREHENSIVE CRIME CONTROL ACT

(Mr. WEBER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Speaker, on March 16, 1984, the President's Comprehensive Crime Control Act was introduced in this and the other body. Yet it was not until almost one full year later on March 7, 1984, that the President's bill was even referred to the relevant subcommittees for consideration. Such glacier-like speed captures the level of commitment that the Democratic leadership of this body has displayed with respect to the need for reform of our criminal laws.

The inaction of this Chamber on crime legislation evidently reflects the low priority attached to the crime issue by those who control the agenda of this place. Not only have we not had the opportunity to debate the President's comprehensive crime control bill, but the leadership has not brought the insanity defense bill that passed the Judiciary Committee on November 11 of last year to the floor for a vote either. It is almost 2 months since the Judiciary Committee reported drug forfeiture legislation. Similarly, we have yet to be given the opportunity to vote on the child pornography compromise that recently passed the other body on March 30.

There is thus an unfortunate pattern and practice of foot dragging on criminal justice reform that is in a metalphorical sense a crime in and of itself. The American people have elected us to display leadership in the formulation of public policy. Comments to the effect that this body will not act on important crime control measures because they are too controversial bring into question the capacity of the Democratic leadership to fulfill that responsiblity to lead.

It is time for this body to show the people of this country that it cares about the problem of crime.

ACID RAIN

(Mr. BOEHLERT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BOEHLERT. Mr. Speaker, those of us who want to get on the comprehensive Federal program to combat acid rain are often given two arguments by the people who say, "Hey, fellows, go slow."

First, we are told that we need more research. We do not know enough about the problem.

Then second, we are told it is a regional problem, not a national problem. They say, "You guys in New York and New England, you better get on with the solution. Do not come to us in Washington."

Well, Mr. Speaker, acid rain was not created in Heaven by divine providence. It has been manufactured here on Earth by we mortals. We have got all the scientific information we need to document the cause. Now we have to get on with the solution.

I would suggest that it is truly a national problem, and that has been confirmed by the National Wildlife Federation, which has just issued a very comprehensive report, entitled "Acid Rain" that documents that it is national in scope; California, Colorado, Florida, New York, from coast to coast, acid rain is a serious national problem. Let us get on with the solution.

OTTERBEIN COLLEGE'S DR. HAROLD HANCOCK RETIRES AFTER 40 YEARS

(Mr. WYLIE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, it has been said that a person cannot graduate from Otterbein College until taking a class from Dr. Harold Hancock.

Dr. Hancock, who has taught history at Otterbein for more than 40 years, is retiring this June. By his estimate, he has taught more than 10,000 students during that time—and gets to know every one of them personally, no matter if the class is small or large.

Anyone who has had him for a professor knows it is not an exaggeration to say he is a "combination of a ham, a preacher, actor, and humorist." Students don't suffer" through his history classes; he makes history interesting by his entertaining teaching methods.

Hancock, a native of Delaware, came to Otterbein in 1944. An authority on Delaware history, he has written 17 books and more than 50 articles, and has written extensively about the history of Westerville, OH, and Otterbein. Chairman of the department of history and political science since 1953, he has also received numerous awards for his work.

As an Otterbein alumnus, I am proud of Dr. Hancock's accomplishments in our college community. He has been a leader in college government, active in the Westerville Historical Society, and is presently working to restore the Philomathean—literary society—room in Towers Hall, the oldest building on campus. His dedication to his students, the college, and Westerville is indeed commendable.

Thomas J. Kerr IV, the president of Otterbein College, and the city of Westerville proclaimed Sunday, April 1, as "Harold Bell Hancock Day." The Otterbein Woman's Club honored the always jovial professor with a "roast," the first man ever honored by this organization.

Last year, I was honored at Otterbein's commencement with an honorary doctorate of laws degree. This year, Dr. Hancock will be the commencement speaker, and will be bestowed with an honorary degree.

I wish Dr. Hancock well in his retirement, although everyone back home knows he will not be slowing down one bit. He will still be the same history sleuth, digging for more information about Ohio and Delaware.

ATTEMPT TO OBTAIN CONSIDERATION OF CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT TO PERMIT VOLUNTARY SCHOOL PRAYER, BALANCED BUDGET, AND LINE-ITEM VETO

(Mr. GREGG asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Speaker, at this time I would hope to offer unanimous-consent requests calling for consideration of amendments to permit voluntary school prayer, balanced budget, and line-item veto.

The Chair has ruled that in order to make these requests I must have the clearance of the majority and minority leaderships.

This request has been cleared by the minority leadership.

I would now yield to a spokesman from the majority leadership for appropriate clearance.

Mr. Speaker, I hear no response. That should make it clear to the American people who stand in the way of these three important issues—the Democratic leadership in this House.

DELAYS IN CONSIDERATION OF ANTICRIME LEGISLATION

(Mr. WALKER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, most Americans think that crime is so out of hand in this country that it is time to put handcuffs on the criminals and get them behind bars for a good, long time. Most Americans think that way.

Not so the House Judiciary Committee. While they hold the President's anticrime package hostage in that committee they vote instead to handcuff one of the country's most effective crimefighting organizations: the FBI. That is right, the same committee that cannot find time to get an anticrime bill to the floor has time to undercut the FBI's capacity to go after official corruption.

We have heard the protests in this Chamber in recent days that it is unfair to brand the Democrats as soft on crime but how else does one explain the actions of the majority leadership of the committee in charge? Let us get tough on crime, not tough on the crimefighters.

10-PERCENT FLAT TAX RATE

(Mr. SILJANDER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SILJANDER. Mr. Speaker, an amazing thing happened in Massachusetts. They offered amnesty to all those in the underground economy who did not pay taxes in their State. They estimated a $7 million windfall profit from this endeavor. Only 6 months after the project was implemented nearly 10 times that amount has come in.

That is why I introduced in House Resolution 5432, the countdown tax reform, a 10-percent simple, flat rate income tax, a national amnesty. The IRS estimates this measure could bring in almost $100 billion a year. What an incentive a 10-percent simple, flat rate income tax would have to those driven underground by facing a 40- or 50-percent tax rate.

I urge the membership to cosign and urge adoption of House Resolution 5432, the simple and fair flat rate income tax with a amnesty provision.

JUDICIARY COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF CRIME LEGISLATION

(Mr. GINGRICH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, the Democratic Party managed to get a 3 for 1 yesterday. In 1 day one of its subcommittees managed to state that the FBI should not go after corrupt Congressmen unless they first get the court's approval, thus weakening the FBI's ability. They decided not to go to conference with the other body on stopping communism in Central America, and they voted as a majority against trying to stop Soviet slave labor from exporting goods to the United States.

To have in 1 day been against crime, against stopping communism and forced slave labor is a remarkable achievement, even for the Democratic leadership of this House.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is Calendar Wednesday. The Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk proceeded to call the committees.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. GINGRICH (when the Committee on the Judiciary was called). Mr. Speaker, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I spoke when the Clerk mentioned the Judiciary Committee. I want to ask the Speaker if he could advise me, is it true as the parliamentary situation where if the chairman of the Judiciary Committee wanted to, he could bring up any bill which had been reported out of the committee for the requisite amount of time such as the insanity defense if he wanted to bring it up at this point?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. GINGRICH. So it is correct—I just want to make sure I understand—that if the chairman of the Judiciary Committee wanted to bring up those anticrime bills that have been reported out of the committee this would be the appropriate point to do that, without having to go to the Rules Committee?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is correct, if the bills have been reported.

The Clerk will continue the call of the committees.

The Clerk concluded the call of the committees.

MOTION TO INSTRUCT MANAGERS ON HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 492, URGENT SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATION FOR DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, 1984

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I offer a preferential motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CONTE moves that the managers on the part of the House be instructed to meet with the managers on the part of the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on House Joint Resolution 492.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CONTE) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume, and pending that, I yield 30 minutes to my chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. JAMIE WHITTEN.

Mr. Speaker, I have offered a motion which is of the highest privilege under clause B of rule XXVIII.

I have sent for the chairman of the Appropriations Committee to be here and I expect him to be here momentarily. We were in a meeting in the Speaker's office across the hall.

I now give notice that whenever I yield during consideration of this motion, I yield for purposes of debate only.

Mr. Speaker, I have offered a motion which so far as I know is unique in the history of the House of Representatives; namely, to instruct conferees simply to go to conference.

Under clause B of rule 28 of the House, after conferees have been appointed for 20 calandar days, and have failed to make a report, it is highly privileged to move to instruct conferees, or to discharge and appoint new conferees.

This clause of rule 28 was intended to be used to break a deadlock between House and the Senate conferees.

The current situation, and the motion, are unique because we do not have a deadlock. We have not even had a conference.

On March 6, the House passed House Joint Resolution 492, which appropriated $150 million for food assistance for Africa through title II of Public Law 480, and made available another $90 million in commodities from the stocks of the Commodity Credit Corporation, for barter or sale on a competitive bid basis.

□ 1610

On April 5, the Senate passed that bill with 36 amendments, appointed conferees, and requested a conference with the House.

On April 11, I asked my chairman, in a letter and in a statement on the floor, to appoint conferees and to go to conference with the Senate before the Easter recess. Later that day we did appoint conferees, 6 days after the Senate had passed the bill.

Three weeks later we have not gone to conference.

This morning, during a meeting of the committee, I asked the chairman to explain why we have not gone to conference with the Senate. His answer did not make sense to me.

The Senate has added 36 amendments to the bill, many of them are special-interest provisions that do not belong in a supplemental. But I said this morning and I say now, what is new?

On July 13, 1983, we went to conference on H.R. 3069, supplemental appropriations bill for fiscal year 1983 with 254 amendments.

On November 4, 1983, we went to conference on H.R. 3959, supplemental appropriations bill for fiscal year 1984 with 67 amendments.

On November 11, 1983, we went to conference on House Joint Resolution 413, further continuing appropriations for fiscal year 1984 with 47 amendments.

On June 9, 1982, we went to conference on H.R. 5922, the urgent supplemental appropriations for fiscal year 1982 with 65 amendments.

On August 12, 1982, we went to conference on H.R. 6863, supplemental appropriations for fiscal year 1982 with 183 amendments.

On September 30, 1982, we went to conference on House Joint Resolution 599, continuing appropriations for fiscal year 1983 with 100 amendments.

On December 19, 1982, we went to conference on House Joint Resolution 631, further continuing appropriations for fiscal year 1983 with 132 amendments.

On May 28, 1981, we went to conference on H.R. 3512, supplemental appropriations for fiscal year 1981 with 432 amendments.

On July 1, 1980, we went to conference on H.R. 7542, supplemental appropriations for fiscal year 1980 rescinding certain budget authority with 344 amendments.

On December 12, 1980, we went to conference on House Joint Resolution 637, continuing appropriations for fiscal year 1981 with 148 amendments.

On June 27, 1979, we went to conference on H.R. 4289, supplemental appropriations for fiscal year 1979 with 182 amendments.

On August 9, 1978, we went to conference on H.R. 13467, second supplemental appropriations for fiscal year 1978 with 83 amendments.

On April 4, 1977, we went to conference on H.R. 4877, supplemental appropriations for fiscal year 1977 with 237 amendments.

On November 1, 1977, we went to conference on H.R. 9375, supplemental appropriations for fiscal year 1978 with 53 amendments.

So now I do not see why we should be afraid to go to conference on 36 amendments.

Several of the amendments are legitimate supplementals, which should be brought back to the House for action.

The Senate reduced the appropriation for title II of Public Law 480 to $60 million, so that the total appropriated for title II, including the $90 million enacted in an earlier supplemental and signed by the President, would be $150 million the amount that originally passed the House of Representatives.

The Senate added $100 million for the summer youth program which we are for.

The Senate added $545.5 million for child nutrition programs, the amount of the budget request.

The Senate added $300 million for women, infants, and children feeding programs, $133 million over the budget request.

Of course the Senate added both funds and conditions for Central America.

The chairman not only refuses to go to conference, he has introduced a so-called clean bill, which was reported by the full committee this morning, and which contains funds for Public Law 480, the child nutrition program, the WIC program, and the summer youth program.

What will happen if we pass that bill and send that bill to the Senate? The Senate will add all of the same amendments, that they had before, and we will be right back where we started, and there will be 3 or 4 weeks of debate and then we are going to go to conference, right where we are today. We have wasted a month with no action on summer youth employment, child nutrition program, WIC, and additional funds for the starving people of Africa.

I do not think we ought to waste another month. Certainly the Congress has been out for 2 weeks, but we could have gone to conference before we had taken the 2 weeks off for the Easter recess.

All right, that is water over the dam. We could go to conference tomorrow morning with the Senate and meet Thursday, Friday, and Saturday if we have to, and get rid of this bill one way or another. I am ready to confront the Senate on the issue of Nicaragua; I am ready to confront the Senate on the issue of military aid to El Salvador; I am ready to confront the Senate with any amendment that they have added to this bill.

This is the way we have done it in the past. I do not and I will not agree with many of the Senate amendments. But that is not the question in point. The question is point is, Will we meet these issues head on? Or will we avoid our responsibility to meet with the Senate and make recommendations to the House? That is the question that is before the House today.

If you believe that we should act responsibly, meet the conference with the Senate, then vote "yes." If you believe that we should avoid that responsibility, prolong this bill at least another month, then you should vote "no."

I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CONTE) has consumed 10 minutes of his time.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. WHITTEN) for 30 minutes.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, this is not an easy job that we have here dealing with appropriations. Thirteen subcommittees, each of which conducts many, many weeks of hearings and there are different points of view. But may I say in this case, I hope you will vote against this motion, telling us to do what we are going to do anyway.

May I point out that in connection with the single purpose bill passed by the House that the Senate added 36 amendments. At a time when we get so many calls from the President, or from the Budget Director, they added $1.3 billion to a bill that had nothing much left but a House identification number.

You will recall that we introduced on this side two bills; one item to each, so as to come under the special rules dealing with one item appropriation bills.

We provided relief for the starvation facing the people of many African nations in one instance and in the other instance we provided for emergency fuel assistance. In going to conference with our colleagues on the Senate side we took the heart out of the African assistance bill and put it in the emergency fuel assistance bill which we agreed on, House and Senate.

You acted on it. But it left only the number of the other bill over there. And to our number they added over 30 amendments. Let me read some of the things that our friends on that side added.

□ 1620

Before I proceed the Members should understand I talked to Senator HATFIELD this afternoon and we are going to get together and see what we need to do to work it out. We have not delayed it in any way. And if we had had a conference in the last 2 weeks, many of our friends would not have been able to participate. We would have had to have held it almost by ourselves.

Let me point out what was added.

The Customs Service air interdiction program was added; Farmers Home Administration and Rural Housing; the sense of Congress language on commodities for Guatemalan refugees; bankruptcy judges; CIA covert aid to Nicaragua; military facilities in Honduras; Bonneville lock and dam and Gallipolis; juror protection in El Salvador; provision on Presidential certification, El Salvador; provision on refugees El Salvador; limitation regarding Panama elections; Presidential report on military equipment in El Salvador; sense of Senate language on El Salvador; sense of Congress language on Seabees in Africa; Colorado tailings site; Cumberland Gap deferral disapproval; set-aside of OMB regulations on the National Park Service; set-aside of allocation formula for the summer youth program; higher education facilities provision; work incentive program; impact aid provision; sense of Senate resolution regarding oil company mergers; money for a history of the Senate and other items. There were 36 amendments that include legislation on about everything under the Sun and go to $1.4 billion at a time when they are to freeze everything where it is.

Now, that does not mean that our friends over there are not doing the best they can. Our friend, Senator HATFIELD, voted against many of these things, but he finally had to start accepting them so they could pass a bill and get to conference.

Now may I say that I had a discussion with him and with the recess schedule, I understand they could not hope under their rules to act in time to do anything. That is what they told me and I agree with them.

So relying on that the things that I considered, and after listening to my colleagues I put together a bill that included time-sensitive items which required action. There are items in which Members on both sides are interested. I included a provision giving the rest of the famine relief money to Africa, which had language of CCC making commodities available for sale at competitive prices; a provision for jobs in the cities with hot weather coming on, and money for child nutrition and women, infants, and children. I included those things that were essential and I put them together there because we were trying to show that we were not trying to delay with the recess coming up.

With respect to my friend from Massachusetts, may I say I have enjoyed working with him through the years. Understandably, we have some differences now and then about how to proceed, but we have worked together mighty, mighty well. I tried to share my thoughts about our problems with the Easter break before us. We were all very busy and there was some uncertainty.

I had 107 Members of the House ask me to do something that showed we wanted action. So I wrote this bill. And with respect to El Salvador, I provided that for 30 days they could go ahead as is at the same level and with the same restrictions.

To me as a lawyer who writes a settlement from time to time, I thought it was very reasonable. I sent copies to 107 Members in one case and about 100 in another and I did not have a single word of criticism. I had many nice letters.

So I am telling you do not make us go to conference as though we did not want to. There had not been anybody here to confer with.

I am going to talk again with the Senate chairman, who is a fine person and easy to deal with, and see what we can work out. Most of these things were put in there against his wishes. We are going to invite my friend from Massachusetts (Mr. CONTE) to participate. We have always worked together.

Let us vote down this motion and count on him working with me, and me with him, as we have heretofore. Let us not come in here and tell us, "Go to conference," when we have not delayed. We just have not had anybody to confer with.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITTEN. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. VOLKMER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Then the gentleman is requesting a "no" vote on the privileged motion?

Mr. WHITTEN. I would hope the gentleman would oppose a motion which would thus instruct the conferees.

I would like to talk to Senator HATFIELD before we go. So do not make us go before we are ready.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I certainly am not going to prolong this debate. I just said and restate my position that we should go to conference tomorrow morning. I wrote my chairman before the recess and urged that we go to conference. There were a lot of accusations against the administration that they were holding up that bill over in the Senate because of El Salvador and Nicaragua and how cruel it was to the people of Africa.

Here we are on May 2 and we still have not completed our supplemental.

In regard to the question about the Senate adding $1.4 billion, the chairman is absolutely right, but he files a bill which he is going to be taking up here on the floor of the House, if my motion is defeated—and I am sure it will be defeated—which provides for $567 million that the House never acted upon.

So we are not laying our cards completely on the table. If they are wrong for $1.4 billion, we are pretty wrong in adding $567 million.

However, I am not opposed to some of these programs. I am for a lot of these programs. In fact, I think that if the chairman was going to put a lot of worthwhile projects in should have put $75 million that the Senate passed for public broadcasting for the next 3 years. A very, very worthwhile program. That was left out.

But I am not going to pursue this argument. I just feel the proper way to go and the reason why I am making this motion is that we should go to conference. Why dillydally around? Why wait until next week and bring this other bill? I do not know what kind of a rule he is going to get. He was given permission this morning to seek a rule of his choosing. If it is an open rule, there are going to be all kinds of amendments offered here on the floor of the House on El Salvador, on Nicaragua, and everything else.

Here is we go to conference we could meet these things head on. And if we do not do our job in conference, this House of Representatives can knock down that conference report, which they have done from time to time in the 26 years that I have been in the Congress.

This is the first time I have ever seen this procedure and I think we are losing the whole month.

All I say is that about a month from now read the RECORD, read what I said, that is what we are doing, we are wasting time.

□ 1630

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONTE. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WHITTEN. In the years that the gentleman and I have worked together, we have been in tough situations many times. I have handled many lawsuits. I know the gentleman from Massachusetts has reached many settlements on various types of issues.

One of the best ways in the world to get somebody else to hold the line is to have something in your pocket that takes care what needs to be so that you can fall back on it if you have to.

And I think when we go to conference, the best thing will be to have a bill that takes care of what has to be done, and as long as we have that, we have a much better bargaining position. It has worked many, many times.

So I hope the gentleman will not think that we were unwise to have a bill of our own. It just means we will be in a stronger position when we go to conference. We have not refused to go to conference. I believe this is the first time the gentleman has asked us to go to conference. I don't recall the gentleman asking me to go to conference before today.

Mr. CONTE. Oh, wait a minute. Wait a minute. Let us read my letter here that I wrote to the gentleman on April 11. I will ask the gentleman to look in his records. I say: "I don't believe we can simply leave for the recess without going to conference on the supplemental and bringing our agreements and disagreements to the House for a vote."

Mr. WHITTEN. What day did you leave?

Mr. CONTE. I do not know what day we left.

Mr. WHITTEN. I believe the recess began on the 12th. So if we had gone to conference, I would have been by myself.

Mr. CONTE. I would stick with you, Mr. Chairman. Do not worry about that.

Mr. WHITTEN. Now, I stayed here during the time of the jobs bill last year and wrote the bill while the Congress was in recess. This time during the recess I thought I was entitled to go to my district in Mississippi.

Mr. CONTE. Well, I agree with the gentleman there. But the letter would not have taken 2 days. It was hand delivered to the gentleman on the 11th, when we were here. But that is neither here nor there. And I have seen the gentleman. The gentleman is a master. When the gentleman says something about being unwise, I would be the last guy in the world to say that you were not one of the wisest owls in this House.

Mr. McDADE. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I want to say that I have been privileged to serve with the gentleman from Massachusetts for my 22 years. Everybody in this House has seen him here for 26 years. I do not know of anybody who has ever suggested that he was not here when he was needed to meet the needs of the country, ever, at any time, and that is true today and that was true when we should have gone to conference before the recess occurred. You know it and everybody in this Chamber knows it. I think it demeans the House to begin to suggest anything like that. We could send one page to the Senate and they will send us back a telephone book. They have done it time and time again. And what we ought to do is what my friend from Massachusetts has suggested repeatedly, we should have gone, and you are the chairman, Mr. Chairman, you are the chairman of the committee, you should have called the conference before the recess, you should have taken the committee over there, we should have met with the Senate. It does not do us any good to get into this kind of a discussion.

I applaud my friend from Massachusetts as one of the ablest legislators in this body, one of the most conscientious, and one who is regarded highly on both sides of the aisle.

Mr. WHITTEN. May I say the gentleman from Pennsylvania is one of a similar kind. I have the highest regard for both of you. But may I say I have been in communication with the Senate, the chairman of the Appropriations Committee. I talked to him this afternoon. We have not delayed anything. We have been waiting for us all to be back.

Mr. McDADE. We could have gone before.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the previous question is ordered on the preferential motion.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the preferential motion offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CONTE).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CONTE) there were—ayes 13, noes 10.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 159, nays 245, not voting 29, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. Robert F. Smith for, with Mr. Ford of Michigan against.

Mr. Lewis of Florida for, with Mr. Leland against.

Mr. Gramm for, with Mr. Hayes against.

Mr. Bliley for, with Mr. D'Amours against.

Mr. Paul for, with Mr. Garcia against.

Messrs. STRATTON, ERDREICH, and MARTINEZ changed their votes from "yea" to "nay."

So the motion to instruct was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

REPORT ON H.R. 5564, SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS BILL, 1984

Mr. WHITTEN, from the Committee on Appropriations, submitted a privileged report (Rept. No. 98-729) on the bill (H.R. 5564) making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1984, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Union Calendar and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MYERS reserved all points of order on the bill.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON S. 64, IRISH WILDERNESS ACT OF 1984

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the Senate bill (S. 64) to establish the Irish Wilderness in the Mark Twain National Forest, Mo.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, the conference report is considered as having been read.

(For conference report and statement, see proceedings of the House, page 8341 of April 9, 1984.)

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING) will be recognized for 30 minutes and the gentleman from Alaska (Mr. YOUNG) will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING).

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL), the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

Mr. UDALL. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to approve this afternoon this sound and solid bill which is a product of a bipartisan effort over the last several years. This is a small wilderness area as wilderness areas go, but we compromised with the Senate and split the difference so that we end up with something like 16,500 acres.

This bill was approved by a substantial margin in the House committee. It passed the House earlier with overwhelming support. The House actually gained a little bit more, I think, from the viewpoint of the opponents of the bill in the conference. The Senate bill included 17,562 acres; the House bill 15,500 acres, and the conference agreed on 16,500 acres. We made a few compromises, but this is a good, sound bill and it ought to be approved. I urge my colleagues to support the conference report and support the committee.

Mr. SEIBERLING, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. HUCKABY).

Mr. HUCKABY. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to rise in support of the conference report and urge my colleagues to vote for it.

I think this is a classic example of reaching what I consider to be a fair, a reasonable, compromise. Even though this is a relatively small bill as far as the acreage involved, certainly the people in the area were vitally concerned about the mineral development, the potential for development in the future, the potential for future jobs being denied.

A compromise was reached in such a manner so that it says, "You cannot have everything that you want for wilderness. Let us look and strike a reasonable balance."

I want to commend the gentleman from Ohio for working on these efforts, and I also would like to commend my colleague on the other side of the aisle, the gentleman from Missouri. I know he was somewhat disappointed with the final outcome, but yet he did win a victory, I think a significant victory, in the fact that some land is being left outside the wilderness area, the land with the greatest potential for commercial development. Certainly this is what was very important in reaching the compromise in this legislation.

I would like to commend the gentlemen on both sides of the aisle for working together. Even though they are still not in total agreement, I feel that we have arrived at an adequate compromise.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I thank the distinguished gentleman from Louisiana for his contribution in working out this bill, and we certainly do appreciate the support that he has generated for it.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New York (Mr. BIAGGI).

Mr. BIAGGI. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this legislation. I commend the gentleman from Ohio for his leadership, and also the ranking member on the minority side.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. MCNULTY).

● Mr. McNULTY. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and a sponsor of the Arizona Wilderness bill, I am pleased to note that this measure, the Irish Wilderness Act, was passed by this body, and passed by a substantial majority. I know the difficulties and the deliberations that are involved in developing a wilderness bill.

The House version of this bill—and I played a part in producing it—contained 2,000 acres less than the bill the Senate passed. That difference might seem inconsequential, but the acreage in question located in the upper northwest corner of the area has a high potential for mineral extraction, and because of those concerns the acreage was not included in the House bill.

The conference report today splits that difference between the House and Senate bill and adds 1,000 acres to the House version for a total of 16,500 acres. Excluded from the designation is the land containing that with the most significant mineral value. My good friend, the gentleman from Missouri, with whom I sided in this matter, shares a lot of the same kind of interests I do with respect to minerals, and had I had my way, I would have preferred the House version.

Let me repeat my last two sentences, Mr. Speaker. Yes, I would have preferred the House version to come back here. I have a lot of the same interests my good friend, the gentleman from Missouri, does, and he fought a gallant fight in this matter. But politics is the art of compromise and the science of the achievable. The bill in front of us today in this conference report is fair and decent, and it is as good a piece of legislation as the system is capable of producing.

Consequently, Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to vote for the conference report on S. 64, the Irish Wilderness Act.●

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. EMERSON), the Member in whose district this bill arises.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the conference report on S. 64, the Irish Wilderness Act, and I want to take a few brief moments to review with the Members the history of this issue and to go through a few of the recent developments here because I think there are some important principles involved here relating to the integrity of the action that was taken by the House of Representatives. This proposed wilderness area was designated a further planning area during the RARE II process due to the high potential of lead and zinc deposits within its boundaries.

This morning I was speaking to the chairman of our committee in the committee, and we were visiting very briefly about the fact that the Irish Wilderness proposal was going to be up today. He told me that he understood I had taken a strong, unyielding, and rigidly inflexible position on this subject. I hope that was said in the spirit of good humor in which the chairman of the committee usually speaks, but lest there be any doubt about it, let me tell the House that in trying to work out a compromise here I have gone fifteen-seventeenths of the way from my original position.

When the Senate-passed bill was considered by the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, a compromise was reached between the deletion of 4,000 acres and no deletion of acreage whatsoever. The members of the committee decided to delete 2,000 acres rather than 4,000 acres as had originally been proposed, and obviously I think the compromise was reached at this point between the House and the Senate.

When that bill came to the House of Representatives, I supported it. I supported it because it contained at least two-seventeenths of what I was trying to get for my constituency. I had come at that point fifteen-seventeenths of the way. I voted for it, together with the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING), and the chairman of the full committee, the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL), and I had every expectation that when we went to the conference, the House position would at least be spoken for. Subsequent to the committee action, though, when a vote of the whole House was recorded on August 2 of last year, 406 Members of this House voted for the bill, as amended by the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, and only 18 Members of this House opposed it. Among those voting for the bill, as amended, was every member of the House-Senate conference that voted to put 1,000 acres back into the wilderness proposal, and not one of those members save me on the conference insisted on the House version. And I have the transcript of the deliberations in the conference here if anyone cares to look at it. When we went over to the conference, the Senate did not even ask us to give them 1,000 acres, but the gentleman from Ohio, the chairman of the subcommittee, moved immediately. "I say, let's have a compromise, Senate. We offer you here an additional 1,000 acres." So then the Senate had sixteen-seventeenths of what it wanted as opposed to the fifteen-seventeenths to which I had agreed here.

I think it is important to point out that this legislation would affect Missouri's Eighth Congressional District, and that congressional district alone. I voted for S. 64, as amended, because I felt it represented a compromise that was indeed more than reasonable. My earlier preference on this would have been to have left the whole 17,500 acres under the exemplary management of the Forest Service, but working in a spirit of compromise, I gave up fifteen-seventeenths of what was my real druthers, and I feel that that was about as far as I could go.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EMERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for yielding.

I just want to make clear what this is about. I am not on top of these issues obviously as much as the gentleman is. I have tried to be a supporter in the past of wilderness legislation, including the Irish Wilderness.

I just want to make clear, though, where we stand now. The measure we are voting on now is not precisely the same as the bill I voted for before?

Mr. EMERSON. No, it is not.

Mr. WEBER. Would the gentleman explain quickly the differences?

Mr. EMERSON. Well, it gives up a thousand more acres than what we had agreed on in the House here by a vote of 406 to 18, and the House position in the conference was not spoken for save by me as the Member who represents the affected district. The chairman of the subcommittee offered to give the Senate 1,000 additional acres before the Senate even asked for it.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. EMERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. WEBER. And the manner in which we supported it before was supported by the members of the Interior Committee on both sides of the aisle?

Mr. EMERSON. Absolutely. It was supported by the chairman of the committee, the chairman of the subcommittee, and, I believe, by every member of the committee. There may have been one or two exceptions, but the gentleman from Alaska (Mr. YOUNG) supported it, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING) supported it, the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL) supported it, and I supported it.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. EMERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Speaker, I will not take a lot more of the gentleman's time. Even though we do not always agree on wilderness issues, it seems to me that the gentleman has not been treated fairly. It seems to me that the House did a good job in the first place, and I for one, as a supporter of wilderness, intend to support the position of the gentleman from Missouri. I am sorry that he has been treated so shabbily by his colleagues on that side.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. WEBER).

Moving on to another point, Mr. Speaker, one big issue that is involved here that gets very little attention is the issue of jobs. The counties in the area surrounding the proposed Irish Wilderness have unemployment rates that range from 13.9 percent in Carter County to 25.3 percent in Shannon County. The unemployment rates in Oregon and Ripley Counties are 14.7 and 18.3 percent respectively.

Mr. Speaker, all of the host evidence indicates that this proposed wilderness area is the best place in the world to look for a new deposit of lead ore. Although this very region accounted for 92 percent of all the domestic lead produced in 1982, the known deposits are expected to be depleted within the next 10 to 15 years, and no one knows whether there are any more domestic lead ore deposits.

Mines would mean jobs and pay checks for the people who live in this area, and they would mean a tax base for these financially strapped counties.

I would like to take a little time to explain how lead is mined. Lead mines cause minimal surface disturbances. Lead ore is located several hundred feet below the face of the Earth. The surface buildings and equipment necessary for a lead mine take up only a few hundred acres, really about 100 acres at best.

Mr. Speaker, the overwhelming majority of my constituents really do not want any wilderness at all in this area.

I might say that this proposed wilderness area does not by any standard of definition meet the qualifications of the 1964 Wilderness Act. It is not untrammeled by man. It does have roads in it. There was a mine in there one time. It has been inhabited, so it is not the pristine area that some would like you to believe that it is.

My constituents are delighted with the manner in which this land has been managed by the Forest Service and can find no reason for which it should be taken from their stewardship, and I agree with them. In fact, only one elected official in the whole area has publicly expressed support for this legislation and I might point out that that person is not running for reelection.

In addition, every Member of Congress who has ever represented the district in which this area is located has opposed wilderness designation, and that includes Republicans and Democrats; however, my constituents are willing to accept the version of the bill that was passed by this House, but they are not willing to give them everything.

I think having preserved two-seventeenths is going far enough, but now the Senate by the action of the House conferees are proposing to leave my constituents with only one-seventeenth of what they really want.

This body has the opportunity to show how sincere its Members really are when they speak of wanting to provide jobs for Americans, wanting to help people improve their own lot in life and let some people in the local areas have control over their own destinies.

Finally, I want to point out to the House, to those who may be concerned about it, there really is no Irish issue involved here. There have been some comments that the Ancient Order of Hibernians might be upset if we did not designate the Irish Wilderness as a part of the wilderness system. The Irish Wilderness has been called the Irish Wilderness for about 150 years, long before anybody knew anything about wilderness, and I assure you that this area will be called the Irish Wilderness into time immemorial, irrespective of what happens here; so there is not a matter relating to the designation of the "Irish factor" here.

The question is how much wilderness are we really going to have.

I want to repeat for emphasis. I compromised, and this is only in my district; I compromised fifteen-seventeenths of the way. We went to conference and the House conferees, before the Senate even spoke, offered to give you another 1,000.

I do not think that is a responsible representation of the House position. I urge my colleagues to vote "No," to oppose this further step.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentlewoman from Nevada (Mrs. VUCANOVICH).

Mrs. VUCANOVICH. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the conference report on the Irish Wilderness bill, S. 64.

Throughout Interior Committee consideration of the bill we struggled with the issue of wilderness versus mineral values. I was pleased with the agreement we reached to remove 2,000 acres from the wilderness proposal. I am well acquainted with the important role that mining can play in local economies and strongly supported the removal of that acreage. I voted for S. 64, as amended.

I think it is extremely unfortunate that some of that acreage has been added back in conference. I simply cannot support this conference because I feel very strongly that mineral values, and the important role that mining plays in local economies, must be recognized when we consider the designation of wilderness areas. I also think that the wishes of the Congressman whose district the wilderness area is in should be respected. After all, it is his constituents who must bear the burden of our actions here in Washington.

By the way, I am Irish.

I urge my colleagues to join me in voting against the conference on the Irish Wilderness bill. Thank you.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer to the report of the conference. You will notice on one side that there is only the chairman of the committee and the majority side signing the conference report. None of the Republicans signed the report, none of the Republicans and those who are listening to this in your offices now, keep that in mind, because the intent and the integrity of the committee, the compromise that was reached in the committee itself, that was voted by the chairman of the subcommittee and voted by the chairman of the full committee and I believe there was not but one person on the full committee that voted against the compromise that came out of the committee; 408 House Members voted for it, and yet when we went over to the Senate side, what did the House do, led by my good friend, the gentleman from Ohio? He proposed the amendment to further compromise the Irish Wilderness, to further compromise the Irish Wilderness that my good friend, the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. EMERSON) worked so hard on, and may I say he has worked diligently for the last 4 years on this issue, has worked hard to make sure that his constituents were heard, and they were.

I can suggest that the committee itself, the conference, is a farce. Yes, I can have you say that the Senators wanted it. We have to speak for the House and when we voted in that subcommittee and in the full committee and on the floor of the House, that was the House position, and no chairman on this side should compromise the House position and offer that amendment, and that is what happened.

As my good friend, the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. EMERSON) has said before, this is not a new issue. The Irish Wilderness has been with us when Mr. Bailey was here, our former colleague. The Irish Wilderness was defeated at that time. We tried to work a compromise and we did reach that compromise through the efforts of the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. EMERSON); but as we went to conference, the House position was sold out, sold out to those other Members outside of the district that the Irish Wilderness resides in; again by the special interest groups, and for those who are listening to this on the floor and in your offices, I want to remind you that this is not the only wilderness bill that is going to be on the floor of the House this year and the next year, and each time the Sierra Club, the Friends of the Earth, et cetera, et cetera, say, "Oh, don't listen to the land experts, listen to us, forget the Representative. He doesn't know what he is talking about just because he was elected by the people. After all, this is no longer a government of the people. It is a government of the special interests, a government of those who disregard the experts, disregard the information given to us by the Forest Department."

They will put in an area as a wilderness that has mines in it, roads, barbed wire, farms and probably, yes, a still someplace out there, I am not sure, but very likely a still or two still operating.

And why is it being proposed as a wilderness? I can tell you why, because all of a sudden there was the possibility of a find of a great world lead deposit that might have created jobs; in fact, would have created jobs, and all of a sudden that area which has been mined, farmed, logged and, yes, produced those hard beverages that we indulge in once in a while, became qualified for wilderness, because they do not want jobs for Americans. They do not want us to have the opportunities proposed, that they can prosper and have opportunities for use. They want this Nation to become stagnated; no drilling for oil, no gas, no lead, none of the minerals, none of those things that this nation became great with.

May I say this about the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. EMERSON). He has tried and he has been successful in the committee. He has told us, we have worked together, and after we had won and he had agreed and he told us, let us vote because we have reached a compromise, we went down to the conference and that gentleman there proposed the amendment and compromised us to the Senate.

My friends, again I want to ask you to vote no on this conference. Let us for once stand up for the House. Let us send this bill back. Let us go back to conference. Let us vote no and if it does pass, let us get a veto and sustain the veto.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. VOLKMER).

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the chairman of the subcommittee and the gentleman from Ohio for yielding to me.

I just would like to briefly comment that some of us from Missouri and many others that preceded me here and other people in Missouri have been trying to get the Irish Wilderness designated a wilderness for a good many years. It goes back for a good many years.

This legislation is not the first time it has been introduced in the Congress and by the way, this legislation before us, the original sponsors in the Senate where both the Senators, one from each party in the other body supporting it.

I would also like to point out on the conference report that the Senators who signed it are from the other party as well as from this party.

This is basically a compromise. It is true that we started out with 17,000 acres in the legislation that was passed by the other body. But I think we should also remember that back when the Irish Wilderness was originally proposed as a wilderness area we were talking about 30,000 acres back then, and it came down and came down. And then It came down as it passed the House to approximately 15,500. And some of us felt that it was worth a compromise to end up with 16,500, even though we would have preferred to have the full 17,500 of the acreage.

One thousand acres has been set aside and basically that area under this legislation could be immediately filed for claims for those who wish to explore for lead in the area. That is the area specifically that they first wanted and proposed to file claims on and is the area set aside in that 1,000 acres. So we are not trying to deprive anyone of jobs.

We are hoping that the House will pass this legislation and will give to Missouri the last area that is qualified for a wilderness area. It will be the largest, even though it is only 17,000 acres, it will be the largest in the State of Missouri. And it was recommended for a wilderness area in the RARE II studies. And I think it would behoove the House to vote for and pass this legislation.

I am afraid that if we do not that the Senators will decide that they want the full amount, and if we stick and say we have to have the full amount then we get no legislation. And as a spirit of compromise, those of us who feel strongly on it are willing to take the 16,500 acres and hope that the Members will pass the legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of the conference report on the Irish Wilderness legislation. As the sponsor of the House companion bill in both the 97th and the 98th Congress—bills which were cosponsored by my friends and colleagues Mr. CLAY, Mr. WHEAT, Mr. ALEXANDER, and Mr. UDALL—I am pleased to see this legislation so near the end of its long journey.

Adoption of this conference report and enactment of S. 64 will culminate an effort to preserve the beautiful Irish Wilderness which began many years ago with an original proposal of some 30,000 acres. Thanks to countless hours of tireless efforts by those who want to preserve a bit of our Ozark scenery for all Missourians and our neighbors to enjoy, we have reached the point we are at today.

The Irish would be the seventh area designated as wilderness in Missouri. At 16,500 acres, it would also be the largest, and is regarded by many as the crown jewel of our Ozark Wilderness.

As has been noted by speakers before me, the Senate-passed version of S. 64 designated some 17,500 acres of national forest land in Missouri as wilderness, to preserve the area from mineral exploration and mining. The bill was amended in the House Interior Committee, and the area protected was cut to 15,500 acres. The only difference to be worked out by the conferees was the size of the wilderness area.

I support the rather obvious and commonsense compromise which split the difference between the two versions. One thousand acres was removed from the Senate-passed bill, and 1,000 acres was added to the House version. The 1,000 acres removed from the wilderness designation are located in areas most likely to contain any lead deposits that might be present and for which mineral prospecting permits were first requested.

The agreement further allows the immediate consideration of prospecting permits in the areas deleted from wilderness designation, which is currently prohibited for the remainder of the fiscal year.

This commonsense compromise was agreed to by a 6-to-3 vote of the House conferees, and with the assent of the three Senators present. The agreement does not strictly adhere to the 15,500-acre area adopted by the House last year, nor does it yield to the Senate's strong preference for a 17,500-acre area. The split-the-difference compromise represents a version of the bill which supporters in both Houses can accept.

At the request of residents of my district, I have sponsored and worked for legislation to designate the Irish Wilderness. I am pleased and proud that we are so near success. I support the conference report and would urge its speedy adoption.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, how much time do I have left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING) has 20 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Alaska (Mr. YOUNG) has 14 minutes remaining.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes. I doubt I will take that much.

We are talking about a 1,000-acre difference between the Senate bill and the House bill and the compromise bill.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEIBERLING. I will be happy to yield.

Mr. EMERSON. We are talking about a 1,000-acre difference between the House bill and the Senate bill. But we are talking about the view of my constituency having moved from wanting to give up zero to having given up now 16,500 acres. I say when they went beyond the House position, which was 15,500 acres, they went 1,000 acres too far.

The gentleman from Missouri, Mr. VOLKMER, speaks very plaintively about how the proponents had hoped for many years to have this bill, and I agree; I voted with the gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman from Ohio in giving the wilderness proponents fifteen-seventeenths of what they want. But that is not enough. Now they have to have another 1,000 acres.

I realize 1,000 acres does not sound like very much. But I ask you to bear in mind the point and the principle here.

Compromise? I have given up fifteen-seventeenths in order to reach a compromise, but now, no, they still have to have another 1,000 acres.

I feel that I worked for the genuine compromise which was ratified by this House by a vote of 406 to 11.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Let me say that as the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. VOLKMER, pointed out, the original Irish Wilderness area that was studied by the Forest Service was approximately 30,000 acres, so on the one hand the environmental groups came down and on the other hand the people that wanted no wilderness in that area came up, and they met about midway.

Now, it is significant to me that both the gentleman from Louisiana, Mr. HUCKABY, who offered the original amendment, and the gentleman from Arizona, Mr. MCNULTY, who offered the final version that the House adopted, support this compromise.

This is a compromise by splitting the difference between the House and Senate bill but it preserves the essence of what the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. EMERSON, wanted, which was the opportunity for the St. Joe Lead Co. and other people who are interested in lead exploration to take the areas of most favorable lead possibilities and continue to explore. And that is the area that is in the 1,000 acres that we have excluded from wilderness in this committee report.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEIBERLING. I will be happy to yield.

Mr. EMERSON. I am puzzled as to why there was no effort at all to present and to maintain the House position. We went there and you said, "OK, Senate, here is another 1,000." You could hardly wait to give that 1,000 acres away.

Mr. SEIBERLING. I heard what the gentleman said, and the fact is that when we came to conference it was perfectly clear that the other body preferred its position and that the gentleman from Missouri preferred the House position. But when you are talking about something as minute as 2,000 acres, and when we came up with a compromise which preserves the mineralized zone for exploration by dropping it out, we are talking about something that should not even be debated. We should have settled it in 5 minutes and walked out of there.

So I am simply suggesting that the gentleman has the privilege of demonstrating to those in his district, and they are the majority, let us say, in the county concerned, but certainly not everyone, if he wants to demonstrate to them that he is going to fight to the bitter end, he has that privilege. But I do not think we ought to take up further time of this body to debate something as trivial as the question of whether the House and the other body should have split the difference between the two bills or insisted upon another 1,000 acres being excluded from wilderness.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEIBERLING. No, I do not yield any more. The gentleman can get time on his side.

So let me merely say we should not even be taking up the time of the House now debating this issue. This should be routine. We have worked out a very simple compromise that preserves the important parts that the lead industry wanted to explore and at the same time tries to put the areas that do not have high mineralizing in wilderness. And it resolves the issue, and we ought to get on with it and support the conference report.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

I would like to just make one comment about the chairman saying this is a trivial matter. Nothing is trivial. It is a matter of what you call interpretation.

A 1,000 acres one way or the other you say makes no difference. A 1,000 acres this gentleman worked so hard to reach a compromise in committee and, in fact, I even voted for a wilderness bill and that really bothers me, to be really honest with you. We tried to have a recreation area made out of it, which it should be. That was denied.

So it is not trivial matter. This is a position the House must maintain. If we are just going to hand the Senate what was voted on that side, then I think we ought not have the conference. Let us just pass the Senate bills.

It was our responsibility in the conference to represent the House position. That did not happen. In fact, the House offered the amendment.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. EMERSON).

Mr. EMERSON. I thank the gentleman from Alaska for yielding.

Just a couple of important points here. I do not mean to belabor.

The gentleman from Ohio suggests that by speaking in defense of this little county down in southern Missouri that has a population of about 10,000 people that it is hardly worth talking about. You know, Daniel Webster admitted that Dartmouth was a small college, but he felt compelled to defend it.

Oregon County is a small county in my district and I feel compelled to defend her interests.

One further point that I want to make and I do not think it is just Oregon County. I think it deserves the time of this House. We are doing something to the future of the people of this tiny county. And to the gentleman from Missouri, my good friend, Mr. VOLKMER, and he is my friend, I think he is not on the floor right now, but in view of his advocacy, his strong advocacy of wilderness for Missouri, I want him to come up with a proposed list of areas that ought to be designated wilderness in his district, because he does not have any wilderness in his district. This is all in my district, and I want to cooperate with the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. VOLKMER) to see that they get some bona fide wilderness up in northeast Missouri.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. VOLKMER).

Mr. VOLKMER. I would just like to say if the gentleman could find any area in northeast Missouri to qualify for wilderness, I will be more than happy to sponsor the legislation. The only area that even comes close, that is also within the Mark Twain National Forest, is not qualified. A RARE II study showed that it was not.

The people in the area would support a designation. When the administration proposed to sell off these excess lands, that was one of those little fingers, that was one of them, and the people got up in arms about that.

And I support the continuation of that area within the national forest.

□ 1730

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLKMER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. EMERSON. I want to work with the gentleman to find appropriate areas, some appropriate areas in northeast Missouri, given his overwhelming interest in my district in southeast Missouri.

Mr. VOLKMER. I would be more than happy if the gentleman can find some.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. DAUB).

Mr. DAUB. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a minute to ask the subcommittee chairman a question, if he would care to respond, and to ask him if in his opinion this is small and trivial, to quote the conference report, effort somehow to find out a way out of this box of a difference of 2,000 acres between 17,000 and 15,000, if indeed the chairman in the conference committee felt that he fought for the position of the House in this conference committee on behalf of the gentleman in whose district this piece of property is?

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield.

Mr. DAUB. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, let me say this: I fought for what I considered to be the interests of the people of Oregon County to the extent they were involved in this 2,000-acre difference. And I was going to ask the gentleman from Missouri if he could explain to me how the 1,000 acres that this conference report would put back into the wilderness area are going to make an economic difference in view of the fact that the area of high lead mineralization is the area which the St. Joe Lead Co. is most interested in, and which is the area that we dropped out of the wilderness? I would be interested to know that.

Mr. DAUB. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the response from my colleague.

I would say to all of my colleagues, in conclusion, that maybe the point is that some folks did not know what the value of that 1,000 acres might or might not be, that if the person, as a matter of principle, in whose district this issues resides is not given the benefit of all doubt by any of the Members of the House that have to take issues like this to conference, then the very principle of the matter becomes much more important than the question itself.

I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has consumed 2 minutes.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, be there no mistake, I would like to have one other comment about the conference, they not only stopped at giving 1,000 acres back to the Senate, they also have a statement which was not signed by the Republican side that instructs the Forest Service to protect the area that the Congress left out of wilderness, to protect its wilderness character, no activities except mining, and I do not know how you can mine if you cannot have other activities such as transportation by mechanized vehicles, and so forth, will be allowed.

Now it is my experience that these special restrictions make it impossible to do any mining.

So what we have done is not only given the Senate 1,000 acres; the 30,000 acres which was not asked for by the Forest Service, was asked for by the Senate, the 30,000 acres that will be treated as wilderness de facto.

So what we have really done in this conference is totally negate the compromise we reached in the committee. So I really want to stress and urge a no vote on this legislation in recognition of the Member who represents that area and in recognition that the conference did not uphold the House position.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER).

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding. And I want to commend him on his earlier statement with regard to how much special interest power is playing a role in this body. Sitting here listening to this debate, it becomes clear to me how much we are abandoning the representative process in the House of Representatives.

The Member from the district that is involved is totally ignored, his pleas are called trivial here. And yet evidently what we have is the advent of special interest power that is going to tell us what we should do in areas represented well by the people of that area.

It just does not make much sense that representative government should have come to this day when special interests play a much more important role than the representatives of the people play.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment the gentleman on his statement because if anybody forgets that this is happening not only to Mr. EMERSON, I have a little booklet back in my office called the Wilderness Aside Proposal for ALKA-II, that is the Alaskan Wilderness proposal for the nineties.

Now I thought we were finished with that, but they want to put 76 million acres, not 1,000 acres; 76 million acres into additional wilderness plus 147 million acres they already have, they want to stop the borax mining which is the only employment we have in the Southeast, they want to stop the 480 million board feet cuttage that we have in the Southeast, they want to stop the boot across the Arctic, they want to do everything that we reached a compromise on, agreed to by my good friend from Ohio, and voted, by the way, by my good friend from Ohio, he voted for it. All of a sudden it is coming back at us. We have the special interest groups sending out flashy, slick brochures saying, "We have to save the wilderness."

What happened to jobs in America? What happens to the independence that we need on minerals which we are importing from the Third World?

Yes, one-third of our oil yet is still coming from the Far East where we have the Ayatollah and everybody else dictating to us. Is it time we start waking up to the fact of what these groups are saying. Who can be against wilderness? No one. But we have to remember what we are locking up when we do it. That is not being told to the public. And many Members of this House do not know it.

Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I have been sitting and listening to the debate on this point. I represent California. I have a large district. I have a number of acres of wilderness already established and we are in the process of attempting to establish more wilderness. I have tried to operate in a fair and open manner, negotiating with the Sierra Club, negotiating with the Members of this House on particular committees, assuming that the agreements that we made that were honored in committee and that were honored on the floor by an overwhelming vote of the House would at least be minimally defended by those people who represented this body in negotiations with the other body.

And when I hear the reply from the chairman of the subcommittee that what the gentleman from Missouri is fighting for is inconsequential, I can tell you that not the 1,000 acres but the thousands of acres that the gentleman from Ohio is interested in putting in wilderness in California, and some of that in my district, are certainly going to be challenged, that the willingness to negotiate and to compromise is no longer there if the gentleman from Missouri's thousand acres is inconsequential.

I am very much concerned about the attitude presented on this floor.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. If the gentleman will yield, he will be happy to know that there has apparently been a compromise reached, I am not sure behind closed doors, by one of the Senators and the chairman of the subcommittee and the full committee on the California wilderness bill, the Washington wilderness bill, the Oregon wilderness bill, and I would suggest respectfully the gentleman had better check those borders and those boundaries because I would have a sneaking suspicion that they were much larger than what was passed on the House floor. I am not sure. I do know that there is soft release language in them.

It is ironic to me that you bring up this point after we brought it up, but I would suggest to the gentleman that he be very aware in California. We do not know what is in that package. But I am not sure the House position is being strongly defended.

I would suggest respectfully that the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. EMERSON) brings out a valid point here. This is his district. Some say it is only 1,000 acres, but I am suggesting that the House position was not defended. In fact, it was put in the position of compromise beyond anything we had any imagination, without any true defense.

We owe him a "No" vote on this compromise. We owe this House a "No" vote if we are to be a separate body from the other body.

I urge my colleagues to vote "No."

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. HUCKABY).

Mr. HUCKABY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I have not planned on commenting further, but I would like to point out to my colleagues, and I worked with the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle initially in this, in passing a package in the House of Representatives. I worked with St. Joe Minerals looking at the areas with the most potential, the far future mineral development, and we arrived at a package in the House of Representatives. We went to conference. Unfortunately, although I was a conferee, I was not able to be there that day, I was at an agriculture conference that day.

There are two Senators from Missouri, one from either party. Both of the Senators from Missouri took the position of the Senate, which was 2,000 acres more in wilderness than the House position.

So the conference—what came out of the conference is a compromise. The House's position was further compromised by 1,000 acres. We did not get it all, but we got some of it.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUCKABY. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. EMERSON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I do not dispute the point of the gentleman from Louisiana.

The gentleman from Louisiana, the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. MCNULTY), have been most helpful and accommodating in this matter. But I think we do get down ultimately here to a point of principle.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman (Mr. HUCKABY) has expired.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. EMERSON).

Mr. EMERSON. I thank the gentleman for yielding further.

I think we do ultimately get down to a point of principle here. As I think the gentleman from Louisiana knows, we did strike the compromise in our committee. It was overwhelmingly ratified here in the House, with the principle being there was no attempt to defend the House position when we went to conference.

Having come fifteen-seventeenths from zero, to fifteen-seventeenths of what the Senate is asking, I think that is more than what can reasonably be expected in a compromise.

Mr. HUCKABY. If the gentleman would yield, I would like to point out that the Senate position did not prevail in conference either. And that the two Senators from Missouri were on the oppostie side of the view from the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. EMERSON. That is correct, but they got—out of the conference—sixteen-seventeenths of what they wanted, and I got one-seventeenth. I would suggest that a reasonable compromise across the board would to have been to split the 17,500 acres down the middle and leave me with 8,750 acres for exploration and development and them with 8,750, for wilderness, if we want to talk about really striking it down the middle, in the true spirit of compromise.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, this has been blown up all out of proportion. I, of course, did not say the gentleman's concerns were trivial, I said the differences between the conference report and the bill, as passed by the House, are trivial.

I have here a map, the map is a USGS map. There are lines drawn on it showing the trend lines of potential mineralization. Those are the areas that were of interest to the St. Joe Lead Co. and probably other lead companies. Of course, they are not special interests, they are economic interests. They are the people that have the potential of providing jobs, if they find a lead deposit.

That is the area that they were most interested in, plus a small area that they had already requested a permit for over on the east side of this proposed wilderness. Those are the areas that the conference report drops out of the wilderness. Those are the areas of potential interest to the people of Oregon County. The rest of it is simply land like the rest of this. It has no special designation by the USGS.

So what interests were accommodated were the very interests of the gentleman's own county of Oregon County that he was most concerned about.

So the fact is that he got everything that was of significance that was excluded from wilderness by the House bill.

I say the differences between the House bill, the 1,000 acres, are trivial. I stick with that. I did not say the gentleman's concerns were trivial, as some Members tended to imply. I merely indicated that the gentleman's concerns were met. The Senators, who also happen to represent Oregon County, they did not want to make any concessions, but they agreed to compromise, too, as the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. HUCKABY) has pointed out. The gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. HUCKABY) was the author of the original House amendment.

I do not know how else we can ever resolve differences between the House and Senate if we are going to give a particular Congressman a veto.

Therefore, I merely suggest that the House, your conferees, made a reasonable effort to accommodate the concerns of the people in the gentleman's district, and at the same time, the concerns of the two Senators who also represent that district and to do it in a way that met the economic interests involved and, at the same time, took care of the interests of conservation, which is also of interest to the people of Missouri, including those of Oregon County.

I might say as long as we are talking about special interests that I have a letter here from the Ancient Order of Hibernians in America, dated May 1, 1984, in which they strongly support the conference report. I suppose we could get other special interests of that sort into this act.

I suggest again, gentlemen, that this is a tempest in a teapot and it is time we voted and put this issue to bed so that the people of Oregon County know where they stand, so that the lead industry can go ahead and, incidentally, they are blocked now from any activity in this area until we settle it.

So I suggest that it is in everyone's interest to settle this and pass the conference report.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to vote "No" on this. The Irish Wilderness has never been a wilderness to begin with. It has been mined, it has been roaded, it has been logged. It just happens to have a mineral deposit.

It is also in one Member's district. The people of that area are definitely opposed to this legislation.

I urge a "No" vote.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, I rise to lend my support of S. 64 to designate some 17,500 acres of land within the Mark Twain National Forest in Missouri as the Irish Wilderness Area. It is my understanding that this bill constitutes an effective compromise between the house and Senate bills and therefore should be enacted.

I take a special interest in this legislation because of my being chairman of the bipartisan Ad Hoc Congressional Committee for Irish Affairs. In that capacity I work closely with the Ancient order of Hibernians, the Nation's oldest and largest Irish American organization. The AOH and especially their national president, Joseph Roche support this legislation and have called for our approval of it. I want to convey this message to my colleagues in the House at this time.

The 17,500 acres to be called the "Irish Wilderness" will be both magnificent and beautiful. It will be a place of great honor for the Irish American community and I hope we will take the step today to make it a reality.●

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 30 seconds and say unlike the gentleman from Alaska I happen to have been down there a year ago and visited this area, walked around it. It is not true that there are mines in it. There are no mines. There are no farms. There are no roads. It is entirely a natural area.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEIBERLING. I yield to the gentleman from Alaska.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

We know. We had the information. There are roads, there have been mines, there have been farms, there have been trees cut. So do not tell us that that has not happened. I may not have been there, but this gentleman represents that district. I have seen the films. Do not tell us that is not there.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEIBERLING. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. EMERSON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The records of the Geological Survey indicate that there was an iron mine in the midst of the Irish——

Mr. SEIBERLING. Once upon a time.

Mr. EMERSON. That there are roadbeds, there are railroad beds. There are nine manmade ponds. This is my point about saying by no standard of definition does this area meet the wilderness criteria of the 1964 act.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Once upon a time there were mines, once upon a time there were roads, once upon a time there were farms, but nature has a way of taking care of those things. I would only say to the gentleman from Alaska, "Vas you der, Charlie?"

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the conference report.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 254, nays 142, not voting 37, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. Mitchell for, with Mr. Bliley against.

Mr. Hayes for, with Mr. Paul against.

Mr. RIDGE changed his vote from "yea" to "nay."

Mr. SLATTERY changed his vote from "nay" to "yea."

So the conference report was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the conference report just agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

CONVEYING CERTAIN LANDS TO SHOW LOW, AZ

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate bill (S. 597) entitled "An act to convey certain lands to Show Low, Arizona," with a Senate amendment to the House amendments thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment to the House amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 597

Resolved, That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the text of the bill (S. 597) entitled "An Act to convey certain lands to Show Low, Arizona", with the following Senate amendment to House amendments:

Page 2, of the House engrossed amendments, strike out lines 7 to 10, inclusive.

Resolved, That the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House to the title of the above-entitled bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I shall not object; I just want some explanation of what we are doing here.

I yield to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING) for purposes of his response.

Mr. SEIBERLING. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, this is a bill that originated in the Senate. Its purpose is to transfer to the city of Show Low, Ariz., in the district represented by the gentleman from Arizona, Mr. RUDD, some land now used by the city but which is owned by the Federal Government and managed by the U.S. Forest Service.

Between the time of its initial passage in the other body and consideration in our committee, the city and Forest Service had worked a number of problems so that the bill could be changed to encompass a smaller tract. Accordingly, the committee amended the bill that was returned to the Senate. The Senate has now further redefined it by narrowing its scope still further. We believe the Senate's latest changes are acceptable and so the House should now concur and thus clear the bill for the President, and I believe the changes are not only acceptable to the gentleman from Arizona, Mr. RUDD, but to the gentleman from Alaska (Mr. YOUNG) as well.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I rise in support of S. 597, a bill to convey a small 52-acre park site to the city of Show Low, AZ. The bill is totally noncontroversial.

Originally, the bill provided for a no-cost transfer of two parcels of land, an airport and park site. But as a result of negotiations between the city and the Forest Service, recommended by our committee the city agreed to exchange a parcel of land and pay approximately $80,000 in cash for the airport property. Therefore, only the remaining park site will still be transferred without compensation to the city for continued use as a city park.

As the chairman has explained this case is similar to ones in which we have transferred national park land for local park purposes at a discounted or zero cost. The only difference in this case is that the land is under the jurisdiction of the U.S. Forest Service.

I commend the chairman for his bipartisan approach to this bill and urge my colleagues to support it.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the House recedes from its amendment to the title of S. 597.

There was no objection.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on amendments to the Senate bill just considered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

NATIONAL BUREAU OF STANDARDS AUTHORIZATION ACT FOR FISCAL YEARS 1984 AND 1985

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to House Resolution 481 and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, H.R. 5172.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 5172) to authorize appropriations to the Secretary of Commerce for the programs of the National Bureau of Standards for fiscal years 1984 and 1985 and for related purposes with Mr. KILDEE (Chairman pro tempore) in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

□ 1810

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. When the Committee of the Whole rose on Thursday, April 26, 1984, title II was open for amendment at any point.

Are there any further amendments to title II?

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. GREGG

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GREGG: On page 6, line 6, strike "$4,121,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,871,000".

Mr. GREGG (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Hampshire?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is technical in nature and I do not believe there are any objections to it.

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREGG. I yield to the Chairman of the Connittee, the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. FUQUA. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, it is my understanding this is a clarifying amendment on page 6 of the bill that conforms the amendment that the gentleman had offered when this bill was last considered, and it corrects a technicality in that amendment.

Mr. GREGG. That is correct.

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, we accept the amendment and urge an "aye" vote.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. GREGG).

The amendment was agree to.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Are there further amendments to title II? If not, the Clerk will designate title III.

The text of title III is as follows:

TITLE III

COST RECOVERY AUTHORITY

SEC. 301. (a) Section 12(f) of the Act of March 3, 1901, as amended (15 U.S.C. 278b(f)), is amended by striking out "first", and by inserting immediately before the period at the end thereof the following: ", and to ensure the availability of working capital necessary to replace equipment and inventories".

(b) Fees for calibration services, standard reference materials, and other comparable services provided by the National Bureau of Standards shall be at least sufficient to meet the requirements set out in paragraph (a) of this section, and any funds recovered in excess of these requirements" shall be returned to the Treasury of the United States.

SALARY ADJUSTMENTS

SEC. 302. In addition to the sums otherwise authorized to be appropriated by this Act, such additional sums as may be necessary to make any adjustment in salary, pay, retirement, and other employee benefits which may be provided for by law are authorized to be appropriated for fiscal years 1984 and 1985 and, if the full amount necessary to make such adjustments is not appropriated, the remainder of the amount necessary to make such adjustments shall be taken proportionately from the amounts appropriated pursuant to sections 103 and 203 and pursuant to the line items in sections 101(a) and 201(a) in a manner reflecting the extent to which the amount appropriated pursuant to such sections 103 and 203 and each such line item in sections 101(a) and 201(a) is attributable to employee benefits of the type involved.

AVAILABILITY OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 303. Appropriations made under the authority provided in this Act shall remain available for obligation, for expenditure, or for obligation and expenditure for periods specified in the Acts making such appropriations.

TRANSFER OF FUNDS

SEC. 304. Funds may be transferred among the line items listed in sections 101(a) and 201(a) but neither the total funds transferred from any such line item nor the total funds transferred to any such line item may exceed 10 per centum of the amount authorized for that line item in sections 101(a) and 201(a) unless (1) thirty calendar days have passed after the Secretary of Commerce or his designee has transmitted to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to the President of the Senate, to the Chairman of the Committee on Science and Technology of the House of Representatives, and to the Chairman of the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation of the Senate a written report containing a full and complete explanation of the transfer involved and the reason for it, or (2) before the expiration of such thirty calendar days the Chairmen of both the Committee on Science and Technology of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation of the Senate have written to the Secretary to the effect that they have no objection to the proposed transfer.

ACTIVITIES PERFORMED FOR OTHER GOVERNMENT AGENCIES

SEC. 305. The Secretary of Commerce shall charge for any service performed by the Bureau at the request of another Government agency in compliance with any statute (enacted before, on, or after the date of the enactment of this Act) which names the Secretary or the Bureau as a consultant to another Government agency, or which calls upon the Secretary or the Bureau to support or perform any activity for or on behalf of another Government agency or to cooperate with any Government agency in the performance by that agency of any activity, regardless of whether the statute specifically requires reimbursement to the Secretary or the Bureau by such other Government agency for such service, unless funds are specifically appropriated to the Secretary or to the Bureau to perform such service. The Secretary may, however, waive any charge where the service rendered by the Bureau is such that the Bureau will incur only nominal cost in performing it. Costs shall be determined in accordance with section 12(e) of the Act of March 3, 1901, as amended (15 U.S.C. 278b(e)).

DIRECTOR OF THE BUREAU

SEC. 306. Section 5 of the Act of March 3, 1901, as amended (15 U.S.C 274), is amended by deleting the period at the end of the first sentence and by inserting the following, ", and shall serve at the level IV on the Executive Schedule.".

INVESTIGATION OF STRUCTURAL FAILURES

SEC. 307. (a) The National Bureau of Standards, on its own initiative and in accordance with this section, shall initiate and conduct investigations to determine the causes of structural failures in structures which are used or occupied by the general public, and in other public structures, and shall collect and disseminate information on the causes of structural failures in such structures.

(b)(1) Within twenty-four hours after the occurrence or detection of any structural failure (in a structure described in subsection (a)) which the Director of the Bureau determines should be investigated in order to promote public safety in future construction, the Bureau (subject to paragraph (2)) shall initiate a full and complete investigation of the causes of such failure. During the course of the investigation the Bureau shall submit to the Secretary of Commerce such reports on the progress thereof as it may deem appropriate (including a preliminary report no later than thirty days after such occurrence or detection); and at the conclusion of the investigation the Bureau shall submit to the Secretary a final report setting forth its findings and recommendations in detail.

(2) This section shall not apply with respect to any structural failure which the National Transportation Safety Board, the Corps of Engineers, or the Occupational Safety and Health Administration has authority to investigate under applicable Federal law, unless such Board, Corps, or Administration requests the assistance of the Bureau.

(c) In any case where the Bureau's own staff does not include persons possessing the technical skills or expertise in a particular discipline which would be required to conduct an investigation under subsection (b) or any part of such an investigation, the Bureau shall take such steps as may be necessary to obtain and utilize for purposes of such investigation (on a consulting basis) the services of one or more persons possessing such skills or expertise.

(d)(1) The Secretary of Commerce shall develop and maintain a comprehensive file of information on structural failures (in structures described in subsection (a) and in other structures), including both information derived from investigations conducted under subsection (b) and information derived from other sources, and shall widely disseminate such information for the purpose of helping to prevent future structural failures. Reports submitted under subsection (b) and all other information derived from investigations under this section shall in any case be made reasonably available to the public.

(2) No part of any report submitted to the Secretary of Commerce by the Bureau under subsection (b), with respect to any structural failure or the investigation thereof, shall be admitted as evidence or used in any suit or action for damages growing out of any matter mentioned in such report.

COMMITTEE AMENDMENTS

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendments: Page 11, line 17: strike ", or" and insert a period; and page 11, lines 18 through 23: delete subsection 304(2).

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, these amendments clarify the report and weight provisions in the bill. The language is being removed by the amendment as written as a convenience to the executive branch. We have learned that they do not wish it retained in the bill; therefore, I urge acceptance of the amendments.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendments.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Are there other amendments to title III?

AMENDMENTS OFFERED BY MR. FUQUA

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, I offer amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments offered by Mr. FUQUA: On page 12, line 23, insert "(a)" after "306.".

On page 13, after line 2, insert the following new subsection:

(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall be effective for any fiscal year only to such extent or in such amounts as are provided in appropriation Acts.

Mr. FUQUA (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, these amendments are offered to comply with our agreement with the Committee on the Budget that the level must be provided in advance in appropriation acts.

I urge the adoption of the amendments.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendments and urge their adoption.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FUQUA).

The amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Are there further amendments to the bill? If not, under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. LONG of Louisiana) having assumed the chair, Mr. KILDEE, Chairman pro tempore of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 5172) to authorize appropriations to the Secretary of Commerce for the programs of the National Bureau of Standards for fiscal years 1984 and 1985 and for related purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 481, he reported the bill back to the House with sundry amendments adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 4275, FEDERAL RECLAMATION HYDROELECTRIC POWERPLANTS AUTHORIZATION ACT OF 1983

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 491 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. Res. 491

Resolved, That at any time after the adoption of this resolution the Speaker may, pursuant to clause 1(b) of rule XXIII, declare the House resolved into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 4275) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct, operate, and maintain hydroelectric power-plants at various existing water projects, and for other purposes, and the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, the bill shall be considered for amendment under the five-minute rule. It shall be in order to consider the amendment in the nature of a substitute recommended by the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs now printed in the bill as an original bill for the purpose of amendment under the five-minute rule, said substitute shall be considered for amendment by titles instead of by sections and each title shall be considered as having been read, and all points of order against said substitute for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 5(a), rule XXI are hereby waived. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and any Member may demand a separate vote in the House on any amendment adopted in the Committee of the Whole to the bill or to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute. The previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit with or without instructions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. KILDEE). The gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. LONG) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, as is the custom, I yield 30 minutes, for purposes of debate only, to the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. QUILLEN), and pending that, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

□ 1820

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 491 provides for the consideration of H.R. 4275, the Federal Reclamation Hydroelectric Powerplants Authorization Act of 1983. It is an open rule, providing 1 hour of debate to be equally divided between the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Committee on the Interior and Insular Affairs.

The resolution specifies that the Interior Committee amendment in the nature of a substitute now printed in the bill shall be considered as original text for the purpose of amendment. To facilitate the amendment process, the substitute shall be considered as read.

In addition, the resolution waives points of order against consideration of H.R. 4275 for failure to comply with clause 5, rule XXI, which prohibits appropriations in legislative bills. The waiver is necessary because the bill allows the Bureau of Reclamation to receive money advanced by non-Federal entities for the purpose of constructing facilities of the Central Arizona Project authorized by title III of the Colorado River Basin Project Act of 1968, and to spend these funds without further appropriations for such purpose.

Finally, upon conclusion of consideration of the bill for amendment, one motion to recommit with or without instructions would be in order.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 4275 authorizes the Secretary of the Department of the Interior to construct and operate hydroelectric generating plants at seven existing dams in California, Idaho, Montana, and Wyoming. The bill also would enact into law an agreement reached among the Federal Government and several States regarding the allocation of electric power produced at the Hoover Dam powerplant. In addition, the bill provides for the upgrading of Hoover Dam electric generation and visitor facilities.

Powerplant construction is expected to be completed by fiscal year 1992. Moneys appropriated under this bill will be repaid to the Federal Treasury with interest from revenues generated from the production of power. It is expected that the amount repaid will be $14 million annually beginning in the 1990's.

All of us can recall the dire consequences of the oil crisis during the decade of the 1970's. Our dependency on foreign energy sources posed a very real threat to our Nation's—and the world's—security. The specific projects covered by H.R. 4275 were among the recommendations included in the Department of Interior's 1977 report on ways in which this country could move toward energy independence. The projects are expected to produce an annual energy equivalent of 690,000 barrels of oil. Clearly hydropower is a key component of our national program to decrease our dependency on energy from abroad. In 1983, the most recent year from which statistics are readily available, hydropower accounted for nearly 15 percent of the Nation's electric generation capacity—and in that year it provided Western States with nearly half of their electricity needs.

Hydropower is an economical energy source. Indeed, this bill requires that the Secretary of the Interior must determine that any construction project authorized is economically feasible from a cost-recovery standpoint. The bill also requires that any projects undertaken must be environmentally sound. In this regard, it should be noted that these projects are at existing reclamation sites. No new dams are authorized.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to adopt this rule and move forward to consider H.R. 4275, the Federal Reclamation Hydroelectric Powerplant Authorization Act.

Mr. QUILLEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may use.

Mr. Speaker, it would be redundant for me to go into detail on the rule since it has been ably explained. I think it is fine that we are adding hydroelectric generating plants to seven existing dams. This saves gas and oil now used for the production of electricity. I think it is time that we used more of our water resources for hydroelectric production, and I urge the adoption of the rule.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. RUDD).

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to talk about the worthwhile nature of the bill rather than to get too involved in the rule.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to support H.R. 4275, the Federal Reclamation Hydroelectric Powerplants Authorization Act of 1983 that was reported from the Rules Committee last week.

Of particular importance in this bill is title II. This title does the following: First, authorizes an uprating program at Hoover Dam on the Colorado River to renovate the existing generators at the dam; second, allocates capacity and energy from the existing plant and the upratings to customers in Arizona, Nevada, and California; third, authorizes construction of a highway bridge across the Colorado River at a site downstream from the dam as well as improvements to the Hoover Dam visitor's center; fourth, authorizes the addition of a rate component to power sold from the dam to Arizona that will be used to help repay the cost of the Central Arizona Project, another Federal project; fifth, provides for the dismissal of the pending lawsuit regarding power allocation at the dam; and sixth, authorizes the sale of surplus power from the federally built Navajo powerplant in Page, AZ, to Arizona entities.

This bill allows the Federal Government to improve and renovate one of this Nation's greatest resources, the Hoover Dam. It also has provisions which allow for repayment by power users for another Federal project, the Central Arizona Project, which will bring money into the Treasury as a return on both the investment in power at Hoover Dam and water for central and southern Arizona. This bill is fair and well planned compromise for the use and marketing of power generated at Hoover Dam and I urge my colleagues to support this bill.

Mr. QUILLEN. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

REPORT ON TRIP TO CENTRAL AMERICA

(Mr. ALEXANDER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I returned yesterday, together with the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. REGULA) and the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. FOWLER) from a 6-day trip to Central America where we visited the countries of Honduras, Panama, and Colombia.

The three of us joined in a news conference this morning, during which we reported on the findings of our trip, centering on the U.S. buildup in Honduras and the possibility of a peace settlement under the leadership of the Contadora countries.

I include the text of my statement to the news conference, together with addenda, for the RECORD.

The statement and addenda follow:

STATEMENT OF HON. BILL ALEXANDER, MAY 2, 1984

Thank you ladies and gentlemen for joining us.

We have called this news conference to report to you the observations we have brought back from our recent six day visit to Honduras, Panama, and Colombia.

This situation in Central America is complicated, sensitive, fluid and potentially explosive.

The purpose of our trip was two-fold.

First, we were attempting to evaluate the ongoing American military presence in Honduras with particular emphasis on military construction which has taken place under the umbrella of recent military training exercises.

Second, we were trying to determine precisely what American foreign policy is in that region. We wanted to know how the United States is affecting the search for peace in Central America. We wanted to hear from the Contadora nations how the United States could assist them in bringing stability to the region through negotiations rather than violence.

The first three days of the trip were devoted exclusively to a detailed examination of military construction in Honduras. We examined nearly nine key sites where the United States has funded construction of military installations. Among those we reviewed were Comayagua, the Regional Military Training Center at Trujillo, Camp Sea Eagle, Puerta Castilla, Aguacate, Jamastran, Cerro La Mole, Tiger Island, and San Lorenzo. At each site we were accompanied by representatives of the General Accounting Office, who have been monitoring these sites at Congressional request.

After extensive meetings with foreign ministers, leaders of numerous political groups, American ambassadors, political and military officers, I feel that we came no closer to discovering the objectives of American policy than when we started. Confusion over American policy is rampant, and there appears to be little optimism for change in the near future.

However, there is no confusion on one point:

Our growing military presence in the region is completely overshadowing any diplomatic policy we may have toward our Latin neighbors. The diplomatic initiatives in the region come totally from the Latin nations themselves. The United States offers only a military solution and that solution, according to one foreign minister, is failing us in every respect.

Stated simply, the United States has amassed a military force in Central America that is poised for war, and we have allowed no equal force for peace.

General Gorman leads a strong and effective miltary presence. There is no equal diplomatic presence. There is no clear diplomatic strategy. There is no reflection of coordination with our democratic friends in Latin America. There is little understanding of the advice of our allies. Even the Contras seem to be offended by the degree of unilateralism in our policy.

In the capital of Tegucigalpa, we held extensive meetings with Ambassador Negroponte, and various representatives of Honduras' political parties in an effort to assess the ramifications of U.S. policy.

The delegation then traveled to Panama, where we were briefed by General Paul Gorman of the Southern Command and General Frederick Woerner, Commander of the 193rd Infantry. While visiting Panama, we also held private talks with the foreign ministers of Mexico, Costa Rica, and Colombia. Prior to our meeting with General Gorman, the delegation issued the statement which has been furnished for you.

To close out our trip we met for nearly two hours with President Betancur of Colombia, who has been a leader in promoting the Contadora process. We also met extensively with Ambassador Tambs, our ambassador to Bogota.

Some of our findings are summarized in the bipartisan statement issued Sunday in Panama. In a moment, I will call on Congressman Regula and Congressman Fowler to share with you their impressions of the trip.

For myself, however, there was one pervasive question that clouded our entire trip. And that question was this: What is American foreign policy in Central America?

American diplomatic leadership, backed but not replaced by military force, is urgently needed. Only clear and coherent diplomatic leadership can win the support and friendship of the vary nations in which we seek to combat the spread of communism. The actions of the Contadora nations, and the vote in El Salvador, are statements of a desire for peace. I believe the respective nations and factions are closer than ever before to accepting a verifiable, negotiated end to the bloodshed.

I believe there is an appropriate role for the American military to play in cooperation with our Latin neighbors. Indeed, we saw evidence of many positive and constructive joint training efforts between our countries. But military action can not substitute for diplomatic initiative—particularly in Central America where the Contadora process offers a meaningful opportunity to achieve some measure of peace in the region.

Our meetings convinced us of widespread support for the Contadora process. After all, it is a process by which the nations of the region are seeking to write the rules by which they themselves might live in peace.

I was deeply disappointed to discover that the United States is not perceived as encouraging of this process. Indeed we saw clear indications that the United States is disparaging of the entire process, looking instead to its military power as the key to the future of Latin America.

I do not understand this unhealthy reliance on brute force. It is inconsistent with the traditions of our people to resort to a foreign policy of sabotage and covert operations when there is an opportunity to lend our Nation's greatness to peaceful negotiations.

I was deeply moved by the passionate conviction of President Betancur on this point. Raising his fist in the air, he likened American foreign policy to a mighty hammer crashing down upon a resounding anvil—accompanied only by a faint prayer to God Almighty.

Permit me now to turn to the issue of the military installations in Honduras. The nature of the construction at these sites has become a kind of litmus test in determining the intention of the United States with regard to future military involvement in the region.

The question has been distilled down to whether these sites are temporary or permanent.

I am not certain that this is the proper context in which this issue should be placed. As many of you know, I have asked the Comptroller General to examine the status of the bases from a legal standpoint and issue an opinion on the propriety of the construction under existing law. A team of GAO investigators accompanied us on this trip specifically for the purpose of examining these sites for that report. Today I have written the Comptroller General and asked that his opinion be expedited in light of the serious and immediate concerns that have been raised over construction in the region. Many of you also know that I have commented publicly on this question already.

Rather than embarking on a finely turned examination of what constitutes permanent construction, let me suggest that the more appropriate question is that of our country's intentions for future utilization of these sites.

Yes, the Administration can argue that it intends the bases to be used only for limited support for training exercises.

However, having examined these sites in detail, I must also report that—in my opinion—these bases appear to have been constructed in such a way as to make them suitable for long-range usage with relatively minor additional work. In many cases, simple maintenance is only necessary to preserve these facilities for longer-range uses. Construction has been extensive—far more extensive to my layman's eye—than should be required for simple military training.

I am not convinced that the millions of dollars we have poured into these construction sites are purely in support of military exercises. The preponderance of evidence leads me to the tortuous, difficult conclusion that there is more here than meets the eye. While the Administration's interpretation may be reasonable in an isolated context, the fact is that the larger picture suggests there is more at stake.

For example, it troubles me that the Administration has not produced the comprehensive regional plan for military construction that was required by the 1984 Defense Appropriations bill before any further construction was to take place.

It troubles me that the exercises in Honduras appear to have no end.

It troubles me that the scope and size of the exercises appear to exceed those of any other similar exercises the United States has ever conducted.

It troubles me that U.S. military personnel are assuming increasingly significant and dangerous roles in the operations of the Salvadoran and Honduran forces.

Finally, let me add that the conduct of the military personnel we saw in these countries was second to none. I know my two colleagues join me in saying that we have nothing but praise for them. My own concern is that we are now dangerously close to thrusting the burden of foreign policy on the shoulders of professional soldiers. We did that in Lebanon less than one year ago. We must not do it again.

The three of us have appealed to Secretary Shultz for a meeting—a meeting at which we could share these concerns and urge him and the President to come forward with an honest and open foreign policy. Debate in a democracy is not to be feared, but embraced. Bipartisan support for foreign policy is possible, if the policy-makers are willing to let the American people know what they are trying to do.

MEMORANDUM ON FACILITIES VIEWED AT MILITARY FACILITIES SITES IN HONDURAS, MAY 2, 1984

This memorandum does not itemize all facilities observed at all sites.

This memorandum should not be taken as labeling any site visited as the property of the U.S. Government since the information provided to the Congressional Delegation is that the U.S. activities at these sites are related to training exercises and, in the instance of Palmerola Air Force Base at Comayaqua, a Honduran air base, the facilities are also associated with what the Delegation was advised is a contingency use agreement.

There are some points which must be taken into account in evaluating the U.S. military construction observed by the Delegation:

When Department of Defense designs facilities as "permanent" facilities, it designs for a forty-year use life;

There are in existence in both the United States and Panama wooden facilities which have been in use for forty or more years;

The only facilities observed which have been constructed or are being completed under specific Congressional authorization and funding in laws naming the site and facilities are located at Palmerola Air Force Base, Comayaqua, Honduras;

There remains the underlying, vitally important question of why Congress was not adequately informed about the extent of U.S. involvement in Central America; and,

In each location where wood facilities were built these facilities are one step nearer long-term use facilities than are the tents originally installed at the sites.

COMAYAQUA

This is the site of the Honduran Palmerola Air Force Base. It is also one of the two sites at which the Congress has authorized specific military construction by the U.S. government using specifically appropriated military construction funds. The second site for which the Congress has authorized U.S. military construction using appropriated military construction funds is La Ceiba, a second Honduran air base. The Congress has prohibited DOD from using the $8 million appropriated for La Ceiba prior to the Administration providing to the Congressional Committees on Appropriations with the complete U.S. construction plan for the Central American region.

The authorized construction, with U.S. military construction funds, at Palmerola is for airfield improvements, fuel storage and lighting. When completed this would be the first airfield in Honduras with lighting for night landings of aircraft.

Additional construction has taken place at this site, funded with DOD operations and maintenance money. This includes approximately 175 wooden, Central American Tropical (CAT) huts. These are used for barracks, and base support camp facilities. Under construction at the time of the Delegation's visit were a small recreation building and a barber shop. These buildings are not the type normally designated for "permanent" installations in the United States, but, with maintenance, could have a use-life ranging from two to twenty-five years. These buildings replace wooden tent platforms. In the Honduran climate tents are considered to have a use-life of six months and are considerably less comfortable for military forces than are tents.

TRUJILLO

There were three separate facilities visited in this area. At Trujillo itself is located a hard-surfaced landing strip. The work financed by the U.S. at this site was carried out by both U.S. military forces and by a private sector contractor. It included the extension of the landing strip and the construction of a hard surfaced parking apron for aircraft.

The second site in this area is Camp Sea Eagle. At this site Navy Seabees, using operations and maintenance funding, built SEA huts used for a base camp and troop housing. During the two Honduran rainy seasons this site floods. The Delegation saw this site during the dry season. The camp is not in use although the SEA huts remain in place. During his March 7 appearance before the House Subcommittee on Military Construction, General Paul Gorman, commander-in-chief of the U.S. Southern Command headquartered in Panama, testified that it was then expected that these wooden buildings would be sold to the Honduran government. The information provided to the Delegation is that this anticipated sale may not actually take place.

The third facility in this area visited by the Delegation was the Regional Military Training Center (RMTC). It is at this site that a U.S. Military Training Team, financed by a U.S. Security Assistance grant is training both Honduran and El Salvadoran troops. Using operations and maintenance funding, the U.S. Corps of Engineers constructed 27 wooden CAT huts at this site which continue to belong to the U.S. government. The Honduran government constructed additional CAT huts at this site. Like those at Comayaqua, the CAT huts at this site are being maintained and used.

AQUACATE

Prior to the beginning of Big Pine II there was already in place at this site a dirt landing strip capable of being used by C-130 aircraft. During Big Pine II, the U.S. Corps of Engineers, using operations and maintenance funding, added a 4,000 foot extention to the existing airfield. This work included the installation of culverts of alleviate a flooding problem occurring during Honduran rainy seasons. This visit to this site was by C-130 aircraft. The landing strip appears to be receiving appropriate maintenance. In addition, at this site the U.S. Engineers built three CAT huts.

It has been estimated that most U.S. aircraft could land on an 8,000 foot airfield, which is the length of the Aquacate landing strip, although not all U.S. military aircraft can use a dirt landing strip.

NOTE.—Dirt landstrips such as this one are termed "hasty" air strips. The U.S. Corps of Engineers build them to take 20 to 40 C-130 landings during the rainy season.

JAMASTRAN

The Corps of Engineers are currently working at this site building a "hasty" C-130 capable landing strip. There is a base camp in place here, built by the Corps which includes perimeter earthworks as a security measure. Troops are housed in tents. There are five CAT huts at this site which were moved here from San Lorenzo, where they were originally built during Big Pine II. The work being done at Jamastran is part of Grenadaro I, a training exercise involving U.S. and Honduran military forces.

Grenadaro I began in late March and is scheduled for completion in late June.

Jamastran landing strip is one of two being built or improved to C-130 capability during Grenadaro I. The other is at Cucuyaqua near the Hondoran/El Salvador border. Due to unfavorable weather the Delegation was unable to visit Cucuyaqua.

SAN LORENZO

Due to poor flying conditions, the Delegation was able only to overfly this location. During Big Pine II, which ended in February, the U.S. Corps of Engineers built a "hasty" airfield and a base camp of CAT huts at this location. Except for the CAT huts moved to Jamastran the base camp remains in place. The Delegation was told this landing strip was not being maintained and is now closed to C-130 traffic.

It is estimated that a "hasty airfield" which has not been maintained could be reconditioned for C-130 use in a time period ranging from two days to three weeks.

TIGER ISLAND

This is currently the site for a low-altitude radar system operated by the U.S. Marines, an airstrip improved by the U.S. military during Big Pine II and a pier jutting into the Bay of Fonseca which was improved by the U.S. military during Big Pine II.

According to the information provided the Delegation the radar at this site is scheduled for removal with its mission to be assumed by ships operating off-shore.

CERRO LA MOLE

The U.S. has a medium to high altitude radar site at this Honduran installation. This radar, along with the one at Tiger Island, are currently the only radar in existence in Honduras. The Honduran government does not currently own radar. At this site, as at all other sites, the Government of Honduras provides the security forces.

The Delegation was not advised of any schedule for removing the radar at this site.

The tents which originally housed U.S. forces at this site have been replaced with metal buildings.

THE SEX DISCRIMINATION IN THE UNITED STATES CODE REFORM ACT

(Mr. FISH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks).

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, today I join Representative BILL GREEN in introducing legislation, at the request of the administration, that will eliminate gender-based distinctions from the Federal Code. This bill removes from the laws of the United States archaic statutory provisions which contain a substantive sex bias. These provisions can be divided into five categories: family benefits, barriers to educational training and employment opportunities, family relationships, the definition of criminal sexual activity and provisions that were enacted to protect women. I will briefly discuss each of the categories of provisions.

Those provisions that pertain to family benefits effect various rights or privileges that exist for the "wives, widows" or dependent children of male workers, but make no provision for the families of similarly situated female workers. Generally, these distinctions were based on the assumption that benefits would not be needed by women's families because it was presumed that a wage-earning husband was present.

Many of the provisions that are addressed by this bill pertain to discrimination against women with regard to certain educational, training, and employment opportunities. Our proposal addresses the problem created by statutes that consider men to be the dominant or more important member of a family. For example, many statutes give preference to fathers over mothers.

This bill eliminates sex-based distinctions that exist in the definition of criminal sexual activity. For example, rape and statutory rape have been defined as offenses which can only be committed by a man against a woman.

The final category of provisions that this bill would amend includes laws which were enacted to protect women from discriminatory treatment. For instance, the statute that makes the citizenship status of a woman dependent on that of her husband.

This proposal would remove over 147 statutory provisions from our laws. These provisions were identified by President Reagan's Task Force on Legal Equity for Women.

The President's Task Force on Legal Equity for Women was established "to provide for the systematic elimination of regulatory and procedural barriers which have unfairly precluded women from receiving equal treatment from Federal activities." The task force was established by Executive Order 12336. The Attorney General was responsible for reviewing Federal laws, policies, regulations and practices and reporting to the President on any language or provision that "unjustifiably differentiates, or which effectively discriminates, on the basis of sex."

On June 28, 1982, the Attorney General transmitted his first report to the President's Cabinet Council on Legal Policy. This report listed more than 100 statutes which made substantive distinctions based on gender. The statutes were identified by a computer search that was conducted by the Justice Department.

In July 1983, another report was transmitted from the Attorney General to the President. This report identified over 47 additional sex-based laws which were not included in the Attorney General's report of June 28, 1982. The President's Cabinet Council on Legal Policy reviewed the additional provisions that were identified in the July 1983 report, and the Cabinet Council agreed that the sex-based distinctions in these statutes should also be eliminated.

Over the past several years progress has been made in revising statutes that provide for inequitable treatment. Some distinctions have been eliminated by agency action or by court decisions. Congress has enacted rules of construction designed to provide for equal treatment of the sexes. Despite these past efforts, there are still numerous provisions that provide for substantive differences in the treatment of our citizens. I am committed to working for the swift enactment of the President's proposal. These obsolete provisions have no place in our society. We must eliminate sex-based distinctions from our laws.

PRESIDENT REAGAN RIGHT ON LIBYA

(Mr. WINN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. WINN. Mr. Speaker, "Early on, the Reagan administration branded Colonel Qadhafi a pariah and started using its influence to thin out American ties with his regime. Other nations, some of them mocking Mr. Reagan for his 'overreaction,' took up some of the slack. He was right and they were wrong."

This quote from the Washington Post editorial of April 24 which follows justly praises President Reagan's approach to Libya. While most would agree with President Reagan that Colonel Qadhafi is a madman, they often use this as a pretext to dismiss him as harmless. Libya and its terrorist campaign are considered nuisance factors but no more.

This is incorrect. Qadhafi with his large arsenal of advanced Soviet military equipment is an important factor in the strategic balance in the Mediterranean and North Africa. In Chad and in the Sudan, he has demonstrated that he is willing to use his military capability to subvert governments friendly to the West. Through terrorism he seeks to intimidate Middle Eastern leaders away from peace; to suppress dissent and human freedom at home and abroad. He respects no international standards or codes. He kills and maims at will.

With the apalling murder of a British policewoman and the wounding of 11 others in London, it should now be apparent to all Western nations that Colonel Qadhafi is a menace which all should join forces to curb.

[From the Washington Post, Apr. 24, 1984]

THE LIBYAN TERROR

Many countries, including Britain; that have no use for the terroristic nature of Col. Qaddafi, have nonetheless decided over the years to maintain regular ties with Libya. They have done so for business reasons and also on the theory that contact promotes understanding. You can make a strong argument for such a position, but in this case it didn't work. These countries have been forced by their decision to gamble on Col. Qaddafi's whim. The most recent result is the humiliation Britain has just incurred.

Last Monday, as Bob Woodward reported in The Post yesterday, the Libyans hauled out two students who had been tried earlier by what is described as a student court and publicly hanged them. The next day some outraged exiles demonstrated outside their country's London "people's bureau," as Col. Qaddafi calls his embassy. One of his minions fired a machine gun out the window, killing a police officer and wounding 11 other persons—this in a country where guns are rigidly controlled and where the killing of a police officer is a rare and grave offense.

The British demanded that the Libyans permit them to search for the killer. The Libyans stonewalled, demanding diplomatic immunity even for embassy occupants it insists are not diplomats. And finally the British, who have 8,000 nationals working in Libya and conduct an annual trade of nearly half a billion dollars there, abandoned the quest for the killer, covering their retreat by breaking off diplomatic relations. They really had no choice.

The fact is that the international rules are not easily invoked against rogue nations unless there is an overwhelming consensus, which there is not in this case. An adequate defense cannot be mounted against an outlaw such as Libya unless the defender is willing to pay a cost in jobs, oil, and business foregone. Britain's economic troubles and general diplomatic strategy have inclined it to give an array of hostages—human and economic—to Col. Qaddafi, who has treated the British with contempt. Even Egypt, with more reason than most to retaliate against this wild man, has found its hands tied.

Early on, the Reagan administration branded Col. Qaddafi a pariah and started using its influence to thin out American ties with his regime. Other nations, some of them mocking Mr. Reagan for his "overreaction," took up some of the slack. He was right and they were wrong.

RETIREMENT OF WILLIAM R. GIANELLI

(Mr. SNYDER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, William R. Gianelli returns to California this week after completing 3 years of outstanding service as Assistant Secretary of the Army for Civil Works.

Since he arrived in Washington during the first days of the Reagan administration to assume oversight of the Army civil works program, Bill Gianelli has demonstrated his strong commitment to an effective Federal water resources development program.

During that time, he has worked hard to find new ways of financing Federal projects that will allow Federal water project construction to proceed in this time of necessary Federal budgetary austerity and changing national priorities.

Both Houses of Congress have made substantial progress on omnibus water resources development authorization legislation, and while the final form of that legislation has yet to be shaped, all who are familiar with the versions awaiting floor consideration in both bodies know of the important input provided by Assistant Secretary Gianelli.

There is, in fact, a renewed commitment within the Congress and the administration, acting as partners, to work out our differences in this area so that we can revitalize the Federal water resources program.

Bill Gianelli has made giant strides in reforming the Corps of Engineers' regulatory program. Largely through his efforts, the average processing time has been cut almost in half for the over 15,000 citizens who must obtain Corps of Engineers' permit decisions annually. Few things do more to restore a citizen's confidence in his government, and Bill Gianelli has gone a long way toward achieving that objective.

In his role as leader of the Arlington National Cemetery, he has done a great deal to make this national monument the institution we all know our veterans and our Nation deserve. He has broken a 10-year deadlock over funding of a permanent Visitors' Center at Arlington to service the 3½ million visitors annually. This much-needed facility will be built in 1986.

He has also been instrumental in the successful effort to inter an Unknown Soldier from the Vietnam era, a recently announced and long-awaited salute to those who paid the ultimate price in that conflict. This Memorial Day, the Vietnam Unknown will join the Unknown National Heroes of previous wars.

As Bill Gianelli leaves Government service, he will long be remembered for his readiness to make decisions and his vision of the potential contributions of water development to the Nation's economic health. He came well-equipped for the task before him, with over 40 years experience in the water resources field. He possessed a unique grasp of the political realities in a time of budget austerity, deep insights into the President's philosophy and political beliefs, and a westerner's sense of how precious water is and what the wise or unwise use of water can mean to a region and to the Nation.

Bill Gianelli showed that even in the huge Government bureaucracy we have today, one man can still make a difference. He took his job of being the civilian head of the Army Corps of Engineers seriously and challenged the corps from top to bottom. Because of the high esteem in which he has always held the corps, he knew what could be done if the corps were thoroughly challenged.

I am sure my colleagues join me in expressing to Bill Gianelli our deep appreciation for the service, insights, and call to action he has given the Nation, and in wishing him and his wife, Shirley, every success and happiness as they return home to California.

A TRIBUTE TO THE LATE HON. WALTER FLOWERS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. COUGHLIN) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak of our former colleague Walter Flowers with a mixture of sadness and joy. Sadness because he is no longer physically with us. Joy because he enriched our days, and lives on in our lives and in the lives of his wife, Beverly, and his family. He was a leader, a gentlemen, and a friend.

Walter Flowers and I came to Congress together and served together on both the House Judiciary Committee and the Committee on Science and Technology. We worked together, played together, traveled together, threaded through life's problems together and indeed lived much of life together. He was a leader, a gentlemen, and a friend.

On Judiciary, Walter was known nationally for his agonizing but decisive role in the Watergate hearings, yet his contribution went far beyond that. He was a lawyer's lawyer with the great diligence to match his great intellect. On the Science Committee, Walter was one of the first to recognize the impending energy crisis—even before the Arab oil embargo. He sought knowledge and solutions.

He loved his work, he loved his committees, he loved this House. His State of Alabama and the Nation are the better for his life. He was a leader, a gentlemen, and a friend.

Walter Flowers was a patriot. We visited Vietnam together and his pride in our servicemen and women was unfailing. He knew this Nation and its people and rejoiced in being an American.

Walter was never one to hide his light under a bushel. Not to be deterred from serving our constituents during Vietnam demonstrations that threatened to close Washington bridges to traffic, we took a canoe down the Potomac, I paddled the bow, our former colleague Bob Mathias the stern, and Walter sat in the middle holding a sign with the slogan "Cannon Building or bust." The photograph appeared on front pages from Selma to Singapore.

He was an athlete. The House gymnasium will never be quite the same without his shouts and curses. Neither will SONNY MONTGOMERY.

He was always searching out new restaurants for some "good old heart burn sausage" just as he was always searching out new mountains to climb and challenges to overcome. He was a leader, a gentleman, and a friend.

Walter Flowers never turned away from a friend in need or from any individual who needed his help. He was dedicated to his fellow men and in helping resolve their problems. Whether you were a long-time friend or newly met, Walter greeted and treated a person with warmth and kindness.

Walter Flowers exemplified life, and with his wife, Beverly, lived every minute of every hour of every day to its fullest. He lived with verve and panache. He took his job seriously but never himself. He could disagree without being disagreeable. He could laugh at himself.

There are so many fond memories of Walter and Beverly. His office was the gathering place during late evening sessions. We drank and sang on the Chesapeake with his friends Otis Pike and Lou Frey.

Walter, we will all miss you but are all better for what you have given us. You taught us how to live with zest and serve with honor. You were a leader, a gentleman, and a friend.

● Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, the news of Walter Flower's sudden death was a complete shock to all of us.

For 10 years, Walter served in the House with distinction and dedication on behalf of a State and a people he truly loved.

Many will remember Walter as an important member of the Judiciary Committee during the Nixon impeachment proceedings—but those of us who knew Walter well will remember him most as an extremely bright and talented person with undisputed integrity and a deep sense of patriotism and purpose.

I was sorry Walter left the House in 1978 to run for the U.S. Senate—and I was always happy to see him on his occasional visits to the Capitol. Walter was a sensitive human being with a tremendous heart and good humor. I will miss him.

Millie and I extend our love and share the sorrow of the Flowers family.●

Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FUQUA).

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Speaker, I thank my friend for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, it is with a great depth of feeling today that I offer my remarks on Walter Flowers, a former Congressman and very dear friend, whose death is mourned by many. Walter was a man with a rare warmth and love for his fellow man, who reached out to others and who retained a quiet dignity which he comingled with his enormous zest for life, which he lived to the fullest.

I was particularly pleased that he has recently been remembered for his critical decisions which weighed so heavily upon him at the time during the proceedings in the House Judiciary Committee for the three articles of impeachment, two of which he supported.

In those days, Walter was a key Member entrusted with great power and the decision he and others were faced with was very difficult. As he said at the time, "I wake up nights on those nights I've been able to sleep lately, wondering if this could not be some sordid dream." He knew, and expressed it from time to time, that those days and that moment marked one of the pinnacles of his particular role as a man elected to represent the Seventh District of Alabama. History will remember that event as one where he displayed a great deal of courage and conviction, and indeed his judgment and ability still serve as models to us all.

In the work of the Science and Technology Committee, Walter Flowers also played a very key role. First elected to the House in 1968, Walter joined the Science Committee in his second term. At that time his interests were concentrated on NASA, which has an important function in the State of Alabama, and on science policy as well as scientific education.

Tuscaloosa, Walter's hometown where he practiced law, is a university town. Since his days as president of the student body at the University of Alabama, Walter had always had a particular interest in the educational process. During his years in the Congress he worked to broaden the role of Federal expenditures for science education and for science in general. The process is still going on today.

Walter's interest in the committee activities blossomed further in 1977 when he turned down the opportunity to serve another term as subcommittee chairman on the Judiciary Committee, in favor of taking the Science and Technology Committee's Subcommittee on Fossil and Nuclear Energy. It was at that time that the committee's jurisdiction for energy R&D had been expanded with the abolition of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, and Walter's leadership was absolutely vital in reviewing the initiatives undertaken by the Joint Committee and in putting the imprint of the Science Committee on those activities and on fossil and synthetic fuel activities.

Walter Flowers would also rate as the finest storyteller of the committee, a man who could go very quickly to the heart of any problem, yet whose air of casual unconcern masked a finely-honed legal mind. For all these reasons we remember him, and for these same reasons we mourn his death.

To his wife Beverly and his children, Nancy joins me in extending our heartfelt sorrow.

Walter we miss you.

Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague very much, indeed.

I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Alabama (Mr. EDWARDS), an associate of Congressman Walter Flowers.

Mr. EDWARDS of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding and I thank him for taking this special order and giving us all a chance to have a few words to say about our dear friend, Walter.

I suppose we will hear the word "shocked" several times today, because we were all shocked when Walter was dead at the age of 51. As a matter of fact, it was on his 51st birthday. That is too young. I guess it made all of us slow down just a little bit as we thought about such a fine specimen of a man dying on the tennis court.

I remember Walter. I had known him probably for 35 years. We were classmates at the University of Alabama. I first knew him in the student government down there when I was president and 3 years later he became president and in all those years we worked closely together.

I remember him as a young man, even in those days, who knew what he was about, a man of great intelligence and great ability; so I was particularly pleased later on when he did come here to the House of Representatives.

I guess we could all hope that having spent 10 years here, as he did, that we could leave the kind of mark that Walter Flowers did.

I remember sitting right over here many afternoons during the so-called impeachment hearings when he would sit there and really agonize. I do not say he was the only one on the committee who did, but he really put everything he had into that decision, because there was a lot of pressure on him in our State to pretty well whitewash the thing; so I was very proud of the way he handled it.

My sympathy certainly goes to Beverly and his family. I certainly shall miss him. He was an asset to this House. One of the few things he ever did wrong was to run for the other body and leave us here.

We do miss him and again I thank the gentleman for taking this special order.

Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I thank my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Alabama, for those words. He will be missed, as he is already missed, and still I think he is in one real sense still a part of this body.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. MONTGOMERY).

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania for yielding and for taking this time to pay recognition to our close friend, Walter Flowers, and the gentleman from Alabama who also has a special order, RICHARD SHELBY, who now represents the congressional district that Walter Flowers did represent at one time.

As the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. EDWARDS) said, I really still cannot believe that Walter Flowers is not with us. He was so full of life that we just expected to look around and there would be Walter Flowers.

I am proud to believe that I was one of Walter Flowers' good friends. Our districts joined each other on the Mississippi-Alabama line. We had the same type of people, climates, and also the land was similar, so we became very, very close in working in our congressional districts. In fact, Walter Flowers, to cover the western part of his congressional district on the Alabama line, had to come to my hometown to use our news media over there and I accused Walter on several occasions of maybe thinking about running over in Mississippi. He had done well over there. He had a lot of friends and had a lot of kin people in that part of the State.

As the gentleman from Pennsylvania mentioned, Walter liked sports and we certainly enjoyed being with him in the gym. He was a leader down there.

□ 1840

He was just part of everything that took place. He was an excellent athlete, and it is ironic that he lost his life in playing a sport, playing tennis, and he was playing with some of his family.

As I said earlier, he liked sports. He was a good athlete and he was always a winner. He believed really that he could win in most everything he participated in and he almost did that.

He was successful in politics, in business, and in life.

Certainly our prayers go out to Beverly, his wife, and to his three children, and to the other members of his family.

I appreciate the gentleman yielding.

Mr. COUGHLIN. I thank the gentleman. I think you knew Walter Flowers as well as anyone in this House as a person and as a friend, and I thank the gentleman for his remarks.

Mr. BROWN of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COUGHLIN. I now yield to the gentleman from California (Mr. BROWN).

Mr. BROWN of California. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

I shared the shock which I am sure was felt by all Members of this House when the gentleman from Pennsylvania entered the well and announced the death of Walter Flowers. I had known him since he entered the House, had served with him on the Science and Technology Committee, and had enjoyed those many hours down in the gym that we used to share together.

I will never claim, of course, to be in the same class with an athlete like Walter. But I think we approached the hours down there with the same spirit, both trying to do our best. And while his best was considerably better than mine, it was a great pleasure to join with him down there.

We perhaps exemplify in the regard which we held for each other something that occurs frequently here in the House, people of different backgrounds, different regions of the country, different political philosophies who learn to respect and even to love one another for the contributions that each makes to this House. I remember Walter particularly in the Science and Technology Committee for his assiduous and continuous effort to make sure that his State and his region shared in the distribution of those funds which were distributed by the National Science Foundation and other agencies for the improvement of science throughout this country.

Walter did not see any reason why Alabama should not have the same opportunities and nourish the same kind of excellence that was nourished at Harvard or Stanford or some of the other great institutions, and he made his point very well.

I could not always agree with him because if he had prevailed, California would have lost. But I admired and respected the efforts which he made because it showed a true understanding of the all prevalence of human ability throughout this great country of ours, and he was perhaps the best representative of that himself, being a great leader from the State of Alabama.

I will sorely miss him. There are few people in the years that I have been here that I respected more than Walter Flowers, for all of the reasons that have been cited here. It is just a great tragedy that we have lost him.

I know that I continued to meet with him and discuss many policy problems after he had left the Congress.

There was another thing that we shared. We had both left the Congress at one point to seek not higher but different office and we both failed to achieve that. And it gave us a sort of a bond, I think, in our discussions about the problems that face this country.

But I will miss him very much, and I know there are many others who feel the same way that I do. I do not know what more we can say.

Mr. COUGHLIN. I thank my distinguished friend and colleague from California who certainly worked very closely with Walter Flowers over a period of many years. We appreciate his remarks very much indeed.

Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COUGHLIN. I now yield to my colleague from New York (Mr. LENT).

Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, throughout my years of public service, I have met countless individuals known for many qualities. Yet, I have come to realize the most essential and valuable attribute an elected Representative can possess is a sense of duty and responsibility to the people of this great Nation. If I had to single out one man who epitomized such qualities, I would select our late colleague, Walter Flowers of Alabama.

Walter was elected to the House of Representatives for his first term in 1968. His sense of duty and responsibility was never more clearly demonstrated than during the dramatic House Judiciary Committee hearings in 1974 on the impeachment charges brought against President Richard Nixon. His conduct in these critical proceedings typified his career in the House of Representatives and won him the deep respect and admiration of his colleagues. I am grateful for the opportunity to have worked with him for so many years.

Despite all of his legislative duties, Walter worked tirelessly for the benefit of his Alabama constituents, through his 5 years in the U.S. Congress.

In remarks which summed up the essence of his philosophy of government, Walter Flowers once said, "The institutions of the country have been set up by the people to serve them, to carry out those functions that are necessary to a peaceful and free society. They are not created to serve the interests of one man or one group of men."

Walter and I were not what could be called close friends, but I had the privilege and pleasure of being in his company on several social occasions over the years we served together in Congress. He was possessed of a great sense of humor and a warm and friendly personality. He was a man we all admired and respected. We all will miss him. His lovely wife, Beverly, has my deepest sympathy.

Mr. COUGHLIN. I thank my colleague who has also worked long and hard with Walter over the years and appreciate his remarks.

Mr. BEVILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COUGHLIN. And I now yield to the distinguished chairman, the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. BEVILL).

Mr. BEVILL. Mr. Speaker, Walter Flowers was a man of uncommon dedication and intense determination. His service in the Congress was filled with enthusiasm, vigor, and sincerity. His constituents were proud of his efforts on their behalf and demonstrated their admiration for him by returning Walter to the House in each election for 10 years.

Walter received national recognition for the fairness, independence and sense of justice he exhibited during the impeachment hearings for President Nixon. He immersed himself in those hearings and studied the issues with a dogged determination to do what was constitutionally proper and what was best for the Nation. His vote was a decisive one and one which has been credited with having turned the course of history. Although he could have chosen the politically expedient route, his sense of duty to the Nation overrode any self-interest. That's the kind of person Walter Flowers was.

I came to admire Walter, not only for his love of this Nation, but also for his brilliant legal mind. He was a person of principles and of purpose who contributed so much to America.

I remember flying with him to Alabama, several years ago, when we were both returning home to our districts for a summer work period. On a stopover in Knoxville, we learned that Alabama's junior Senator, Jim Allen, had died. Walter had already decided to run for retiring Senator John Sparkman's seat.

On the flight to Alabama, we had a long discussion about Jim and his dedication to the people of our State. We talked about Jim Allen's tireless efforts, having given his all fighting against the Panama Canal Treaty. We both admired his legislative ability and his willingness to go to the wall for what he perceived to be the right cause.

Walter Flowers was similar to Jim Allen. Both men worked tirelessly in their jobs. And both men gave all they had to the people they served.

After leaving Congress, Walter excelled in private industry, as he had in public service. He was a highly respected voice in Washington even after leaving Congress. We continued to seek his advice and his opinion on issues vitally important to America. And he remained a friend to all of us who so deeply respected him.

I shall miss Walter and I join with all my colleagues from our state in expressing my deepest sympathy to Beverly and to Walter's children.

The tragedy of Walter's death struck doubly hard, coming when he had so much ahead of him. His future seemed so bright and he was at the crest of his success. It is much too early for it to have ended.

Walter Flowers served his Nation with distinction and was a friend to his fellow man.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COUGHLIN. I thank my colleague from Alabama and yield to another distinguished colleague from Alabama (Mr. NICHOLS).

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to say a few words in behalf of a former colleague of mine who was tragically removed from our midst by a heart attack on Thursday, April 13.

Walter Flowers' death is certainly a loss to his profession and to the many of us who knew him and respected him greatly.

Walter represented a rather conservative constituency in west Alabama, including the city of Tuscaloosa where he attended college at the University of Alabama. He loved that institution greatly and was a tireless worker in behalf of educational programs which benefited his alma mater. It was my privilege to serve with Walter for 10 years in the House of Representatives and I found him to be an astute student of the judicial process. My own background being totally devoid of legal matters, I always sought out Walter's advice in voting on all issues pertaining to judicial matters.

His finest hour without question came during the debate in the House of Representatives concerning the impeachment of the President of the United States and I knew that that particular vote he would have to make in Judiciary Committee troubled him mightily. Every Member of Congress was receiving a great deal of mail and many of us, including this Member, were reluctant to call for impeachment as we did not have all the facts. Each of us realized that impeachment of a President was a monumental decision.

Those of us from Alabama and many other Members of that Congress who respected Walter Flowers' good judgment withheld any final decision until Walter Flowers had declared his intention and, after his announcement, I had no hesitation.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Bob Ingram, a mutual friend of Walter Flowers and myself, who formerly was political reporter for the Montgomery Advertiser and currently is editorial director for WSFA-TV, Montgomery, AL, has said it better than any of us could in his April 13 editorial, "A Man of Courage," which I insert at this point in my remarks.

A MAN OF COURAGE

It seemed from the beginning of his political career that Walter Flowers was going to be dealt more than his share of bad hands. Flowers was elected to congress on May 7th, 1968. On a normal news day, this would have been a big story. It would have received a lot of play. But May 7th, 1968, was not a normal news day. Gov. Lurleen Wallace died that day, and it was this tragic event that got most of the air time on TV and most of the space in the newspapers. The election of Flowers was scarcely mentioned.

Six years later fate dealt Flowers yet another no-win hand. He was a member of the House Judiciary Committee which had before it a resolution calling for the impeachment of Richard Nixon. Flowers knew full well the sentiments of the people of his district . . . they were overwhelmingly in support of the President. Flowers was flooded with calls and letters demanding that he stand by the President. But as the case against Nixon was presented to the committee, it became increasingly clear to Flowers that this man should not remain as President.

Flowers had several options. He could do the politic thing and vote no . . . he could simply pass . . . or he could absent himself when the roll was called. Walter Flowers conscience would not permit him to exercise any of these options. And who can ever forget that dramatic moment . . . with the whole world watching . . . when a deeply moved, terribly anguished Flowers cast his vote for impeachment. It was a display of courage rarely seen in the political arena.

There is no way to know what effect this vote had in Flowers ill-fated race for the U.S. Senate in 1978. It's unlikely he would have defeated Howell Heflin under any circumstance, but the impeachment vote didn't help.

Walter Flowers died yesterday. He was 51. It's not likely that any building will ever be named in his honor . . . any monument raised in his memory. But if anyone should ever chisel into marble the names of Alabama's politically courageous, it might not require a very big slab of marble, but it should be big enough to include the name of Walter Flowers.

And that's the way we see it tonight.

My deepest sympathy to the family of Walter Flowers and I would want each of them to know that I have indeed lost a good friend and Alabama has lost one of its most able citizens.

□ 1850

Mr. COUGHLIN. I thank my distinguished colleague and friend from Alabama. I yield to another gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. FLIPPO. I thank the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania for having this special order.

All of us today come with heavy hearts to pay tribute to our late friend and colleague, Walter Flowers. Since his tragic and untimely death, numerous tributes have been paid to Walter and almost without fail, all of those tributes refer to his courage in the vote that he cast in that impeachment trial.

I submit to you that it was indeed a courageous vote but it was also not unusual for Walter Flowers to cast a courageous vote. When I first came to the Congress, Walter was on the Policy and Steering Committee, and he assisted me on serving on the Science and Technology Committee with him. He served on that committee.

And as the gentleman from California (Mr. BROWN) talked about earlier, Walter's work in behalf of trying to create centers of excellence throughout the Nation so that all could share in the benefit of that education and outstanding research and development, I learned with him on that committee the short time that I served with him there, and Mr. BROWN failed to mention but earlier this year that same committee at my request and with the help of Mr. BROWN succeeded in reestablishing those centers of excellence. So Walter's work was effective in that regard.

I think BILL NICHOLS mentioned a few minutes ago about the editorials that have been mentioned about Walter and his great service and great courage. The gentleman pointed out that the stone that records all courageous men's names will probably not be very big, but it should certainly be big enough to contain the name of Walter Flowers.

Walter did serve the State of Alabama with great distinction for 10 years. I have on many occasions been the recipient of his kindness and his wisdom. Alabama is a better place today because of his service and I prefer to remember Walter in his vitality and humor and wisdom. He was my good friend, and I, like other thousands, will dearly miss him.

Mr. COUGHLIN. I thank my colleague and friend from Alabama.

I yield to my colleague and friend from Georgia.

Mr. JENKINS. I thank the gentleman for taking this special order.

Mr. Speaker, the 12th day of last month was a day of poignant tragedy for those of us who knew Walter Flowers. On that date, he reached his 51st birthday; and on that date, he died. Unexpected and untimely, his loss has stirred in many of us feelings of the unfairness of it all—the unfulfilled potential, the unused energy, the unfinished works, the unmet goals, the undreamed dreams.

Though incomplete, Walter Flowers lived a good life. He prepared himself, he worked hard, he gave much, he influenced many.

Walter Flowers was a scholarly man. A member of Phi Beta Kappa, he held a A.B. degree as well as a law degree; he was a Rotary Foundation Fellow at the University of London, England, for additional graduate study.

He was a man who practiced his profession and served his community. His interests and active support ranged from the Boy Scouts of America to the Red Cross to the Tuscaloosa County Mental Health Association to the Federal court appellate system to the United Way to the National Democratic Party. He involved himself in numerous and varied causes. He saw many needs and he tried to do his part to meet them.

Walter Flowers was a man who served his country. He held a Reserve officer commission, and he served on active duty in the U.S. Army. He is now a part forever of his country in Arlington National Cemetery where he was buried with full military honors.

Walter Flowers was a man who participated in his Government in the dual role of servant and leader. I first met him in this capacity. My initial 2 years of service here in the House of Representatives coincided with the last two sessions of his decade of representation of the people of the Seventh District of Alabama. He sat on the House Judiciary Committee during one of our Nation's most dramatic, yet most tragic times. I was aware of his eloquent and equitable participation in the hearings which resulted from the Watergate disaster. I knew of his concern for the elderly, even as a young man, his vision in the area of aging—its needs and its problems. I knew of his work on the House Select Committee on Aging. I soon, too, became aware of his dedication to scientific research in our country and his view of our Nation's role in space.

And, I was fortunate enough to get to know Walt Flowers on a personal basis. He was a man worth knowing. During the 10 years he was a part of the Congress, Walter Flowers was a man involved, an innovative man, an active man. He did his best for his district, his State, his party and his Nation. He was a man who enjoyed a fine reputation and the respect of his colleagues. He also had their affection which continued on even after he left this body.

The life of Walter Flowers has ended though it was not completed. There is so much more that he could have done and that he would have done. But we are grateful for his time here, for his contributions, his influence and for the privilege of calling him friend. Our sympathy goes out to his wife and to his children who can take comfort in knowing that Walter Flowers was a man who was loved, admired, respected, and appreciated by many people.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. COUGHLIN. I thank the gentleman for his eloquent comments and appreciate his being here.

I yield to another distinguished gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. FOWLER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to have the privilege of joining with my colleagues to mourn the passing, while celebrating the life, of Walter Flowers, Jr.

Our Nation produced a fine public servant, and no better friend, than Walter Flowers. His public career is, of course, a matter of record, and it is an exemplary record. The decade of his service in this body was a challenging time in the life of this country, and Walter Flowers was more than equal to the challenge.

He brought his exceptional skills as a lawyer to the important work of the House Judiciary Committee, and his good judgment and practical bent of mind were invaluable to that committee on a host of difficult issues during his tenure.

No issue was more difficult, or more important to the constitutional integrity of this Nation, than the impeachment proceedings in the Judiciary Committee brought in the wake of Watergate. The personal struggle of Walter Flowers during those difficult days was widely chronicled, and his resolution of that struggle did as much to confirm the character of this institution as it did to demonstrate the personal integrity and courage of this dedicated public servant. For a moment the burden of our history rested on his shoulders, and we are a better and prouder Nation for the way he carried that burden.

These are matters of public record, but many of us will remember Walter Flowers most for his loyalty and friendship, and for his quiet good counsel. He was a man of conscience, and he had a gift for unselfish friendship. He has been missed as a colleague since his retirement from the Congress, and his untimely passing now leaves an incomparable void in the lives of his many, many friends.

His death is an occasion of grief, but his life is a cause for celebration. We are grateful to the people of Alabama for sending him to us, and to the gentleman from California for giving us this opportunity to salute a departed colleague who made us all better for knowing him.

Mr. COUGHLIN. I thank my colleague from Georgia and yield to my distinguished colleague from Texas.

Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, the untimely death of my good friend and our honored former colleague, Walter Flowers, creates a sad void in the body politic that cannot be filled. He was a gentleman of the first order, and he was widely recognized as an eminent scholar.

From his early days in Greenville, AL, and Tuscaloosa, AL, Walter Flowers developed a great love of knowledge. He excelled at the University of Alabama in both undergraduate and law school. He was named a Rotary Foundation Fellow at the prestigious University of London where his academic thrust was international law. In addition to his election as president of the student body at the University of Alabama, he was also a phi beta kappa.

During our service together, I gained a tremendous appreciation for his academic abilities as well as his commonsense approach to difficult and trying issues. We served together on the Judiciary Committee where his knowledge and love of the law came shining through. He could play an adversarial role without being an adversary in the cynical sense of the word that is so often associated with politics.

At one point in his career here in the House, Walter Flowers served as chairman of the subcommittee that I now chair—the Subcommittee on Administrative Law and Government Relations—which is, of course, a source of much pride to me.

In fact, as many of us are aware, Walter Flowers was a leader and early pioneer in the matter of regulatory reform. Long before regulatory reform gained attention as a national issue, Walter Flowers was taking the lead in advocating legislation to streamline Government and reduce the bureaucracy.

Of course, he will always be remembered for the historic role played during the Watergate impeachment hearings before the House Judiciary Committee. His conduct, demeanor, and adherence to good law and sound constitutional practices during those tumultous times was exemplary. The same can be said of his participation in hearings associated with the nomination of both Gerald Ford and Nelson Rockefeller to serve respectively as Vice President.

Walter Flowers was also an early leader in elevating the subject of high tech and warning that America's lead in scientific and technological achievement must be maintained. As a valued and respected member of the House Science and Technology Committee his contribution to America's defense and economic well-being through science and technology is well established.

After five terms of distinguished service, Walter Flowers entered the private sector in 1979 where he had an opportunity to continue his interest and leadership in science and technology. At the time of his death, he was a vice president of the Signal Cos.'

Walter Flowers is survived by his wife, Beverly, and three children, Vivian, Walter, and Victor. I shall miss his good counsel. The Nation and this Congress has lost a distinguished friend and patriot. To his family, Madeleine and I extend our deepest sympathy with the thought in mind that Walter Flowers gave much to his country and his country will miss him.

□ 1900

Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I thank my distinguished friend from Texas and appreciate his participation.

One of our former Members, Hon. Lou Frey, a distinguished Representative from the great State of Florida, has this to say about Walter Flowers, which I think is important and should be in the RECORD.

He said:

At the first briefing for new Members of the 91st Congress I met a young Democrat from Alabama, Walter Flowers. Walter was a graduate of the University of Alabama, a lawyer; attended the London School of Economics and was a veteran. He was also like me, very green, never previously holding elective office.

For what ever reason we immediately became and stayed the closest of friends. Our offices over our 10 years in the Congress were either next to each other or nearby. We served on the Science Committee together. We traveled around the world together including two trips to Vietnam. We played together including paddleball every day we could, for a dollar a game. We roomed together many years and even owned a fishing boat together. We grew up through some of the most difficult and emotional years in our Nation's history and never lost our mutual respect and affection.

Walter was a many dimensional person. He could be the lawyer's lawyer in the Judicial Committee, the nuclear expert on the Science Committee, the poor country lawyer effectively pleading his cause on the floor of the house, the song leader singing, "Amazing Grace," at a party while hoisting a beer or two, or the understanding friend when a personal problem needed to be solved or shared. Whatever the situtation he was always principled, fair and honest. He never lost his sense of humor or his perspective.

His many qualities never shined more brightly then during the dark days of the Watergate hearings. His reasoned statements and questions, his understanding of the issues made him stand out on a most distinguished Judiciary Committee.

Walter loved life. His laugh was infectious whether it was at himself or at the world. He had an uncanny ability to get some interesting press coverage. Once he received front page national coverage chewing bubble gum and blowing bubbles during the Congressional Marble Tournament.

He was a fierce competitor in any situation. During one of the congressional baseball games he didn't start and was put in as a pinch runner in the last inning. He was upset about not playing and after he stole second base he called me over from my position as the Republican shortstop, "Kid," he said, "let's do something exciting. I need to get my uniform dirty so my children will know I played." We mutually decided that we'd go through the motions of attempting to pick Walter off second base. I walked in and told our pitcher, Congressman Bob Michel, what we were about to do so that Walter could get some action. Bob dutifully lobbed the ball to me. Walter charged back to second base, slid into me, knocking me head over heels. The AP photo sent nationwide showed Walter on the ground with a wide grin on his face and me, two feet in the air, with my backside to the camera. He never stopped laughing about that play and how he managed to steal all the press even though he was in the game for one inning.

No one could ever accuse Walter of being a spectator. He was a dice roller who didn't cry when the dice didn't come up the way he hoped, such as the 1978 Senate race in Alabama. He was down briefly but never out. In a few short months he established himself as an outstanding lawyer and businessman and became vice president of Wheelabrator-Frye, Inc.

He had it all going for him. He worked hard and it was paying off and then his great heart gave out on his 51st birthday while playing tennis. Its just so hard to believe. Walter was so vital, so full of life and energy. I keep expecting to hear him yell, (because no one ever accused him of being quiet) "Hey kid—let's go to the Botts committee—hiyakaho!" But although his voice is now still, his legislative accomplishments, his principles, the way he lived his life speaks more clearly and eloquently to those of us who are his friends. He asked no quarter from life and gave none. It wasn't always smooth and easy for him but it was never boring or dull. He gave it his very best shot.

Obviously life goes on, but for some of us it won't ever be the same. I hope the love and respect Walter was held in in some way helps his wife, Beverly, and his family now and in the years ahead. I know my life is richer, better and fuller because of my friendship with the gentleman from Alabama Congressman Walter Flowers. Hiyakaho.

Mr. Speaker, at this time I yield to the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. LEVITAS).

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Speaker, no one really could add to what has been said about Walter Flowers in these proceedings. The words that were just read express so much of what I feel.

But then it is not possible to say too much about Walter Flowers.

Walter's tenure in Congress was a formidable one but it was not here where his actions were first felt. They reach far back to his days as student-government president of the University of Alabama during the turbulent 1950's. These were troubled times. Walter Flowers was one who resisted the urge to join with the popular majority at that time—to take the easy route. He was noted, even then, for following his own conscience when trying to determine what was right. This trait was most apparent during the controversial Nixon impeachment proceedings.

Faced with the prospect of becoming the swing vote during the deliberations, Walter weighed the issue carefully. His final decision, one he felt truly comfortable with, was not reached without the realization of its long-lasting ramifications. He regarded the agonizing impeachment issue as "the single most important event" he was involved in.

We all know his abilities as a legislator, his scholarliness, and his integrity, a person who once sifted through conflicting information and argument and found what he believed to be the truth, was a person who was unswerving in his commitment, regardless of what the consequences might be to stand up for what he believed to be was right.

His sense of humor, his dedication to this country and all it stood for, his persistence in seeking to achieve what he believed in all of these things are well known, have been recalled and will not be forgotten.

But on a personal note, I remember when I came to the Congress as a new Member of this House. I was looking around to find someone to advise and counsel with me on matters relating to this legislative process and in particular a piece of legislation that I thought was important. Walter Flowers literally sat down with me and spent hours, days and weeks working with me, befriending me and helping me, not because it meant anything that would further his career or further his efforts, which were already well established by that time, but as an act of true friendship to another person.

In the years following that I got to know Walter in many contexts, particularly admiring his work on the Judiciary Committee, playing games and sports with Walter, and finding in all aspects of his life that he maintained a great enthusiasm for everything he did.

Walter Flowers lived all too brief a life and spent all too short a time in the Congress of the United States.

Although the time we served together, from 1974 to 1978, was relatively short, it was one which I enjoyed spending with a person of Walter's caliber. His leadership, evident in his daily activities, was one that commanded respect and admiration from his fellow colleagues.

Walter Flowers' years were all too few. But in those few years on this Earth and in this House he gave much that improved and enriched the land in which he lived, the people with whom he came in contact, and left this place a better world. He shall be remembered.

So it is for these and many other reasons that I again, wish to express my sorrow for, and extend my condolences to, the Flowers' family and friends.

I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania for taking this time.

Mr. COUGHLIN. I thank my colleague and friend, the gentleman from Georgia, for his remarks.

Mr. Speaker, another one of our former colleagues and friends from the great State of Georgia was Congressman Dawson Mathis, and Congressman Dawson Mathis had this to say about Walter Flowers:

What a keen sense of loss we feel, and how deep the empty space that Walter's death created. I am sure that you, and many of Walter's friends and colleagues who still continue service in the House will eulogize and commemorate his life and passing far better than anything I might say. However, there are some things, as one who loved him, that I would add for the record.

It is trite to say that Walter Flowers' contributions to the institution were many, and that he had a deep and abiding love for the House, and for its traditions. Of all his actions, however, he will probably be longer remembered by Historians and Scholars for his role on the House Committee on the Judiciary during those dark days of what was probably our most severe Constitutional Crisis, certainly of this century. Walter Flowers spoke during those days of the "Agony" endured, not only by him, but by others who found themselves in his circumstances as a result of their service on that distinguished Committee. While political pressures from his own constituency, and from outside Alabama, were weighing heavy on his shoulders, he was also faced with other sorts of pressure, not the least of which was his deep respect and love for the Office of the Presidency. In the midst of the swirling storm—political and constitutional—Walter arrived at his decision. And he did so in the same fashion that he ever made any other important decision of his life. He did it with prudence, with intelligence, with reason, and with integrity. In the final analysis, Walter Flowers did what he believed to be the right, and that was the essence of his soul.

It is perhaps ironic that within the timeframe of weeks surrounding Walter's death, we have witnessed the broadcasting of many recollections of that former President, and a great deal of air time was focused on those days before he resigned the Presidency. In one broadcast, the former President recalled that during the days when the Judiciary Committee was proceeding with its work on the Articles of Impeachment, he personally called Gov. George C. Wallace of Walter's beloved Alabama, and asked that Governor Wallace attempt to intercede with Walter on behalf of the President. According to the former President, Governor Wallace refused to do so, and that, said the President, is when he knew his Presidency was over. What was not said during those broadcasts, and what needs to be said now, is that it would not have mattered at all whether Governor Wallace had called Walter Flowers. Walter Flowers would have done what he believed to be right if he had every Governor in the Country calling him. That is not to say that he did not have the deepest respect for Governor Wallace, but it is to say that Walter placed his Oath of Office, and his obligations associated with that oath far above any political, or personal, considerations.

We shall miss Walter Flowers. He was a rare individual and a unique man. He was, by any yardstick one might use, a Statesman in the truest sense of that word, and the eulogy that was written by his life is the most eloquent that could be written. He was our friend.

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, it is with a tremendous sense of sorrow and deep personal loss that I join in today's special order in honor of our departed colleague, Representative Walter Flowers.

Walter had a distinguished career as a Member of this body and as a member of the House Judiciary Committee. I know that there is no need to remind my colleagues of the courage and wisdom demonstrated by Walter Flowers during the greatest constitutional crisis of our time. We all remember how, during the impeachment inquiry, Walter anguished about the weighty decision he was forced to make. We recall how he followed his own conscience, even though it meant risking the favor of his constituents. To think about that time now, we recall the words he spoke before the entire country, as he said:

The institutions of this country have been set up by the people to serve them, to carry out those functions that are necessary to a peaceful and free society. They are not created to serve the interests of one man or one group of men or the political gain of anyone.

It was during that time, 10 years ago, that Walter Flowers showed that he was, above all else, a man of deeply held principles. During those difficulty days I can remember sharing long hours of conversation with Walter as we both struggled with the solemn issues being considered by the impeachment inquiry. We came through that experience, I believe, with a strong mutual respect for one another and, more important, a strong and lasting bond of friendship.

Walter Flowers will be remembered for his role in history, but those of us who knew him will remember his sense of humor, his commitment to the people he represented, and his dedication to the principles that govern this country.

I feel fortunate to have had Walter Flowers as a friend and colleague. I join in sending my deepest sympathies to Walter's wife, Beverly, and the rest of his family.●

● Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I was deeply saddened by the loss of our colleague Walter Flowers.

I served with Walter on the Judiciary and Aging Committees until his retirement in 1978. He was an able lawyer who possessed a keen analytical mind, and a refreshing sense of humor.

In his decade of service in the House of Representatives, Walter earned a reputation for his commitment to our free enterprise system and his detailed knowledge of trade regulations and antitrust law. During the Watergate impeachment inquiry, Walter gained prominence as a wise and judicious legislator, who never let go of his integrity and sense of what was right. Indeed, Walter was always a kind and thoughtful human being.

Walter Flowers was a fine man and a dear friend. I will certainly miss him.●

● Mr. ERDREICH. Mr. Speaker, I was shocked and deeply saddened by the death of former Alabama Representative Walter Flowers. He was one of Alabama's most distinguished Representatives, and served the people of Alabama with intelligence, integrity and independence. Without a doubt, the people of Alabama have never had a finer, more dedicated and well-respected Representative in Washington.

The integrity and judiciousness of Walter Flowers, which received national attention during the House Judiciary Committee hearings on the impeachment of former President Nixon, exemplified his political courageousness which he displayed throughout his life as a public servant. His sense of fairness and strength of character were qualities that we as Representatives of the States of this land should all strive to acquire.

Walter Flowers felt strongly that the Government, as he so well put it, was "not created to serve the interests of one man or one group of men or the political gain of anyone."

Walter Flowers' untimely death was truly a tragic loss, not only for his family and for me on a personal level, but also for the people of Alabama, whose well-being and interests he placed above his own. He will be sorely missed by all those who loved him as a man and respected him as a legislator.●

● Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, it is with great sadness that we conduct this special order today on our late colleague, Walter Flowers of Tuscaloosa, AL.

Even though this is a sad occasion because Walter Flowers is no longer with us, it is my great privilege to join in the celebration of the high character and great service with which Walter Flowers served the people of Alabama and our Nation.

As I remember Walter, I see a brilliant man, the product of Alabama public schools and the University of Alabama and its law school, of which I am also a graduate. Walter achieved a high reputation and many honors at the University of Alabama. Although I attended the university ahead of Walter, I was always impressed at his record of accomplishments at the university including the student body presidency and such honors as selection for Phi Beta Kappa, Omicron Delta Kappa, and the Jasons. I am proud that he was my fraternity brother in the mother chapter of Sigma Alpha Epsilon.

As a brilliant scholar, Walter was a rotary fellow, following graduation from law school, to the University of London.

Following completion of Walter's formal education, he served our Nation as an Army intelligence officer with 2 years' active duty after which he returned home to Tuscaloosa to enter the practice of law. During the time before he was elected to Congress, Walter was extremely active in a multitude of civic affairs including Boy Scouts, YMCA, mental health associations, the United Fund, the Red Cross, and the bar association.

I first got to know Walter well and on a personal basis after he was elected to Congress in 1968. I quickly learned that Walter Flowers completely measured up to the great reputation that preceded him to Congress. He quickly developed into a highly effective legislator and respected statesman. I personally knew that I could count on the soundness of Walter's counsel and advice on issues handled by his committees—Judiciary, Science and Technology, and Aging.

I know of no man who better served his district, State, and the Nation than did Walter Flowers. He was an influential, respected, and most effective member of the House of Representatives. He was brilliant; a man of charm and wit; intelligent, personable and generous; a true product of the new South—a statesman of great character. I greatly enjoyed the 10 years as his colleague in the House.

I feel a very deep loss in Walter's death. He will be sorely missed by all of his colleagues, friends, and loved ones. However, his memory will live because of his character, his service to others, and the achievements and accomplishments he left as his living memorial. ●

● Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I rise in tribute to my former colleague and dear friend, Walter Flowers.

Walter served on the Judiciary Committee with me during the impeachment hearings. He was a voice of calm and reason in a very tragic and confusing time in our history. Walter and I were part of a bipartisan group of seven Judiciary Committee members who joined together to draft the first two articles of impeachment. We were nicknamed the "fragile coalition" even though some members of the media preferred to call us "the unholy alliance." Walter's independent judgment and deliberative nature coupled with a soft-spoken manner were admired by everyone on the committee and in the House. His wife Beverly recently wrote to tell me that the last letter Walter wrote was a response to my letter on the fragile coalition. Needless to say, this exemplary son of Alabama renamed the group "the magnificent seven".

Walter Flowers served with distinction as chairman of the Subcommittee on Administrative Law and Governmental Relations of the Judiciary Committee. During his tenure on that committee, he worked diligently on the Government in the Sunshine Act requiring Federal regulatory agencies to hold their meetings in public. He also worked diligently to enact stronger lobbying disclosure laws.

Walter was highly respected by Members on both sides of the aisle as a man of integrity and fairness. I send my deepest sympathy to his wife, Beverly and family.●

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to our former colleague, the Honorable Walter Flowers of Alabama, whose untimely death on April 12, is a tremendous loss to the people of this Nation.

Walter Flowers served in the U.S. House of Representatives for 10 years, and he represented his constituents from the Seventh Congressional District of Alabama with distinction, deep compassion, and courage.

During his career in Congress, he compiled an outstanding record of achievement as a member of the Democratic Steering and Policy Committee, the House Select Committee on Aging, and the House Science and Technology Committee. His dedication to the highest standards, as a member of the House Judiciary Committee, was an inspiration to his friends and fellow citizens alike.

Congressman Flowers was a man devoted to the people of his district, to his State, and to his country, and was highly respected by his colleagues for his honesty and integrity. He will be long remembered by those of us who had the privilege to serve with him in the Congress of the United States.

Mrs. Annunzio and I extend our deepest sympathy to the members of his family who survive him.●

● Mr. RUSSO. Mr. Speaker, I recall the days of 1975 when a young and somewhat lost freshman Illinois Congressman was challenged trying to learn his way around the Halls of the buildings, much less the workings of the Judiciary Committee to which he had been assigned. It is a story we can all tell—we all recall our first overwhelming weeks in Congress. And for me—that particular Congressman from Chicago in the Judiciary Committee—I also recall the kindness and patience of a premier Congressman who took the time to help.

The Honorable Walter Flowers was a friend and there to help at an especially crucial time. It is important for new legislators to have someone to show them the ropes, and if that someone is as knowledgeable and thoughtful as Representative Flowers always was, it is a special bonus. I also came to appreciate the thoughtfulness Representative Flowers extended to everyone in his work. He was very fair, understanding and had the respect of people from across the political spectrum. His moderation of tone did not diminish the strength of his convictions or talents of persuasion

He was a gentleman, a kind and decent human being, a fine legislator. I join my colleagues in paying tribute to him and in extending my sympathy to his family.●

● Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to one of our former colleagues, Walter Flowers, who died at age 51 on April 12.

Walter is probably best known to the American people as one of 38 Members of Congress who served on the House Judiciary Committee during the Watergate hearings in 1974. However, his colleagues in the House knew him as a man of courage, wisdom, honesty, and charity long before his name was known outside of the State of Alabama and the U.S. Congress. He worked with a dedication and commitment to excellence as a member of the Committee on Science and Technology and chairman of its Energy Research and Development Subcommittee, and as chairman of the Subcommittee on Administrative Law of the House Judicary Committee.

When he left the House in 1978, he enriched the legal community just as he had enriched the House of Representatives with his knowledge and experience. He possessed a grace and sophistication which at once offered friendship and commanded respect. His talents and his contributions to the public good will long be remembered. Walter Flowers, the man, will long be missed.●

● Mr. WHITEHURST. Mr. Speaker, like so many of my colleagues, I was shocked by the announcement on April 12 of the death of Walter Flowers. I remember so well the friendship that we formed when I came to Congress in 1969. Walter's warm personality made him beloved by all of us in the 91st Congress. In the difficult years of the Watergate crisis that followed, we came to appreciate Walter's strength of character. Calm in the face of enormous political pressure, Walter Flowers never deviated from his goal of duty and constitutional responsibility. I cannot count the times during that period when I sought his counsel. He was indeed a pillar of strength for all of us.

Even though Walter has been gone from the Congress for some time, his death still leaves a void in our lives. The world is a poorer place for his leaving.●

● Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, those of us who knew and served with Walter Flowers during his all too brief years in the House were saddened by his sudden death on April 12.

I happened to make his acquaintance during his very first days as a Member of the 91st Congress back in January 1969. He was an engaging, attractive young lawyer who arrived here with a commitment to serve the people of his district and to contribute all he could toward a healing and pacification of a country that was badly torn apart by the Vietnam war.

Walter's voice was a quiet voice of reason. He was a solid, sensible, unruffled man who was not inclined to fly off on tangents. No matter how much emotional and oratorical debris was floating around in the air, Walter could still see the main point of an argument and make his decision on what he thought was good for this country.

Like all reasonable men, Walter Flowers listened more than he talked. He was not one to close his mind without listening to the other person's point of view. I remember talking with him many times about legislation from the Committee on Education and Labor which he might have been expected to oppose. But Walter would listen, and if he thought a piece of legislation had merit, he would support me. I always appreciated that quality of fairness and openmindedness that he possessed in such great measure.

I was sorry when Walter decided to retire from the House a few years ago and return to his law practice and other interests. But I recognized then, as now, that he had weighed all the angles and opted for what he was convinced was best.

Now this good and decent man has gone from us, and we are the poorer. I hope his family realizes that in his few short years here he made an impact on the Congress and on the country, and that he has left behind a legacy of warm friendship and fond recollection.●

● Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, the sudden passing of Walter Flowers earlier this month is a shock which saddens us all.

Walter Flowers was a good man and a good Member. He worked hard for his district, for the State of Alabama and for the Nation.

As a colleague I knew Walter Flowers to be a man of strength and convictions, of humor and insight, of action and deeds. He was an able legislator who weighed carefully all sides of a question before making up his mind. Nothing evidences this better than his performance as a member of the Watergate panel.

It is this work which made him a national figure—one required to make difficult choices affecting the course of our Nation. The decisions were not easy, but he met the challenge of the task with responsibility.

His dignity and demeanor held Walter Flowers in the highest esteem by his colleagues. I am proud to have had the privilege and pleasure to work with and to know this gentleman.

Walter Flowers' passing is a blow we all feel—no one more than his wife, Beverly, and his children, Vivian, Walter III, and Victor. To them I extend my sympathy.●

● Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, I rise in warm tribute to our former colleague, Walter Flowers of Alabama, whose recent death at age 51 comes as such an unexpected shock.

Walter was one of the most widely respected and best liked Members of this body.

A brilliant Phi Beta Kappa graduate, he was a dedicated, able, and conscientious legislator. I had the privilege of serving with him on the Science and Technology Committee where he ably chaired the Fossil, Nuclear Energy Research, Development and Demonstration Subcommittee. He was always knowledgeable, well prepared, and reasonable in his approach to the often controversial matters over which he presided. He was tolerant of the differing viewpoints of members such as myself on nuclear power, assuring we had a fair opportunity for input.

Walter demonstrated his high principles as a member of the Judiciary Committee, voting for articles of impeachment of President Nixon even though that was unpopular in his district and jeopardized his reelection.

Walter demonstrated his humanity and compassion as a member of the Select Committee on Aging. He did what he thought was right, often supporting national Democratic issue positions that were more liberal than his constituents.

Most important, Walter was a good friend, to me and probably to more of his associates than most members. He was always full of fun, caring, and helpful.

Even after he returned to private life, he maintained his congressional friendships and helped many of us raise campaign funds, even those like me who often disagreed with him and his clients.

Walter was a wonderful person. I join in condolences to his wife and children. He will be sorely missed by them and by his many friends, in Congress and without.●

Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New Mexico (Mr. LUJAN).

Mr. LUJAN. I thank my friend for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, it is with deep sorrow that I join today in paying a special tribute to our late colleague, Walter Flowers, who recently passed away.

Walter and I entered the House together in the 91st Congress. He was always very friendly and kind and went out of his way to be considerate with all his colleagues.

Through the years, we served together on the Science and Technology Committee and I always had great respect and admiration for Walter's ability to get things done. Walter worked diligently on behalf of his district and his country. He had an overriding concern for Alabama, and for Walter his constituents came first.

Walter always championed legislation that would benefit the Nation. This was particularly evident in the Subcommittee on Energy Research and Production.

Walter was hard working, knowledgeable, and dedicated. We will all miss him. My heartfelt sympathy goes out to his family. The House of Representatives has lost one of its best loved, most able and respected friends.

Mr. COUGHLIN. I thank my colleague and friend, the gentleman from New Mexico and classmate of Walter Flowers, for his remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Alabama (Mr. SHELBY), Congressman Walter Flowers' successor in office.

Mr. SHELBY. Mr. Speaker, it is with great sadness and great pride that I rise to pay tribute to Walter Flowers. Sadness because this tribute is occasioned by his untimely death on April 12. Pride because he was my friend, my very dear friend.

Many here in the House of Representatives knew Walter as a highly respected, valuable Member of this body for five consecutive terms. They remember him most vividly for his pivotal and courageous role during the impeachment proceedings by the House Judiciary Committee in 1974. That was surely his finest hour, the climax of his career as a statesman. He will also be remembered as chairman of the Judiciary Subcommittee on Administrative Law and Governmental Relations and for his effective leadership on the Science and Technology Committee and the Fossil and Nuclear Energy Research, Development and Demonstration Subcommittee which he chaired. He made many lasting friendships during his tenure here, and I know many of my colleagues are sharing the sharp sense of loss that I feel since his death.

As law partners in Tuscaloosa for several years prior to Walter's service in Congress, Walter and I developed a friendship, a camaraderie that grew deeper over the years and has been particularly valuable to me during my years as his successor here in the House.

While Walter served the Seventh District for those 10 years, I watched him as he faced controversial decisions head on. He anguished over many of them privately, and he occasionally drew public criticism for them, but I cannot remember a single decision that he would have changed had he had the opportunity. He was a man of strong principles—principles that guided him through the difficult times and that were an inspiration to those of us around him.

Those who knew him were impressed by Walter's superior intelligence. And yet he was one of the most unpretentious people I know. He was everybody's "buddy," and he was as strong an advocate for his meekest constitutent as he was for the most influence-wielding one.

Walter gave up his House seat to run for the Senate in 1978. It was one of his rare endeavors that was not successful, but he turned even defeat into advantage. He began making a name for himself in the Washington business community, first as a valuable member of a respected law firm here, then as vice president of a successful engineering and energy conglomerate, organizing and serving as first chairman of the National Council on Synthetic Fuels.

In the meantime, he was providing valuable counsel to me as I took over this House seat. He had an insight into my experiences here that was unique. He had that perspective that no one else around me could offer—not my staff, not my wife, not other House members—because none of them were solely accountable to the people of the Seventh District of Alabama. But Walter had been there, and he was big enough to share the benefits of that experience with me. My colleagues here know how lonely this job can be sometimes, and knowing that, can appreciate what it was like to have a friend like Walter Flowers—and what a deep sadness I feel at losing him.

My heartfelt sympathy goes out to the family he left behind—to Beverly; to the children, Vivi, Walter, Jr., and Victor; to his father, Walter W. Flowers, Sr.; and to his brother, Bob.

Mr. COUGHLIN. I thank my distinguished colleague and friend from Alabama for his remarks.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the life, character, and public service of the late Honorable Walter Flowers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

FLAT RATE TAX

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to focus my remarks this evening on the benefits of the concept of a flat rate tax as it would apply to the traditional family structure. In particular, I would like to focus on the flat rate tax prospects for strengthening the survival of families at the lower end of the income spectrum.

Let me say, to begin with, that I think the flat tax plan recently submitted by Congressman KEMP and Senator KASTEN, which I cosponsored, is a flat tax proposal which is particularly family oriented because it is structured in a way to insure that families will be the beneficiaries of the benefits of the flat tax.

We have all read or heard about numerous studies which detail the increasing instability and poor health of the American family. It is my firm belief that whatever problems all families are facing, they are in a large part a direct result of the declining economic opportunities caused by marginal tax rates which are still too high and Government regulations which deny legitimate employment opportunities to individuals, particularly those at the bottom of the economic ladder of opportunity.

□ 1920

The Census Bureau recently released a report which details some of the problems faced by the American family. It indicated that although the number of marriages has begun to rise of late, the number of divorces has been increasing even faster.

Their figures indicate that the divorce rate has increased between 1960 and 1980 from 2.2 per 1,000 population, to 5.2 per 1,000, more than doubling during that time frame. As a result, nearly one out of every two marriages today statistically can be expected to end in divorce.

More frightening from my standpoint, and from the standpoint of anyone concerned about future family stability is the statistic which indicates that the number of children involved in divorces has more than tripled since 1970, from roughly 400,000 to over 1.2 million. A recent study by the Center of Study of Social Policy established a link between marital breakup and poverty rates.

In 1960, 21 percent of black families with children had a single parent living at home. By 1981, that percentage had doubled to 47 percent; nearly half of all black families had only one parent living at home.

In 1960, the median income for black families was 55 percent of that for white families. In 1981, after one War on Poverty, and after the launching of numerous Government-based to equalize the income ratios between the races, the median income of black families had risen all of 1 percentage point to 56 percent.

The Civil Rights Commission reports that following marital breakup, 25 percent of white families can be expected to fall into poverty; while 55 percent of black families do so. So it should come as no surprise to anyone familiar with what has happened over the last 20 years in the welfare policy, that while the poverty rate for all children rose from 15 to 20 percent during the 1970's, for black children the rate has risen from 42 to 45 percent, and by 1980 was twice as high as it was for white children.

Again, one of the principal causes was the number of children with no fathers. Sixty-eight percent of black children living in female-headed households, 2 out of every 3 children were poor in 1981, compared to 43 percent of white children who lived in similar circumstances.

We have here a problem of truly tragic proportions and far-reaching scope. The full dimensions of which will not become fully apparent until many years from now. The central question, of course, is why? Why did fathers leave their families? What were the contributing factors? What role did Government play in the breakup of those families?

Tom Joe, the director of the Center of Study of Social Policy, thinks he has the answer: The increase in the percentage of female-headed households and the stagnation of the median income for minorities is directly attributable to this administration because they have made, "low wage employment opportunities less profitable than welfare," and actually discourage people from working.

Let me say about that analysis, it is the right cure; it is wrong diagnosis. Certainly increasing marginal and average tax rates, which penalize the incentive to work and invest in the future have played a significant role in discouraging employment opportunities. But is is not this administration which is to blame. Families, and particularly large families, have been increasingly discriminated against by the Tax Code. As a result of the Kemp-Roth tax reform passed in 1981, single people and married people with no dependents will have in 1984 essentially the same average tax rates as they had in 1960. However, a couple with 2 dependents will experience a 43-percent increase in average tax rates while a couple with 4 dependents will be paying 223 percent more in taxes than they were in 1960.

If our children are essential to the creation to future wealth, as I believe anyone would admit they are, then clearly the present Tax Code discriminates against both. In terms of actual dollars paid between 1960 and 1980, the median family income has had a tax liability increase of 300 percent; almost a 50-percent increase over and above the increase in their incomes. What family, especially at the lower end of the income scale, can withstand that kind of pressure and strain?

Certainly not families that most of us have in our districts; they simply cannot put up with that kind of pressure. By not updating and revising the Tax Code to keep pace with changing economic and social conditions, the IRS is administering a discriminatory toll which by increasing the disincentive to work, is playing a major role in driving a wedge into the family fabric.

From that angle, a flat rate tax would have obvious benefits in terms of restoring to the code a needed element of moral equity. So long as it would not result in any family paying more taxes than they currently do, a broad-based, low flat rate tax would allow more people to succeed and to attain financial independence, and would not punish them for doing so.

There is another less visible yet equally insidious element at work which not only increases the disincentive to work, but actually prevents people from working: As hard as it may be to believe, there are now on the Government books numerous labor laws and Government restrictions which, through faulty administration, effectively bar people from entering the labor market.

In general, we as a nation have inadvertently managed to build into our governmental system institutional barriers which limit and in many cases eliminate economic opportunity. We know that when opportunities are limited or destroyed, dreams perish, lending support to George Guilder's contention that, "Poverty is a state of mind, not of income."

For over 50 years the creation of wealth has been seen by our Government as a vehicle to take from the rich and give to the poor. As the economic pie has been shrinking over the past few years, it has become a case of taking from the independent and giving it to the dependent. As the Government's redistributionist tentacles have expanded, too often the independent have become the nonwealthy, including those families who are living on the margin barely making it themselves.

Under the paternalistic programs adopted by the modern day liberal establishment, those families must continue to hand over larger and larger chunks of their income to finance the liberals' failing vision of a welfare state. As we have seen from just a few statistics that I cited earlier, the cost of financing that dream has come in the form of the destabilization of the family unit, and for those directly affected, the vision has become a nightmare.

Think, for instance, about the reports we have had in recent days about hunger in America and about the homeless in America. That is an indictment of the present welfare state. We have been operating now for 40 years under a welfare state philosophy and for at least the last 20 years have been expanding it. Yet what we hear today is the fact that you have more homeless and more hunger.

What has happened? Something has failed. What has failed is the liberal welfare state, and it seems to me that failure needs to be pinned upon the people who brought about that kind of devastation, the people right here in this Congress who have voted to take from independent people out there, working people, and give to dependent people and thereby destroyed the ability to work and the ability to produce in this society.

One general measure, the control extended by the Government over the lives of those families who have become dependent on assistance, is the increased share of the gross national product going to pay for transfer payment programs. Between 1965, the first year of the War on Poverty, and 1980, the percentage of our total national resources going to Federal transfer payments increased from 4.8 percent to roughly 11.5 percent. In other words, we have nearly triple just the Federal commitment, to say nothing of State and local governments' increased commitment to eradicating poverty, yet according to the most recent census figures, poverty is higher now than it was in 1965. So what is going on here? Something is failing.

The liberal welfare state vision is failing. One of the principal problems with the current Government subsidy programs is that they do not stress or in many cases even allow work.

Thomas Sowell, writing in the book "Markets and Minorities," outlines the nature of the trade-off involved in accepting Federal assistance.

> The amount necessary to life every man, woman and child in America above the poverty line has been calculated and it is one-third of what in fact is spent on poverty programs. Clearly, much of the transfer ends up in the pockets of highly paid administrators, consultants and staff, as well as higher income recipients of benefits from programs advertised as anti-poverty efforts.

□ 1930

Think about that for a minute. What Sowell is saying and what can be shown statistically is that what we are doing in this country is paying three times more to eradicate poverty than is actually getting to the poor. His figures look something like this:

We spend in this country about $36,000 per person for every poor family in the country. The amount of money actually going in income and benefits to those poor people is around $12,000. What happens to the other $24,000? The other $24,000 is going to pay highly paid bureaucrats, highly paid administrators and staff and consultants, all kinds of people who are not poor themselves; in fact, who are living off poverty people and living very well off poverty people.

The question for us as a society is whether or not we ought to trim the $12,000 going to the poor, and the answer to that question is no. We ought to make certain that they get every dime of it. But should we not be doing something about the $24,000 that is going to the nonpoor, the people who are either ineligible for the benefits, or should be ineligible for the benefits, or to highly paid bureaucrats.

There I think the answer to the question is clear. Yes, we should begin trimming back on that. That is the liberal welfare state that has gone wild and should be trimmed back.

In order to qualify for many Government programs, one must be unemployed, earning below the official poverty level, or otherwise disadvantaged. This provides incentives to forego present earnings, and with it forego human capital formation for the future. In other words, in order to qualify for Government assistance, recipients must agree to give up work and the ability to provide, then, for one's own future.

As a result of those conditions, the share of the gross national product going to finance the expansion of the welfare state can essentially be viewed as the nonproductive portion of the total national output, from which, as currently constituted, we can expect virtually a zero return on investment.

The macroeconomic effect of the spending and taxing policies characteristics of the past few decades has produced a gross national product which is, according to current estimates, operating approximately $600 billion short of full capacity. Since the current gross national product is at about $3.1 trillion, full capacity gross national product would be around $3.6 trillion or $3.7 trillion.

I am a car buff, and from a car buff's point of view, one might say that our economy is comparable to driving a six-cylinder car on only five cylinders. You do not get very far in cars like that, just as we do not get very far in a war on poverty with policies like that. In order to refire that six cylinder and get the economy operating at a full capacity, we need to revamp our tax system so that it rewards work, and we need to overhaul our approach to social and welfare programs so that our Government allows work.

Opportunity begins with hope, and hope springs from an ability to provide for oneself, which means having a job. Government programs which limit access to employment or specifically deny job opportunities must be either modified or eliminated.

Walter Williams, the distinguished economist, has done a tremendous amount of work in the area of labor market barriers, focusing on their effect on minorities and other groups located on the bottom rung of the income ladder. His findings about the effect of increases in the minimum wage law should be a lesson to us all about Louis Brandeis' warning that—

Experience should teach us to be most on our guard to protect liberty when Government's purposes are beneficial. The greatest dangers to liberty lurk in the insidious encroachment by men of zeal, well meaning but without understanding.

Williams begins his analysis in 1948, when both black and white youth unemployment rates were roughly equivalent. In fact, if anything, the rate for white unemployment was marginally higher than it was for blacks. Anyway, the rate remained about the same from 1948 until the mid-1960's, but from the mid-1960's to the last 2 key indicator years, labor force participation and unemployment rates deteriorated sharply, particularly for minority youth unemployment and for minority youth employment opportunities.

For black youth, the labor force participation rate fell from 52 percent in 1965 to 40 percent in 1982. During the same period, the labor force participation for white youths actually increased. The unemployment rate for white youths increased from 13 percent in 1965 to over 23 percent in 1982, while the rate for black youths literally went through the roof, increasing from 23 percent in 1965 to 44 percent in 1982.

Imagine that: 44 percent in 1982. That means that in 1982 almost half the black youth in this country who wanted to work were denied the opportunity to work.

What explains that dramatic falloff in the labor force participation rate for minority young people and the dramatic increases in the unemployment rate for both groups? Can it be attributed to Reaganomics, as some of the critics like to charge? Hardly. The deterioration in the minority youth labor market began before Ronald Reagan was elected Governor of the State of California, much less President. Can it be said that the lower unemployment rates in the past were because blacks had the educational levels equal to or higher than whites? Clearly not. Can racial discrimination explain that deterioration? Probably not.

It would be extremely difficult for anyone to sustain the argument that employers are more discriminatory now than they were 25 years ago.

One of the answers to this dilemma is the minimum wage law which, since 1965, has increased by over 150 percent, far outstripping comparative increases in consumer prices, other wage rates, and productivity indicators. In other words, increases in the minimum wage rates have the effect of pricing labor out of the market which, in effect, has had the most damaging impact on those at the lower end of the income ladder and those who are less skilled and trained than other workers with higher productivity.

Interestingly, the message that increases in the minimum wage law have had and are having a negative impact on minority youth employment opportunities is beginning to spread to the black community. A recent poll done by the Data Black Public Opinion firm, a national black polling firm, revealed that 37 percent of those questioned favored the youth opportunity wage, while 36 percent were afraid it would have a negative impact on adult employment. In other words, there were more people who think that the youth opportunity wage ought to be implemented than those who were opposed to it, and that is within the black community. Recently the Conference of Black Mayors endorsed the youth opportunity wage concept, again because they see what is happening in their own communities.

Yet, supporters of the minimum wage increases and opponents of the youth opportunity wage cling to the contention that minimum wage increases have not had a serious effect on youth employment. To back their contention up, they often rely on the findings of the Minimum Wage Study Commission, which concluded that increases in the minimum wage have had only minimal impact on employment. In general, they found that a 10-percent increase in wage levels reduces youth employment opportunities by only 1 or 2 percent.

In rebuttal, a 1- or 2-percent reduction in youth employment is not minimal. There were approximately 6.5 million teenagers in the 1982 labor market, so a 1- or 2-percent reduction translates to between 65,000 and 130,000 lost jobs for those young people. Also, assuming that each 10 percent increase in the minimum wage rate results in an average loss of 100,000 jobs, it can be assumed by logical extension that since the wage rate has been increased by 150 percent since 1965 that the cumulative number of jobs lost just through increases in the minimum wage could easily exceed 1 million jobs.

How much of a factor has that cumulative job loss had on minority youth unemployment and to the decline in family stability over the years?

The Commission has also estimated that establishing a youth wage would produce between 250,000 and 350,000 jobs. The Commission's own staff economists, in a minority report, say that that figure is conservative and put the increase in the 450,000-job range.

So it should be clear that minimum wage increases, just as one of numberous labor market barriers administered by the Federal Government, are having a negative impact on youth employment opportunities, the cumulative effect of which is probably playing a major role in the decline of family stability.

But I must add that we in the Government are not only guilty parties in this particular scheme. Business, too, must accept its share of responsibility for becoming part of a corporate welfare equally dependent upon Government handouts for its protection, and equally, if not more so, afraid to take risks.

The business world has been all too willing to accept and even promote regulations designed to insulate itself from the rigors of competition and from its own self-imposed inefficiencies. The clearest example of this is in the area of occupational licensing procedures.

Walter Williams examined the role of occupational licensing in the taxicab industry. He found that only 2 or 3 percent of all taxis in Philadelphia are owned by blacks; 40 percent of the city is black; while in Washington, DC, 75 percent of the taxis are black owned. Does this mean that Philadelphia is a hotbed of racism and Washington is utopia?

Obviously not; the answer can be found in elementary economics. The cost of obtaining a taxicab license in Philadelphia is 100 times higher, $20,000, than it is in Washington. More minorities can afford the lower license costs, so therefore more minorities become an entrepreneur owning their own taxicabs and making their own living.

In other words, occupational licensing procedures have been used as a tool to spawn, and in some cases perpetuate, economic discrimination.

Or as Thomas Sowell puts it:

> With the rise of government-supported labor unions having complete dominance over particular occupations, union membership was tantamount to occupational licensing, and was used to keep out or drive out blacks.

In short, the rules of the economic game have been changed for minorities. Whereas in the past, particularly during the 19th century, other economic groups used the economic game to advance themselves by exploiting the opportunities available to them, those same opportunities, often in the name of social justice and reform, have either been eliminated or severely curtailed.

Winston Churchill once said that in social policy, government has two roles. One is to build a net through which no one can fall. The other is to build a ladder up which all can climb.

Of course, the many instances in which government laws, regulations, and other restrictions have produced economically detrimental results for various ethnic groups, the fact is that we should not imply any particular ineptitude or depravity. The essential point is that government has limits as to how much it can do to assist individuals; beyond those limits, government often becomes a well-intentioned, but negative force in society.

The combined effect of government's efforts in the social arena has been to saw the bottom rungs of the economic ladder of opportunity. Although the full ramifications of declining economic opportunities are difficult to measure, in terms of jobs lost, credible estimates indicate that approximately 2 million jobs are denied, mostly to minorities and other groups dependent on the Government for assistance. The result is economic discrimination of the worst kind. Some may question it on the grounds of the Constitution's equal protection of the laws or property rights provisions, but it is all the more disturbing because we have invested so much and made such heroic strides in erasing political discrimination from the Government's books.

As a side note, it is interesting to note, as Thomas Sowell points out, that traditionally it has been groups that have consciously avoided the political arena that have made the most economic progress in terms of rising out of poverty and achieving relative levels of wealth. Sowell cites such groups as the Chinese, the Japanese, and the Jewish community as evidence. By contrast, the Irish, while politically successful, were among the slowest rising economic groups in the economy during the 19th century.

In effect, what we have managed to do is trade the political slavery imposed for economic reasons as it was utilized during the 18th and 19th centuries for economic slavery imposed for political reasons, vote-buying reasons.

That is interesting, because one is no less insidious than the other. One of the worst chapters in this country's history was that 18th- and 19th-century period during which we made a conscious determination that we would politically impose slavery on the country for the economic benefit of the plantation owners.

Today what we are doing is imposing economic slavery for the benefit of a few politicians so that they can go out and get elected by promising more assistance to people that they are freeing into ghetto plantations.

In Churchill's eyes, it could be said that we have been busy building nets everywhere, but have forgotten about the ladder up which people can climb out of economic poverty.

What this Nation needs is a social policy that offers an escape from 20th-century slavery. Along with an economic policy that rewards work and makes it possible to climb higher on the economic ladder, we need an escape route, an above-ground railroad, if you will, that will rebuild the bottom rungs of the economic ladder. A flat rate tax would be a vast improvement over the current Tax Code in terms of equity. It would be an economic reform assuring that families could afford to provide for their own futures.

We need a similar social agenda so those Americans who want to work, but cannot because of government restrictions, are allowed to pursue their own dreams and aspirations.

Carl Sandburg once wrote: "The nation is a dream. Nothing happens unless first the dream."

Government has the capacity to enhance dreams or to trample dreams. Let us become a nation with a government that allows our dreams to know no limits.

THREE DECISIONS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. GINGRICH) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I want to take a few minutes, I shall not take 60, but I would like to take a few minutes to tie together three decisions that occurred yesterday that I mentioned earlier today in my 1-minute speech, which I found encapsulated the problems of the Democratic Party and particularly its liberal wing in confronting reality.

Yesterday we had three events occurring: First a decision not to go to conference with the Senate, a decision that was designed to kill aid to the freedom fighters in Nicaragua; second, a vote by the majority of the Democrats to allow Soviet slave labor products to be imported into the United States, a vote against an effort to try to introduce an amendment which would have permitted the Customs Service, would have required the Customs Service to stop slave labor imports, and third, a decision by the Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights of the Judiciary Committee that one of the major problems of crime in America was the FBI entrapping Congressmen who were corrupt.

Now, I think there is a linkage between the Democratic Party's position on killing aid to the freedom fighters in Nicaragua, the Democratic Party's position not allowing an amendment to require us to stop importing slave labor products from the Soviet Union, and the decision by the Democratic leadership on the Judiciary Committee to report out a bill whose primary effect would be to cripple the FBI.

Let me turn first to the Judiciary Committee decision. In the New York Times for today it was headlined, "House Panel Assails FBI Undercover Operations." I think that says it all. When the American people are worried about being mugged, when the American people are worried about organized crime, when just this last few days the people of Colombia saw the drug dealers so powerful that they assassinated the Justice Minister, literally drove up next to him and killed him, fired six shots into him while he was driving down the road, forced the President of Colombia to declare a state of national emergency because there are so many drug dealers; at a time when the Wall Street Journal just yesterday reported that Cuba is consciously promoting drug dealing as a way of earning money for its operations and also as a way of corrupting America, what does the House Judiciary Committee think is the major problem in America? It is protecting Congressmen from being entrapped by an FBI agent. In order words, the response to the famous Abscam scandal in which several Congressmen turned out to be corrupt and were willing to be bribed by foreigners was that it is unfair for the FBI to tempt them; that the FBI should only be allowed to do something after a Federal judge supervises them and makes sure.

I would suggest that it is remarkable that the Democratic leadership of the House, looking at every survey that tells them that the American people are worried about their children becoming drug addicts, we have seen report after report of violence in schools, about seventh, eighth, and ninth graders buying drugs, seeing all the concern about violent crime in America, that the major effort of the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights would be to further weaken the FBI. I think it tells us something about the liberal mind set of the Democratic Party in the House.

Let me go a stage further. On the very same day, the House decided not to meet with the Senate on a bill which would have allowed continued financing for the freedom fighters in Nicaragua. The article in the Washington Times quotes the Speaker, TIP O'NEILL, as saying:

I am opposed to funding for guerrillas in Nicaragua all the way. Nicaragua is not going to get through this House.

Now, let me be clear what is at stake here. There are people in Central America risking their lives to promote freedom in Nicaragua. There are people in Central America risking their lives to stop Communism in our backyard. There is a serious effort to try to preserve the Government of El Salvador which is being systematically undermined and attacked by Nicaragua with Cuban and Soviet help.

Now, what is the Speaker's position? I quote again:

I am opposed to funding for guerrillas in Nicaragua all the way. Nicaragua is not going to get through this House.

□ 2050

So yesterday the Democrats in the House decided not to confer.

Now, the third decision is more obscure because, frankly, liberals in the West do not like to think about it. There are millions of people still in Soviet slave labor camps, the terrors that Solzhenitsyn wrote about in "One Day in the Life of Ivan Denisovitch" and in "First Circle" and in other publications including "The Gulag Archipelago," that pattern of locking people up for 10, 15, 20, 30 years, sending them to Siberia, having them work on projects still exists today.

Frankly, we are not enforcing an existing law against using slave labor. We are not stopping products from coming into America that might have been made by slave labor. And yesterday there was a serious effort by TOM BLILEY, the gentleman from Virginia, to offer an amendment which would have required the Government to stop products made by Soviet slave labor from coming into the United States, and a majority of the Democrats in this House voted against the efforts by the gentleman from Virginia Mr. (BLILEY), and in effect, to permit the importation of products that involve slave labor.

Now, let me carry all of this one step further. We live in a very dangerous time. The primary problem we face in this House is a basic disagreement about the nature of reality. Those of us who are more conservative, both Democrat and Republican, would argue that the world is dangerous, that there is evil abroad, whether the evil is drug dealers, corrupt Congressmen, Communists in Central America, or the Libyan who shot the policewoman in London last week, but that evil is out there, that evil will try to get us, that evil will devour freedom if we permit it.

Let me read from today's Wall Street Journal an editorial entitled "Terrorism and the West," because it explains why this is all so serious.

I quote:

Britain's standoff in London with the diplomatic thugs and murderers representing Libya's Col. Qadhafi has once again set people to thinking about the terrorism problem. The problem is that the world is now full of groups and even nations who for political reasons are willing to murder government officials, the pope, prominent citizens and however many innocent bystanders happen to be in the wrong place at the wrong time. They gun down people in crowded city streets. They blow up buses, department stores and passenger planes. The civilized world gapes while people die who didn't deserve to die. An effective solution to political terrorism is nowhere in sight.

They go on to say:

If there were ways to effectively wipe out terrorism, you can be pretty certain the Israelis would have discovered them. They haven't. Acts of terror persist in Northern Ireland and on the streets of Paris despite the fact that neither the British nor French have ever been particularly squeamish about playing rough if there's some likelihood of success.

But we don't want to give the impression that eliminating terrorism is impossible. You can kill terrorism. There are no terrorist acts to speak of in the Soviet Union, Eastern Europe, North Korea, Vietnam, Iran, Syria or Cuba. And if the West's negotiators and diplomats succeed in calling off Jonas Savimbi in Angola, the Matabeleland rebels in Zimbabwe and the contras in Nicaragua, three more cradles of totalitarianism will grow into safe havens from terrorism.

Let me go back through this for a second. Notice if you are a Communist colony there is no terrorism. If you are a totalitarian government with a Gestapo of the left in charge, there is no terrorism. The leftwing Nazis and the Soviet Union know how to use brute force in such a way that their colonies, whether it is Cuba or the colony they are trying to establish in Nicaragua, there will be no terrorism.

Let me go on.

Based on the foregoing list of totalitarian nations, let us try to state clearly what so many of the free world's best minds adamantly refuse to acknowledge: The planned political murder of noncombatants and innocent civilians—terrorism—is carried out today by individuals and nations representing two ideas, Marxist-Leninism and Islamic fanaticism. Aside from their faith in totalitarianism, these two ideas have only one thing in common—a shared abhorrence of democratic freedoms. These terrorists are not blowing people up because they are on some sort of homicidal joyride. They blow people up because they expect, over time, to replace liberal systems of government and society with illiberal systems.

Now you would think that for all their freewheeling contentiousness, Western elites dealing with the terrorist phenomenon could at least agree on who the good guys and bad guys are. But in fact, the modern terrorist is assaulting a Western world that is very much unsure of the essential superiority or even goodness of its own system.

Let me repeat that, because if there is any problem with the radical Democrats who increasingly control the House, it is the fact that they literally fit this phrase: "The modern terrorist is assaulting a Western World that is very much unsure of the essential superiority or even goodness of its own system."

I am confident that America is a country that deserves to be free and that freedom is worth doing something about. I am confident that living in a safe neighborhood is worth having the FBI find corrupt Congressmen and, in fact, I think it is worth having the FBI find drug dealers who are putting our children in touch and making them addicted to drugs.

I think freedom is something worth defending because I am confident that life in America is that much better than life in Iran or life in Cuba or life in the Soviet Union or life in a Communist-dominated colony in Nicaragua.

But let me continue:

Outside of France, many European intellectuals, typified by West Germany's Gunter Grass, argue that there is little moral difference between the foreign policies of the U.S. and the Soviet Union. Western political writers still compare U.S. actions in Grenada to what the Russians are doing in Afghanistan.

Let me stop and say again not only are Western political writers comparing U.S. actions in Grenada, but on day after day in case after case, radical Democrats in this House compare the U.S. liberation of Grenada with tremendous regard for saving lives with the brutal, vicious, harsh, ruthless Soviet assault on Afghanistan which Morton Kondracke just yesterday wrote brilliantly about.

When you read what a liberal writer like Morton Kondracke says about the Soviet deliberate use, for example, for toys that are terrorists bombs to blow off children's hands and arms, and this is Morton Kondracke, a liberal who writes in The New Republic, not NEWT GINGRICH, a conservative who says this, when you look at the Soviets in Afghanistan and compare it either to our efforts in South America or Grenada you can only be struck with the savage unreality of comparing what the United States did in Grenada with the Soviets.

Let me continue:

American-educated priests across Latin America preach Marxism and then have to explain away their students' tendency to spend years blowing up the nation.

Let me go back and cite for just a moment something which was said in the pastoral letter in reconciliation from the Nicaraguan bishops this Easter. It is very important. Across America there are radical ministers and liberal ministers who, frankly, have become, I think have fallen for the radical line. And this is what the Nicaraguan bishops of the Catholic Church in Nicaragua just this last few weeks said:

One, albeit small, sector of our church, has abandoned ecclesiastical unity and surrendered to the tenets of materialistic ideology. This sector sows confusion inside and outside Nicaragua through a campaign extolling its own ideas and defaming the legitimate pastors and the faithful who follow them. Censorship of the media makes it impossible to clarify the positions and offer other points of view.

In other words, what the Nicaraguan bishops are saying to us, the leaders of the Catholic Church in Nicaragua, is that the Communist Government of Nicaragua censors the press and that pro-Communist members of the church spread what are essentially falsehoods. And the next time you have a minister tell you how we should get out of Nicaragua and we should get out of El Salvador, ask them whether they have read the pastoral letter form the Nicaraguan bishops and why they would oppose people who represent the legitimate church and are there.

But let me go on:

In a letter to this paper, Rep. Jim Wright approves of efforts to help El Salvador but denounces "externally supported terrorism against the government of Nicaragua," apparently equating planting acoustical mines in harbors handling Soviet military shipments with shooting the pope or spraying a London street with machine-gun fire.

We would like to be able to think the Reagan administration's legislative campaign against terrorism might deter the anti-Western activities of Col. Qadhafi, the Soviet Union, North Korea, Bulgaria and Iran. But if more of our political leaders and intellectuals don't start showing a better understanding of the basic reason for resisting Marxist and Islamic terrorism, the West will some day need a lot more help than it's going to get from four new anti-terrorism laws.

Let me put this back in the context of the U.S. House of Representatives. Next week we are going to take up this amendment, the Fascell-Moakly amendment, which is in effect the unilateral disarmament amendment for Central America. It does just about everything bad you could do to fighting for freedom and trying to protect freedom in Central America.

It fits precisely the world view that thinks the United States is the same as the Soviet Union; that thinks that somehow there is never a good reason to defend freedom, precisely the attitudes the Wall Street Journal talked about today in its editoral entitled "Terrorism in the West."

Furthermore, one of the major consequences of the Fascell-Moakly amendment is going to be a dramatic increase in the number of refugees who come to America. But this has already been provided for.

H.R. 4447, House of Representatives bill No. 4447, "to provide for the temporary suspension of deportation for certain aliens who are nationals of El Salvador and to provide for Presidential and congressional review of conditions in El Salvador and for other purposes," introduced back on November 19, 1983.

What does this bill do? I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WALKER. I appreciate the gentleman yielding.

Do I understand correctly what the gentleman is saying is that if we enact the Fascell-Moakley amendment that is going to be before us next week, what we will do is unilaterally disarm in Central America, we will turn over large portions of Central America, possibly, to Communist domination, which will result in a wave of refugees headed north into the United States?

Some people predicted it could be as many as 11 million refugees. Then what we have is a bill that has been introduced that would legalize all of those refugees; almost doubling the number of people today that are classified today as illegal aliens; we are going to legalize those with the bill being introduced.

Mr. GINGRICH. My understanding is that the bill introduced by one of the two gentleman cosponsoring the amendment to cripple us in Central America is a very clear bill; which as I read it clearly would legalize the 500,000 El Salvadoran nationals who are already here and would set the base, I would think, for legalizing the 13 million or so refugees we can expect if Central America and Mexico go Communist.

So this bill sort of creates the framework for the United States to absorb I think between 13 and 15 million refugees over the next 10 years.

I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WALKER. So in other words, our refusal to put money into the defense of freedom in Central America will result in enormous costs to this country, both in terms of an increased unemployment rate because obviously those people are going to come here without jobs; and we do not have the capacity in our economy at the present time to absorb them into the labor market, and which means that if they are legalized under the kind of bill that is contemplated here, that we would have to pay them welfare benefits as well.

Mr. GINGRICH. I think the gentleman is right. We have to figure that if in fact the Fascell-Moakley amendment passes and we unilaterally disarm in Central America, making it impossible to stop communism, because human beings love freedom, we can expect—and I should explain to the gentleman from Pennsylvania how I arrive at these figures; so anyone listening will understand these are not just made up.

The number of refugees from communism in Afghanistan is about 16 percent of the population of Afghanistan. They do not have places as nice as Los Angeles, El Paso, San Antonio, and Phoenix to go to; they are going into refugee camps in Pakistan.

Even so, in order to get away from communism, 16 percent of the population of Afghanistan has fled.

The figures for Cuba were around 10 percent; but in Cuba you have to get on a boat and cross 90 miles of water. The thing people do not realize about Central America is that it is only 2 days ride by car from El Salvador to the Texas border; that in fact El Salvador is closer to Miami than Miami is to Washington, DC.

So my guess, basically all we did was take the Afghanistan numbers; about 16 percent, though I think it would be higher because the United States is a more desirable place to flee to than is Pakistan; my guess is if you take those figures and apply them to the current populations of Central America and Mexico and you understand we have clearly, we have the statement of the Nicaraguans and the statements of the guerrillas in El Salvador, that they are fighting for all of Central America; this is not a national war; that is war for control of the region; then I think you have to count on the same percentage of refugees coming to the United States as a minimum; our base line figure and the base line figure I arrive at is something on the order of 13 million, 12.8 million people.

I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WALKER. And that is a figure which is somewhat equal to the figure of illegal aliens that are now in the United States which we have been wrestling with around here for some years now, not knowing what to do with that number.

Mr. GINGRICH. That is correct.

Mr. WALKER. So we would almost overnight double the figure of illegal aliens that we have already been wrestling with?

Mr. GINGRICH. I think that is probably about right. I think you have to go a step further and say to yourself, that means we have to create 15 million additional jobs over and above the jobs we need to employ the people who are already here who want to work. So it is potentially an enormous problem, a problem of tremendous proportions.

And as I said, House of Representatives H.R. 4447 is a bill which would permit them to stay in the United States. But it goes beyond that. As the gentleman started to talk about welfare, I think frankly we should not expect people to live badly. But this bill would direct the President to report to the Congress how many refugees there are; and let me read the rest of this because I think everybody in America has been down this road before; also the President should report the living conditions of such persons with particular attention to their personal safety and availability of food and medical assistance.

What does that mean? That means that the U.S. Government should provide all the medical care they need; all the food they need; all the housing they need.

Let us go on: "The resources available for humanitarian assistance, including the methods and policies respecting distribution of such assistance and obstacles which may prevent the efficient and equitable distribution of such assistance."

In other words, more bureaucracy, more welfare workers, more delivery systems, more money. "Furthermore, steps that can be taken to improve the status of such persons."

What does that mean? More special education, more special training, more costs. Furthermore, it goes on to suggest that we should not only be concerned about the Salvadorans who are living here but we should also look at the number of Salvadorans living in Honduras, Guatemala, and Mexico, and report how much foreign aid we need to give to those three countries to take care of the additional refuges.

So in addition, during the transition when those countries will be collapsing, which they will if we keep losing the war in Central America, then we will see even more effort involved.

Let me go on and say that we have to confront the fact that there is already in the radical wing of the Democratic Party a willingness to accept refugees in enormous numbers and they are already putting bills in that would make that happen.

But let us look for a moment at the Fascell-Moakley amendment and why I would say it is unilateral disarmament. What does it do? It is interesting the words they use. It prohibits President's use of section 506, defensive equipment drawdown authority; it prohibits use of section 21(d) delayed billing authority; restricts use of section 614 authority to waive other prohibitions.

Notice the first three operative words; prohibits, prohibits, restricts.

But let me go on. It restricts the number of U.S. military advisers broadly defined in El Salvador. It has restrictive conditions on all aid. It allows the second payment only if Congress adopts another joint resolution. It prohibits joint military operations in Honduras and Guatemala. It restricts the number of U.S. military in Honduras, prohibits the use of U.S. military in Guatemala, limits military aid to Honduras, prohibits credits and guaranteed loans to Honduras, prohibits military aid and sales to Guatemala.

Let me just read the words. Notice what the Wall Street Journal was talking about. We face a world crisis. Almost every American has seen the film from London of this policewoman who was killed standing there on a peaceful street in a great city.

We have seen how bad it is. Everyone who walks into the Capitol to vote, walks right by pillars that have been built, concrete, just to stop trucks from running into the Capitol and setting off a bomb.

In the middle of a dangerous world, are we authorizing the President to make America safe? Are we authorizing the President to do w'ıat it takes in Central America to preserve freedom and allow people to live in their own country in freedom?

No. These are the code words; prohibits, prohibits; restricts; restrictive; restricts; prohibits; restricts; prohibits; limits; prohibits; prohibits.

In other words, what we are saying, what the radical Democrats are saying is that the United States should be totally handicapped in its ability to act, should be totally tied up, should have its hands locked; should have no capacity to act and this is in a region, let me remind you, where there are 55 American advisers in El Salvador, and there are close to 3,500 Cuban and Soviet advisers in Nicaragua.

□ 2010

This is a region where the Soviets alone are sending $114 million in military aid to Nicaragua in the form of equipment. This is in a region where the Soviets are engaged in $300 million in military construction in over 40 bases in Nicaragua.

Faced with that crisis, faced with the fact that the only tanks in Central America are Soviet tanks in Nicaragua, there are three battalions of them and tanks are an offensive weapon, what is the response of the radical Democrats?

Their response is to restrict and disarm and cripple the United States. And they have already prepared a bill to accept the refugees once we guarantee by the collapse of our will in Central America that the refugees are coming.

A recent analysis tells us a lot about this. It is an analysis by Frank Grigorski, the editor of the Republican Study Committee bulletin in the April 30 edition in an article entitled "American Foreign Policy and the Crisis of Democratic Party Incompetence." He said the following thing. I want to quote Mr. Grigorski because I think it is an exactly accurate statement of what is happening with the radical wing of the Democratic Party.

He goes on to say:

What is really fascinating about this letter, about House debates on Central America since Reagan became President and indeed about so many foreign policy comments by so many Democrats since 1974 is the implied world view of the Democratic Party. Since August, the Republican Study Committee has collected Democratic commentary on Southeast Asia, Angola, Nicaragua, Granada, and El Salvador. We have compared predictions with results and sifted through dozens of statements to derive the unifying themes. We found a way of viewing the world that is simplistic, defeatist and simply not competent when applied to the dangers the U.S. faces. Here are its five elements stated as postulates.

These are the views of the radical Democratic world view which I think is characterized in the Fascell-Moakley amendment, which is characterized by the bill to admit more refugees, which is characterized by the actions that we have seen day after day here on the House floor. This is the radical Democratic world view as described by Mr. Frank Grigorski.

1. There are no evil ideologies or governing systems in the world except apartheid. Communists are at heart are reformers who are too rough in their tactics. They are not inherently bad, but the U.S. is so clumsy in its dealing with communist forces that we facilitate or give them excuses for their excesses.

2. Left wing extremism is caused by a right wing tyranny and the U.S. makes both worse. We finance rightist forces and make the leftist ones worse by not competing with the Soviets to finance them. There is always hope that Cuba, Nicaragua, Vietnam, et cetera, will behave if only we treat them as sincere nations run by people not too different from us.

3. Foreign policy conflicts get worse when America intervenes. The lesson of Vietnam is the United States cannot impose its will anywhere. And what Presidents call "vital interests" usually are not worth fighting for. To ease world tension the United States should keep a low profile wherever it wants to maintain influence.

4. Military force is proper only to defend the United States and perhaps a few democratic allies against an attack already underway. But threatening force to prevent a feared attack is always too risky. Force never really settles anything, and if it does, it should not.

5. Political negotiations and military force have nothering to do with each other. Klauswitz was wrong. Conservative Presidents who subsidize or threaten force prove they are not serious about negotiations. Liberal Democrats and peace activists who forswear force make better negotiators because the other side knows they are sympathetic. These postulates are blandly stated, but they still seem astounding. They are the unifying themes in Democratic analysis including the Carter administration thinking right up to Afghanistan, of world hot spots where Communist forces are a major factor.

The study the NRSC is doing will argue that it is time to stop challenging or seeming to challenge the patriotism of Democrats and liberals. Enough historical evidence exists. Their cut-and-run formula having been tried enough places that the question for 1984 can be one of the competence. Simply put: Can you trust the Democrats to safeguard U.S. interests in a dangerous world? If they keep saying romantic things about people who despise America, can they tell who our friends are and who are enemies are? The evidence is they can't.

Now that is from Mr. Frank Grigorski, who is the editor of the Republican Study Committee bulletin and clearly a partisan.

Therefore, it was with some surprise that I found today the following editorial in the Wall Street Journal entitled, "The Newest Gary Hart." This Wall Street Journal editorial, I think you will agree, says the same thing about one of the two leading candidates for the Democratic nomination. It says in effect radical Democrats—and they are now the dominate Democrats, the George McGovern Democrats have decisively defeated the John F. Kennedy wing of the Democratic Party—radical Democrats literally cannot figure out what is going on.

From the Wall Street Journal entitled "The Newest Gary Hart":

Voters in the Democratic caususes in primaries yet to be held will now have a choice of four instead of three candidates. There will be Walter Mondale, Jesse Jackson, Gary Hart the dove, and Gary Hart the hawk. Gary Hart the hawk emerged at Texas A&M Monday bidding for the 169 delegates to be selected at the Texas Democratic Precinct caucuses Saturday. He dredged up the days of shame of the Carter-Mondale Administration when Americans felt helpless outrage over the holding of U.S. hostages in Iran.

Having thus dispatched Mr. Mondale, Mr. Hart did a number on Ronald Reagan for the fiasco in Lebanon. Then he launched into his coda.

This is quoting GARY HART:

As President I will not hesitate to use force when vital American interests are threatened, but I will not hazard American lives where our purpose is unclear, our goals unattainable, or negotiations have been left untried.

Let me go on to quote from the Wall Street Journal:

What kind of real world situation would meet Gary Hart's criteria for bold action is not answered. Would he have nuked the Ayatollah? But at least it has a hawkish sound. Contrast the melody with Gary Hart the dove. On a television panel just before his ill-fated outing in the New York primary April 3rd, quoting Gary Hart. "I would end military assistance to the El Salvador Government immediately and only resume it if and when the death squads were ended. That is not withdrawal."

The Wall Street Journal went on to argue:

Voters in Texas like the voters in New York probably won't overtax themselves seeking the real Gary Hart. To the extent they do, they will probably go by the one specific thing he said in the above foreign policy pronouncement that he would jerk the rug out from under El Salvador. In other words, he proposes to back away from El Salvador's elected government the way Jimmy Carter backed away from the Shah of Iran. The hostage crisis that Mr. Hart so glibly pins on Walter Mondale followed from just such a show of weakness and moral doubt. The Shah, too pro-American to suit his Soviet neighbors, was being portrayed as a tyrant by the American left, generating political pressure on Mr. Carter.

Similarly Mr. Hart has fallen for the death squad propaganda being used by American leftists against not only El Salvador's right wing terrorists, but against its government and people.

The interesting thing is that there is even less justification for the Hart position in Central America than there was for Mr. Carter's position in Iran, given the low state of U.S. intelligence gathering at the time.

Let me make a comment here because the Wall Street Journal frankly could have made a stronger point. It was the radical Democrats in this House who gutted the Central Intelligence Agency, who crippled our intelligence capacity, who stopped us from helping freedom in Africa, and who then turned and complained because the Central Intelligence Agency they had crippled did not do its job, when it was the radical Democrats who crippled it.

Let me continue with the Wall Street Journal:

Given the low state of U.S. intelligence gathering at the time, Mr. Carter had some excuse for not knowing that the Ayatollah and his followers were blood-thirsty maniacs. There was also some question whether the Shah could have controlled them, even with U.S. support.

Central America, however, is known to be under attack from the Soviet Union, a well known force that seeks well known results, primarily the weakening of U.S. power and influence in the world. The attack could be defeated with a little more backbone among Mr. Hart's Senate and House colleagues.

□ 2020

Let me repeat that one key word so that Members of the House will understand it was not me but the Wall Street Journal that suggested "the attack could be defeated with a little more backbone among Mr. HART's Senate and House colleagues."

The Wall Street Journal goes on to say:

Mr. Hart would use force some day, somewhere, but not where it would make a difference today. Gary Hart the dove wants to pull out of the Central American fight. Gary Hart the hawk would be a tough guy, providing our purposes are clear. Gary Hart the hawk we think has entered the campaign too late. Gary Hart the dove got there first.

Now, let me make a very clear statement here, by closing the quote in the Wall Street Journal. Radical Democrats never want to be tough anywhere that is real. There is always good reason. Either the regime is too pro-American, the regime has too narrow a basis of support, the regime is too violent, the regime is too distant, it is as though they borrowed Neville Chamberlain's code book on Czechoslovakia. There is always some reason why that is a distant country about which we know little.

Now, the distant country in the case of El Salvador, as I said, is 2 days' drive from Texas. There are already 500,000 El Salvadorans in America. The number of El Salvadorans in Los Angeles alone is enough that it would be the second largest city in El Salvador after the capital. And yet we are not sure. In fact, as I said, the Fascell and Moakley amendment would clearly be a unilateral disarmament amendment that would cripple our capacity to survive.

But are our purposes clear? After all, Mr. Hart has said he would do something if our purposes were clear.

Let me read briefly from the U.S. Department of State, January 19, 1984, what the United States seeks from Nicaragua. Four points.

"To remove any possible ambiguity, let me say again what these measures are."

This is an address by Langhorne Motley, Assistant Secretary for Inter-American Affairs:

The establishment of a genuinely democratic regime, a definitive end to Nicragaua's support for guerrilla insurgencies and terrorism, severance with Nicaraguan military security ties to Cuba and the Soviet Bloc, and reductions in Nicaraguan military strength to levels that would restore military balance between Nicaragua and its neighbors.

Now, Mr. Motley, speaking for the State Department, raises four issues. Are we for a genuinely democratic regime? The Reagan administration is. The radical Democrats think it is not worth worrying about.

Are we for a definitive end to Nicaragua's support for guerrillas in Honduras, in Costa Rica, in Guatemala, in El Salvador? The Reagan administration is. The radical Democrats do not think it is worth worrying about.

Do we want Nicaragua to stop having a military alliance, a military relationship, with Communist Cuba and Communist Russia? The Reagan administration does. The radical Democrats do not think it is worth the effort.

Finally, and this is something most Americans do not realize, the Nicaraguan Communist army is now larger than all of the other armies in Central America combined.

They are, in effect, the Nazi Germany of Central America, an incredibly powerful country compared to all of the other countries. If you add up Guatemala, El Salvador, Honduras, and Costa Rica together, they are weaker in military force than Nicaragua.

Should there be some balance of power? The Reagan administration thinks there should. The radical Democrats do not think it is worth worrying about.

Why are we worried about the Communist Government of Nicaragua? And you will notice I do not talk about the Sandinistas, and I want to explain why.

There was once a Sandinista government. It was established on July 19, 1979, as the government of national reconstruction, formed in exile as a coalition of both Communist and civic leaders. It had five members running it as a junta or a committee. Slowly, systematically it changed.

Originally, on July 19, 1979, in the Declaration of San Jose, the government of national reconstruction promised a democratically elected government and a fair, pluralistic society. It was widely supported. Freedom of speech, freedom of press, freedom of religion, freedom of assembly were guaranteed by the Declaration of San Jose.

Gradually, over time, that free Sandinista government was destroyed.

The Government of Nicaragua today is not the Sandinista government and, in fact, in April 1980, less than a year after the Declaration of San Jose, the Sandinista government was killed, for on that date in April 1980, the two non-Communist members of the five-member committee resigned.

What has happened since April 1980 is that the Communists have systematically increased their power.

Examples: In March 1982, the Communists imposed a state of emergency, severely limiting dissent and establishing prior censorship of the news media. The newly rejuvenated judiciary is now a Communist judiciary. Several thousands political prisoners remain in prison awaiting trial after 2 years. For 2 years they have been imprisoned by the Communist government. Do any radical Democrats complain? Is there any demonstration in the streets for the political prisoners of a Communist government? Not at all.

The fact is that the Communist Government of Nicaragua is antireligion, antifreedom, and anti-American. The national anthem of the Communist Government of Nicaragua talks about the United States as the worst enemy of mankind.

But let me go on. Let me quote about that government from a statement from Secretary of State Shultz on March 15. This is a letter in a report to Congress. Let me quote about how bad this government has become:

> The Nicaraguan government's tentative moves in the domestic front have lacked substance. The amnesty program for the Miskito Indians was ill-received by the Miskito people, 1,200 of whom fled to Honduras in December 1983, claiming mistreatment and torture by Nicaraguan authorities.

Let me ask again: Do any radical Democrats get up and complain? Is there any sense of outrage about how horrible it is that the Communist government is torturing Miskito Indians? Not a word.

Let me go on:

> Although the Sandinistas—

And I think it should read Marxist—> finally announced a date for elections, a first step to potentially fulfilling its 1979 pledge to the Organization of American States, the Nicaraguan opposition remains convinced that the Nicaraguan electoral system now being devised will not permit a true contest for power to occur.

It goes on to say:

> Sandinista leaders have said that armed opposition leaders will not be allowed to run for office, and it now appears possible that the state of emergency in effect since March of 1982 will not be lifted for a long enough period to allow the opposition a fair chance to compete. A possible clue as to the type of election planned by the Sandinistas came from a comment of Minister of Planning Henry Ruiz on February 3, 1984, when he said the Nicaraguan people had a right to "pluralism but with a Sandinista hegemony."

Now, if you replace the word "Sandinista," which I think is just a State Department stupidity, with the correct word "Communist," what Ruis is saying is that, "Oh, they can have a vote as long as we win."

Now, is this a new thing to us? Is it a surprise to us to see the Communists take over? Well, let me think.

In 1917, the Communists used this same technique in Russia. In the late 1940's they used this exact technique in Eastern Europe. In 1959, they used this exact same technique in Cuba. And, in fact, Fidel Castro has been quoted explaining the technique. And yet it surprises the radical Democrats when once again a Communist government knocks out the free citizens and imposes a dictatorship.

But let me quote again from Shultz:

> Meanwhile, the Nicaraguan government periodically offers vivid reminders that despite occasional relaxation, press censorship remains very much in effect. New crackdowns led the independent newspaper La Prenza not to publish on three occasions in January and February of 1984. Nor has the government relaxed its control over news programing by the remaining independent radio stations.

In other words, this is a Communist government. It is a dictatorship. It censors the press, it censors the radio, it is against the church, it oppresses political leaders, it has 2,000 political prisoners, and yet the radical Democrats do not think it is worth worrying about.

Well, if we do not necessarily want to believe the Secretary of State of the United States, what about the Kissinger Commission, a bipartisan commission that included a former chairman of the Democratic National Party?

I quote again from Secretary Shultz:

> It is worth noting that 10 of the 12 members of the national bipartisan Commission on Central America chaired by former Secretary of State Kissinger concluded: "We do not believe it would be wise to dismantle existing incentives and pressures on the Managua regime except in conjunction with demonstrable progress on the negotiating front."

What does that mean? It means that the Fascell-Moakley unilateral disarmament amendment is exactly the opposite of the Kissinger commission, that when we brought together 12 national experts, Democrats and Republicans, and they looked at what was going on in a Communist colony, the country increasingly taken over by the Cubans and the Soviets with their local front people, the Nicaraguan Communists, the Kissinger commission said, "You've got to put pressure on them."

But yet what did the Speaker of the House say, as I quoted earlier? The Speaker of the House does not want to put pressure on them. He said,

> I am opposed to funding for guerrillas in Nicaragua all the way. Nicaragua is not going to get through this House.

Now, we have GARY HART saying he would sure like to be for something if the principles are clear, we have the U.S. Government making the principles clear, GARY HART does not get the message. We have the Kissinger Commission saying you have got to put pressure on the Nicaraguan Communists, the Speaker does not get the message.

Well, let us not just trust the Reagan administration. Why do we not go back to the bishops, the bishops of the Catholic Church in Nicaragua in their Easter statement? And what do they say?

From the bishops, last week:

> Our country too is plagued by a beligerent situation pitting Nicaraguan against Nicaraguan and the consequences of this situation could not be sadder. Many Nicaraguan youths and men are dying on the battlefields. Many others look toward the future with the fear of seeing their own lives prematurely ended. A materialistic and atheistic educational system is undermining the consciences of our children. Many families are divided by political differences. The suffering of mothers who have lost their children which should merit our great respect, is instead exploited to incite hatred and feed the desire for vengeance. Farm workers and Indians, for whom the church reserves a special love are suffering, living in constant anxiety and many of them are forced to abandon their homes in search of a peace and tranquility that they do not find.
> Some of the mass media using the language of hate, encourage a spirit of violence.

The bishops went on to say, well, let me stop for a second before I go on and say that one of the radical Democrat arguments is, Oh, it is all the United States fault. If only we were not pressuring the Nicaraguans. Let me say first of all that when the Nicaraguan Sandinistas took over, the United States provided more aid to Nicaragua than we have provided so Somoza, the dictator, in 20 years. In a brief period we have provided millions of dollars and the Communists knocked out the free Sandinistas and imposed a Communist government. The next time you hear a radical Democrat or for that matter a radical minister tell you, well they would not be so bad if it were not for the United States putting pressure on them, quote to them from the bishops, the Catholic bishops in Nicaragua at Easter, who said, "It is dishonest to constantly blame internal aggression and violence on foreign aggression."

Let me repeat this because notice how powerful a word they use. The Catholic bishops of Nicaragua say, that when somebody tells you it is all the United States fault, that if we were not putting pressure on them there would not be a dictatorship; that there would not be Communists in Managua if we were not responsible. This is what the Catholic bishops in Nicaragua said:

> It is dishonest to constantly blame internal aggression and violence and foreign aggression. It is useless to blame the evil past for everything without recognizing the problems of the present. All Nicaraguans, inside and outside the country must participate in this dialogue regardless of ideology, class or partisan belief; furthermore we think that Nicaraguans who have taken up arms against the government must also participate in this dialogue. If not, there will be no possibility of a settlement, and our people, especially the poorest among them, will continue to suffer and die.

Now, let me remind you those quotes are from the Nicaraguan Catholic bishops in a Communist country and they were attacked by the government for what I read you. The government savaged them; called it a criminal statement. The government has had mobs that it has organized to beat up Catholic priests; to threaten the Catholic bishops.

This is the standard, precise Communist pattern which we have seen in Poland, in Hungary, in Romania, in the Soviet Union, in East Germany, in Czechoslovakia, in Cuba, in North Vietnam, in North Korea, and one has to ask the question: Will we never learn.

Let me close with this summary: Yesterday, in deciding to oppose the Federal Bureau of Investigation rather than to root out corrupt Congressmen, in deciding to vote to allow Soviet slave labor imports in the United States, rather than to stop it; in deciding to kill any effort to provide aid to the freedom fighters in Central America, the radical Democrats in this House proved that they still have power in this House.

The people of the United States face a real choice. There is already a bill in this House which would allow a half-million refugees to come to America and be legalized. If we fail in El Salvador, if we fail in Nicaragua, if communism takes over Central America, we can expect to have 13 million or more refugees in the United States before 1990. That is approximately 6 percent of the population of the United States.

Sit down for a moment this evening, I hope every Member will do this, and figure out what that means for your neighborhood. Now, of course we know that California and Texas and Arizona and New Mexico will get more than their fair share of refugees. But let us say for a minute that we were going to be fair; that we have learned the lesson from the Cuban boat people back in 1979, under Jimmy Carter, when we had a total disaster and we had a crisis of what to do with all the refugees, and certainly everyone in south Florida can report what it is like to have a sudden crisis without planning.

Let us say that we can expect 6 percent of the population of the United States in refugees by 1990. That means for the average Congressman we can expect something on the order of 33,000 refugees in our district. But every American citizen should just take the population of their town or their country and multiply it by 6 percent. That means for the city of Atlanta, which has about a half-million people, that Atlanta's share will be about 29,500 refugees in Atlanta.

What are we going to do? As the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER) said earlier, are we going to find enough jobs? Are they all going to be on welfare? Now some people say I am raising a false alarm, but let us look at the lessons of history. Every time Communists take over, everyone who can runs away.

People ran away to Western Europe from East Germany, from Poland. There is now a Polish engineer in my hometown of Carrollton, who fled recently during the Solidarity fight. There are 2,500 Laotians in my district in Clayton County who fled from communism. There are today, there is a Vietnamese restaurant in my district; people who fled communism. Will we never learn?

So, I would simply say to you, the choice for the American people is simple: If the American people allow the radical Democrats to cut off aid to the freedom fighters; if the American people allow the radical Democrats to continue this process; if the American people allow the radical Democrats to prepare for the refugees, then when the American people have 6 percent more folks in their neighborhood; 6 percent more folks in their town; 6 percent more folks in their county, it will be the American people who permitted it; because in the end, this House does nothing without the permission of the American people. That is why tonight I wanted to tie together the radical world view as it relates to crime, to refugees, to tyranny, and to communism and to say that next week we are going to have one of the most important votes in modern American history; a vote which may well decide the fate of freedom in Central America.

BANK FEES SHOULD BE KEPT IN CHECK

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, the House Banking Committee study on bank fees contains some shocking statistics on fees currently being charged throughout our Nation. As I predicted when bank deregulation was first discussed in the House, prices on service items have increased dramatically. Due to deregulation, banks are now free to charge astonishingly high rates to bank customers. And as I alone forecast, the new charges on basic bank services are undercutting any benefit the consumer might have gained from the proliferation of new accounts and savings plans.

From 1979 to the present, the average cost of bouncing a check has increased a whopping 87 precent. The charges soared from an average of $5.07 in 1979 to $9.49 in 1983. In some cities, current fees range from $17.50 to $30 for a single bounced instrument. These charges are outrageous. The actual cost to the bank for handling a bounced check is usually under 40 cents. While some penalty for a bounced check may be understandably imposed upon a customer as a deterrent, the charge should bear some relationship to the severity of the customer's error and the cost to the bank.

In the past I have warned against possible high fees brought on by deregulation of the banking industry. I anticipated that the advantages of high interest rates and money market accounts would be countered by banks which would set their fees at unjustifiable levels. Regrettably, I proved correct in my assessment of the situation. And the consumer is forced to pay for the Congress mistake. Banks should never have been afforded the opportunity to assess these high service fees. As I argued then, we should have respected that old adage, "If it ain't broke, don't fix it." The proposal that increased competition among banks would benefit consumers was totally off the mark, while my fears were right on target.

Low or no cost bank services have virtually disappeared with the onset of deregulation. Before Congress interfered with the banking structure, many banks offered free services to the consumer. Today, only 5 percent of American banks offer unrestricted free checking, and only about 50 percent allow consumers to maintain savings accounts without meeting specified minimum balance requirements. Many banks currently adhere to a rigid system which charges the customer for every bank service performed, including responding to balance inquiries and aiding checkbook reconciliation. This terrible situation is one that I alone battled to prevent.

According to the committee study, basic banking service cost the average household more than $180 last year, double the cost 4 years before. Some banks have already raised their prices to unbelieveable levels. One bank in the District of Columbia charges up to $675 to rent a safety deposit box. At that fee, the rent is probably higher than the value of the goods placed within.

Ironically, the rise in bank fees comes at a point in time when bank costs are actually decreasing. Increased computerization of accounts has made account access less expensive and less time consuming. But the rise in bank fees is unrelated to the cost of providing service. When deregulation occurred, banks raised the rates on interest bearing accounts in order to remain competitive with money market funds. Because banks now pay their highest interest rate on approximately two-thirds of all deposits, banks are using service fee profits to recoup some of the interest paid out to depositors. I warned against just this type of bank reaction to deregulation. I saw this coming, yet the Congress, in the rush to deregulate, did not.

As it stands, the situation is certainly unfair to consumers. Banks are attracting customers with high interest accounts, and then nickel and diming them to death. Banks' noninterest income is now at an amazing average high of almost 25 percent, and climbing steadily. Bank fees are rising. The net effect on the consumer equals confusion and misunderstanding. By being charged exorbitant prices for every transaction, the consumer who thinks he is earning a good return on his money finds his profit dwindling away. I am appalled that any bank would profit off the good will of the consumer in this manner, and I deeply regret that the Congress did not follow my repeated warnings.●

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I was unavoidably absent yesterday for rollcall No. 109, the final passage of the School Lunch and Child Nutrition Amendments of 1984. I am a supporter of this bill, as it will restore some of the funds cut from the child nutrition programs since 1981 and will increase authorizations for the successful WIC program. I would like the record to reflect that had I been present I would have voted "Aye."●

A MAJOR-LEAGUE TALENT WHO STAYED HOME

(Mr. HORTON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, today I want to place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a tribute, published in the Rochester Times-Union, to a man I consider to be among the truly outstanding sportswriters in the United States and a personal friend for years—George Beahon. George is an institution in Rochester and upstate New York. His sharp writing style and sports commentary have won him praise and recognition from writers across the country.

Rochesterians love sports and George Beahon is our city's spokesman, whether it be baseball, basketball, horse racing, football, or hockey. It was a great pleasure for me personally to work with George during my tenure as president of the Rochester Red Wings—our city's outstanding International League baseball team.

George, we are going to miss you. You have been an integral part of our city's life for more than 40 years. I know that Rochester and upstate residents everywhere join in wishing you well.

Mr. Speaker, at this time, I would like to enter into the RECORD an article published in the Times-Union highlighting George's career:

A MAJOR-LEAGUE TALENT WHO STAYED HOME

(By Bob Matthews)

That's as far as George goes.

George Beahon, the dean of Rochester's sportswriters, is retiring from the Times-Union as of tomorrow.

"I've lived in the fast lane for a lot of years and I want to slow down," says Beahon.

"I'm going to lower my golf handicap from 26 to 25 and spend more time with my grandchildren. I might even cut the grass myself instead of paying the kid across the street."

Fortunately for his thousands of devoted fans (including this one), George will continue his weekly sports column for Rochester magazine after a well-deserved vacation. His next column will appear in about a month.

Beahon, 63, has been reporting local and national sports for Rochester newspapers or TV stations (WOKR-TV), Channel 13 and WROC-TV, Channel 8) since 1941.

He has covered every major sporting event, including 20 World Series, the Super Bowl, the Indy 500, the Kentucky Derby and The Masters. He used to spend more time on the road than in Rochester.

"I wasn't home for the births of three of my four kids," he says.

But Beahon wouldn't have had it any other way.

"Not many people are fortunate enough to get paid for doing something they enjoy so much they'd probably do it for free," he says.

Besides, the event he says he most enjoyed covering was baseball spring training. When that was over he generally took two weeks off and vacationed in Florida with his family.

Beahon's only professional regret was leaving the Democrat & Chronicle in 1969 for a two-year stint as publicity director at Finger Lakes Race Track and two more years of free-lance work.

"Leaving the paper was a snap decision and the next four years were not personally gratifying," he says. "Getting into TV in 1973 (Channel 13) revived me."

Beahon was at Channel 13 for four years and Channel 8 for two years. Admittedly "not just another pretty face," George made his mark with well-written commentaries and his sign-off trademark, "That's as far as I go."

Beahon often was described as "the Howard Cosell of Rochester," and he didn't object to the label. "I respect Cosell," George has said. "And I'd like to have one-tenth of his money."

Channel 13 news anchor Dan Alhart recalls his four years working with Beahon: "We always felt good knowing George was on our team. I think it was good for the broadcasting industry to have a person on television because of what he knew and not because of how he looked or talked. George had sports credibility and the viewers recognized it."

Beahon was fired by both stations in controversial moves unpopular with a majority of his viewers and fellow workers.

He left Channel 13 when "Bowling for Dollars" went off the air and popular host Ron DeFrance returned to his former role as sportscaster. The station decided one full-time sportscaster was enough and DeFrance had seniority.

Channel 8 hired Beahon shortly after he was dumped by Channel 13. He was there for two years, then abruptly fired.

"I was a victim of the 'TV doctors,' " says George. "Some guys from out of town came in, watched a few newscasts, and decided I should be replaced."

The firings were bitter pills for George to swallow, but he recalls them with characteristic wit: "Bing Devine (baseball executive) once told me that every great man gets fired once. So when Channel 13 let me go, it didn't bother me.

"Channel 8 fired me at 2 p.m. If they had told me a few hours earlier, I could've played golf. It was a heckuva nice day."

George joined the Times-Union Dec. 3, 1979 and was the Press-Radio Club's Sportswriter of the Year in 1979 and 1980.

"I had a few other jobs, but I've always been a newspaperman at heart," he says.

"There is nothing more satisfying than to look at a story or column you've written, something you know is good. TV commentaries are all over in 60 seconds. Seeing your thoughts in print is a special feeling."

George has written thousands of columns (many under the banner In This Corner), many of them controversial. He was sued only once.

"A guy won a $15,000 Twin Double at Finger Lakes and he didn't want to pay $2 to get into the track the next day to pick up his check," Beahon recalls. "I wrote he was cheap and he sued for libel—$50,000 against me and $50,000 against Gannett.

"My good friend and boss, Al Neuharth, who is chairman and chief executive officer of Gannett Company Inc., called me and said, 'I've got my $50,000. Where's yours?' He was kidding. But we went to court and won. The judge agreed the guy was a cheapskate."

George was born and raised in Rochester, and from a very early age he knew he wasn't cut out to be a pro athlete.

"On a scale of 1 to 10 as an athlete. I was about a ½," he says. "I realized that if I wanted to be in sports I'd have to write about other people."

Beahon's first job was in an electronics shop in 1940. When a co-worker refused to tune in the World Series on the radio, George quit.

He joined the Times-Union as a full-time sportswriter in late 1941, enlisted in the Navy, then returned to a steady job with the Democrat and Chronicle when World War II ended.

He began covering the Red Wings home and away in 1946 and traveled with the National Basketball Association Royals during their peak years.

"The late 1940s and the early 1950s were the Glory Years for Rochester sports," he says. "That's when this really was an exceptional sports town.

"The Red Wings had some strong teams in a terrific league with cities like Montreal, Toronto and Baltimore. The Royals were among the NBA's top teams. Aquinas played the strongest prep football teams in the nation in a new stadium. We had all sorts of boxing. Sammy Urzetta won the U.S. Amateur Golf Championship in 1950. The Hickok Belt Dinner started the same year.

The Royals moved. Aquinas de-emphasized football. Boxing declined. The Hickok Belt became just another sports dinner.

The Glory Years are gone and Beahon knows it.

"Hockey is the shining light. This is a good hockey town," he says. "But the lack of Division I football or basketball hurts and I'm concerned about the future of the Red Wings.

"Baseball used to be a class act for Rochester, but that image has been tarnished. The proxy fight was shameful. Bill Farrell got shafted. The new board replaced more members in two years than the old board did in 10.

"Silver Stadium has lots of tradition, but you can't have a team unless you have a place to play, and how much longer will Silver be there?"

Red Wings fans hope Silver Stadium will be around for at least a few more decades, with George Beahon in the press box. That's where he belongs. The place wouldn't be quite the same without him.

He's a major-leaguer in a good minor-league town; a big-city talent who chose to stay home.

He'll be proud to know that a lot of his peers consider him to be "the Red Smith of Rochester."

TITLE III

SEC. 301(a). Each long-term firm power service contract entered into or amended subsequent to one year from the date of enactment of this Act by the Secretary of Energy acting by and through the Western Area Power Administration (hereinafter "Western"), shall contain an article requiring the development and implementation by the purchaser thereunder of an energy conservation program. A long-term firm power service contract is any contract for the sale by Western of firm capacity, with or without energy, which is to be delivered over a period of more than one year. The term "purchaser" includes parent-type entities and their distribution of user members. If more than one such contract exists with a purchaser, only one program will be required for that purchaser. Each such contract article shall:

(1) contain time schedules for meeting program goals and delineate actions to be taken in the event such schedules are not met, which may include a reduction of the allocation of capacity or energy to such purchaser as would otherwise be provided under such contract; and

(2) provide for review and modification of the energy conservation program at not to exceed five year intervals.

(b) For purposes of this Title, an energy conservation program shall:

(1) apply to all uses of energy and capacity which are provided from any federal project;

(2) contain definite goals;

(3) encourage customer consumption efficiency improvements and demand management practices which ensure that the available supply of hydroelectric power is used in an economically efficient and environmentally sound manner.

SEC. 302. (a) Within one year after the date of enactment of this Act, Western shall amend its existing regulations (46 Fed. Reg. 56140) to reflect—

(1) the elements to be considered in the energy conservation programs required by this Title, and

(2) Western's criteria for evaluating and approving such programs.

Such amended regulations shall be promulgated only after public notice and opportunity to comment in accordance with the Administrative Procedure Act (5 U.S.C. §§ 551-706).

(b) The following elements shall be considered by Western in evaluating energy conservation programs:

(1) energy consumption efficiency improvements;

(2) use of renewable energy resources in addition to hydroelectric power;

(3) load management techniques;

(4) cogeneration;

(5) rate design improvements, including:

(i) cost of service pricing;

(ii) elimination of declining block rates;

(iii) time of day rates;

(iv) seasonal rates; and

(v) interruptible rates; and

(6) production efficiency improvements.

(c) Where a purchaser is implementing one or more of the foregoing elements under a program responding to federal, state or other initiatives that apply to conservation and renewable energy development, in evaluating that purchaser's energy conservation program submitted pursuant to this Title Western shall make due allowance for the incorporation of such elements within the energy conservation program required by this Title.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

EX-AGENTS WESTERN REGIONAL CONFERENCE

HON. MICHAEL G. OXLEY
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. OXLEY. Mr. Speaker, as a former special agent for the Federal Bureau of Investigation, I would like to share with my collegues the remarks delivered last month at the Ex-Agents Western Regional Conference by another former agent, our colleague Mr. RUDD of Arizona. I believe Members will find the gentleman's remarks most enlightening.

REMARKS OF CONGRESSMAN ELDON RUDD TO THE EX-AGENTS WESTERN REGIONAL CONFERENCE

Gatherings such as this are cherished by all of us who remember with pride our service in the FBI.

We took an oath of office. We pledged our lives. We eagerly submitted to the discipline of duty.

We are drawn together. We are held together by something more than nostalgia. We are united by love of country, by reverence for decency and truth, and peace and honesty.

We do not gather here as warriors in a common cause anxious to revive the past. This association is more than a gathering of the old grads, an alumni meeting to revise past victories and renew that sense of fraternity which once bound us.

We may have retired from or left active service with the FBI but we have not retired from active participation in the affairs of the Republic—in the defense of freedom—in the proclamation of liberty—in the war against injustice—or in the struggle for truth.

We have survived an agonizing decade of constant assault on law enforcement in general, and on the Bureau and the intelligence gathering agencies of the United States in particular.

Under President Jimmy Carter the politicians, in a great frenzy of self-righteousness, succeeded in emasculating the CIA, the Bureau and most of the military intelligence organizations.

On two of the major television networks, NBC in a mini-series entitled "Kennedy" and ABC in an hour-long program entitled "J. Edgar Hoover," the networks presented a distorted, dishonest description of Mr. Hoover and the Bureau. As I reviewed these programs my anger turned to sadness. I was overwhelmed by a sense of frustration. How could it be? How could it be that those two major networks would resort to calumny? With all the artistry at their command, ABC and NBC pictured the Bureau as an almost terrorist organization.

Director John Edgar Hoover, the man who single-handedly elevated law enforcement to a professional status, was by innuendo and direct accusation presented as a petty tyrant, a homosexual, a willful breaker of the law, a blackmailer of presidents and members of congress, a bigot, a racist, an incompetent bumbler.

My friends, if we believed what ABC and NBC said about our director and about us we should be meeting secretively and underground, wearing masks and swearing to false identities, something these networks apparently welcome in interviews with their masked and anonymous sources in Central America.

Surely this past decade will live in infamy as the time when faithful, competent defenders of the public safety were persecuted for following orders, for their efforts to penetrate the secrets of a terrorist organization.

I do not know what inspired these assaults. I have no way of judging motives. For I was trained to deal with facts and to base my conclusions on the facts available.

And I must sadly conclude that in the past ten years the efforts to discredit law enforcement and, particularly, to destroy the reputation of J. Edgar Hoover have served the interest of those who would destroy this Republic and enslave the American people.

If it was a sin to serve in the FBI, to follow the instructions of the director, to attempt to apprehend the real wrongdoers, and to prosecute the criminal syndicates, then I am an unrepentant sinner.

The media, print and electronic, sanctimoniously maintain their mission is to hold up a mirror so that society may see itself. If this be their aim, then I must say their mirrors are like the bent and crooked glasses in a funhouse, dedicated to distortion.

I am proud and pleased to report that in the Congress of the United States these distortions have not gone unchallenged. In the House of Representatives, where I now serve this nation, H.R. 3142, the Federal Tort Claims Reform, which I co-sponsored will, in my opinion, rule out any repetition of the charges and allowing the prosecution of Mark Feldt, Edward Miller and Pat Gray. (This bill is now in committee and I am confident it will eventually be reported out and adopted).

I am co-sponsoring 11 measures to correct some of the evils which have threatened the existence of the Republic. There is not space here to itemize each of these pieces of legislation but all of them taken together represent a return to sanity. And in my opinion such a return is long overdue. Three of these measures—the Control Substance Robbery Act, the Federal Anti-Tampering Act and a bill to close loopholes and increase penalties against child pornography—have been passed by the House.

On March 26, President Ronald Reagan conferred the Medal of Freedom posthumously on Whitaker Chambers, which took a lot of guts for the President in a political year to tell the story the way it is. He recognized Whitaker Chambers' act on behalf of our country in identifying espionage by the Soviets against the U.S. Chambers provided contrivable evidence to uncover espionage despite efforts to denounce him.

The Weathermen, for so long the darlings of the liberal press and the liberal academic community, were but prologue to the growing terrorist threat throughout the world.

I do not remember the character who popularized the phrase "you ain't seen nothing yet," but in my considered opinion the evidence of increased terrorism in the United States gives new meaning to that phrase "You ain't seen nothing yet."

But then I guess we have seen something, for we have seen the White House now guarded by concrete barriers. There are more guards and new devices on Capitol Hill.

The tragedy is that in a free society, and may we continue to be that, the law is virtually helpless to protect the citizen from the dedicated terrorist: the suicide driver of that bomb truck in Lebanon; the fanatic assassins in Western Europe.

The almost successful attempt on the life of President Reagan.

All these suggest that unless we greatly strengthen the power of the intelligence-gathering and law enforcement agencies in the United States, the future will be continually darkened by successful acts of terrorism.

I was in Los Angeles a few weeks ago, where all of the enforcement agencies involved were gathered to consider how terrorism at the Olympic Games can be prevented.

I slip back in memory to that moment in 1942 when eight Nazi saboteurs were landed on our shores by submarine.

You will remember the ABC news report used this as an exhibit to promote the notion that the FBI was a bumbling bunch of bureaucrats unable to stop the entrance of the saboteurs.

In a letter to The Arizona Republic by Dr. William Helm, M.D., who is now a Phoenix neurological surgeon and a former agent of the FBI, Helm states "that a number of FBI agents, including myself, arrested Herbert Hoff and Herman Neubauer on June 27, 1942, and the other six saboteurs were arrested by Bureau agents in the East."

Thanks to the politicians and the media, the Bureau is not now in a position to identify and apprehend potential terrorists. And where the politicians have not prevailed in shackling the Bureau, the courts have.

In late January the FBI managed to have video tape recorders and cameras photographing the illegal activities of four members of the FALN in Chicago. These terrorists were making bombs and assembling weapons. But after their arrest a Chicago U.S. District Judge, George N. Leighton, banned the use of the video tapes on the grounds that they were unreasonable search and seizure. Judge Leighton said "the home is a sacred place in this country."

Indeed it is, judge, so long as it is a shelter for law abiding peaceful citizens. When it becomes a laboratory for the preparation of bombs and weapons, it is ridiculous to claim the home privacy protection.

The courts, no less than the Congress, have contributed to the immunity which now surrounds the active terrorists in this nation.

To complain about a condition without proposing a remedy is an exercise in futility. What then is the remedy? The remedy, my friends, is to speak up. For you have special understandings of this terror which threatens us all. Speak out at public meetings. Seek a forum where your voice can be heard. Recite the dismal facts.

Write letters to your congressmen—after all Congress is the government of all of the U.S., they must listen to citizens. Write letters to your newspapers. Talk to your neighbors in the barber shop and at the corner grocery store, and in the tavern, and at your work place.

Enlist again in the cause you have always served.

It is told that Chou En-lai once declared "give me two men in a village and I will take that village."

Long ago we were warned that all that is necessary for evil to triumph is for good men to do nothing. Knowing what we know—being who we are—we dare not now keep silent.

There is a saying: the majority is inevitably inspired by the vocal minority.

In this hour of danger we can be the vocal minority. Will we? Will we speak up? Will we make the peril known? Or will we after this pleasant reunion return to our familiar ways and keep silent?

I thank you.●

THE 30TH ANNIVERSARY OF DORIE MILLER COOPERATORS COUNCIL

HON. GARY L. ACKERMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring the 30th anniversary of the Dorie Miller Cooperators Council to the attention of the Congress. This festive occasion will be celebrated on Friday evening, May 4.

The Dorie Miller Cooperative, a 300-family residential complex, was founded in 1953 and is one of the premier housing developments in the city of New York. For 30 years, the Cooperators Council has been dedicated to the stability and enhancement of its Corona, Queens, community and the surrounding area.

In its three decades, this exemplary organization has run numerous programs of great benefit to the families of Dorie Miller. The council's efforts have secured quiet indoor recreation areas in each of the six buildings in the cooperative; the council's active playground committee insures that the youngsters, too, have room to play. The council has also supervised summertime activities, to keep the community's children safe and constructively occupied when school is out.

In addition, the families of the Dorie Miller Cooperative have demonstrated their commitment to helping those individuals who are less fortunate than themselves. The council has been a frequent contributor to numerous local charitable activities, and has actively participated in community projects to assist the people and neighborhoods of Queens.

Mr. Speaker, the Dorie Miller Cooperators Council helps its community and membership maintain a vibrant and healthy environment, and sets an example for other organizations to emulate. I ask that the Members of the Congress of the United States join me in congratulating the Dorie Miller Cooperators Council; John Henry Jones, president; Robert J. Wonson, vice president; Adele Fields, secretary; Wilbur J. Edwards, treasurer; and all the families of the Dorie Miller Cooperative.●

CHILD NUTRITION AMENDMENTS OF 1984

HON. JOHN N. ERLENBORN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. ERLENBORN. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing the administration's Child Nutrition Amendments of 1984.

This bill is designed to streamline programs, simplify administrative requirements and procedures, contain escalating costs, and increase State flexibility in operating programs authorized by the National School Lunch and Child Nutrition Acts.

Among the major provisions incorporated in this measure are:

Reauthorization of the expiring supplemental food program for women, infants, and children (WIC), the State administrative expenses authority, and the commodity distribution program for 1 year, or through September 30, 1985;

Termination of the summer food service program for children and the child care food program, and in lieu thereof, authorization of nonschool food program grant, affording States greater flexibility in developing programs tailored to meet the nutrition needs of the low-income children in nonschool settings;

Termination of the nutrition education and training (NET) program which has served well its original purpose;

Allocation of up to $3 million annually in State administrative expense funds to assist States in defraying costs incurred in the verification of food stamp household eligibility for free school lunches and breakfasts;

Modification of the State administrative expenses authority to preclude States from retaining unobligated funds in excess of foreseeable needs;

Reduction of WIC program State and local administrative cost allowances from 20 to 18 percent of total program funds provided, thereby encouraging greater operational efficiency;

Establishment of an independent special assistance payment for reduced-price lunches and breakfasts insuring that subsequent adjustments in the reduced-price reimbursement levels more accurately reflect changes in the Consumer Price Index for food away from home; and

Elimination of direct Federal administration of child nutrition programs in States which do not now administer these programs through their own agencies.

I have certain reservations as to the impact that the requirement for State administration of all child nutrition programs will have in those States which may have constitutional prohibitions against State agency administration of programs operating in private schools and institutions.

On balance, however, I believe that the Child Nutrition Amendments of 1984 contain a number of sound child nutrition policy changes which should be given serious consideration and acted upon favorably during this Congress.●

CHILD PASSENGER SAFETY SEAT INCENTIVE GRANTS

HON. WILLIAM F. GOODLING

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Speaker, I rise to urge the Senate to act swiftly on legislation passed recently by the House under suspension of the rules—legislation addressing an important area of highway safety and of which I am proud to be an original cosponsor.

The fact that automobile crashes are the leading cause of death for American children is frightening. Each year, approximately 900 children under the age of 5 are killed while riding in passenger vehicles. In fact, more children are killed or crippled as a result of motor vehicle accidents than by the combined total of all the diseases for which they now are routinely immunized. Most of those deaths and injuries could be avoided if parents only would take the time to buckle their children properly into a proper child restraint device (CRD).

CRD's, which include booster seats, padded shells, or safety harnesses, have been available for some 50 years. Only in the past 10 to 15 years, however, has the full safety potential of CRD's been realized, with 43 States and the District of Columbia having enacted laws mandating their use. This is a tremendous step in the right direction; however, the misuse of CRD's is a significant and widespread problem resulting in unnecessary deaths and injuries.

National surveys show that only about one-half of the Nation's children under 5 years of age are secured by child restraints, and that over 70 percent of these seats are used incorrectly. In the opinion of highway safety experts, the effectiveness of child passenger safety laws would increase dramatically were they to be complemented by comprehensive support programs at the State level.

In recognition of this situation, House Public Works and Transportation leaders and other concerned Members drafted H.R. 4616, legislation which would require States to use 8 percent of their highway safety apportionments for developing and implementing comprehensive child restraint programs under guidelines to be established by the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration. I want to commend Chairman JIM HOWARD and his staff for having brought together the ideas of several House Members on this matter, as well as Surface Transportation Subcommittee Chairman GLENN ANDERSON and ranking minority member BUD SHUSTER for having considered this issue when they held hearings on an array of vital highway safety matters last February.

Being an original cosponsor of this legislation, I would like to point out to Members on my side of the aisle that Transportation Secretary Elizabeth Hanford Dole firmly believes that States should indeed spend an appropriate percentage of their section 402 funds on child restraint programs, although she has not personally endorsed the authorization levels established in this bill.

Under this legislation, a portion of each State's section 402 highway funding would be earmarked for child passenger seat distribution, enforcement, public information, and education programs—all of which are vital if we are to improve and increase overall usage rates of CRD's nationwide.

Toward these ends, H.R. 4616 first and foremost addresses the need for State distribution programs and backs this up with a financial commitment. CRD's in their various configurations cost from approximately $25 to $100. This cost simply is unaffordable for the disadvantaged and is a key reason for parents failing to use CRD's. To aid those who cannot afford the availability of child safety seats, CRD rental programs have been established throughout the country. These safety seat loan programs, established by hospitals, community groups, and public agencies, encourage safety seat use by making them widely available at a nominal cost while providing parents and motorists with an accurate understanding of the need for a proper use of a CRD. These existing programs can be expanded and improved with innovative approaches determined by NHTSA with the funding provided.

Comprehensive programs as envisioned in this legislation also could make section 402 funds available for State law enforcement training programs, which highway safety experts insist are necessary in order to increase the role of highway troopers in insuring that more child safety seats are used on the roadways—and used properly. Law enforcement officials are in a unique position to spot seats being used incorrectly and inform motorists on the proper use of these devices. By participating in training programs conducted by local pediatricians, troopers could better serve as child safety seat advocates.

Finally, H.R. 4616 recognizes the need for information campaigns and education programs. Experience from public campaigns such as the anti-smoking effort indicates that well designed and orchestrated media campaigns can contribute significantly to changes in public attitudes and behavior. Such programs could promote child safety awareness among a broad cross-section of Americans, including parents, the purchasers and users of these devices, and importantly, the "under-fives"—the children riding in CRD's. Teaching children from an early age the importance of riding in a car seat will result, it is hoped, in youngsters automatically "buckling up" seatbelts when they grow older.

Likewise, educational programs which are more comprehensive in scope and targeted to smaller, individual groups would further increase public awareness of child passenger safety and might be funded by this legislation. These might consist of brochures, pamphlets, films, posters, bumper stickers, and seminars. And, conceivably, existing programs developed at hospitals, community and civic organizations, and State public health and safety agencies which have been dissolved for financial purposes could be resurrected by funding from this legislation.

I want to protect our future—our most precious natural resource—from senseless mortality rates and from crippling injuries, and thus I support incentive grants to the States for child passenger safety programs. While child passenger safety seat laws are appropriately enacted at the State level, no one can dispute the fact that automobile fatalities and injuries are a national epidemic. With incentive grants as envisioned in this legislation, we can improve and increase the proper use of CRD's in those States which already have these laws—while, at the same time, encouraging the remainder to enact such statutes promptly.●

DUKE ELLINGTON MONTH

HON. JOSEPH P. ADDABBO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, May 4, York College and the Black American Heritage Society will hold a brief ceremony commemorating Duke Ellington Month.

Duke Ellington was one of the finest musicians that ever lived. Fine musicians are unique breed of mankind. They have the ability to reach out and communicate to so many different people.

As I grew up studying the piano, I emulated Duke Ellington. Because what he could do in a few notes was to reach out and touch men from every land. While critics say that the Duke made the most pervasive contribution to the development of jazz in the United States, I believe his contribution was to mankind. Through his development of the language of music, mankind was elevated and elated.

Remembering Duke Ellington is easy, remembering that he introduced the wordless voice as a jazz instrument or put together compositions from miniature concerto's is not that difficult either. What is difficult is searching and striving as the Duke did all his life to find new ways of sensitizing ourselves to our fellow man. By doing this, we not only insure that Duke's contributions are remembered, we guarantee that they are advanced for the future generations of mankind.●

CANTOR BERMAN HONORED ON GOLDEN JUBILEE

HON. FRANK J. GUARINI

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. GUARINI. Mr. Speaker, on May 6, 1984 Temple Beth-El, of Jersey City, will honor its cantor, Abraham Berman, who has served the congregation without interruption for the past 50 years.

According to Rabbi Samuel A. Berman, D.D., and members of the congregation, this unique achievement is unparalleled in any synagogue in the United States and perhaps the world.

Temple Beth-El has enjoyed the leadership of my dear friend, Rabbi Berman and many outstanding community leaders including Morris Pesin, Raymond Chasen, George Clott, the Honorable Benjamin Chodash, Leonard Casner, Judge Alan Horowitz, Norman Roth, Josephine Taube, Matthew Weisenfeld, and Sadie and Isi-dore Hornstein and others who are currently active.

Many of its members over the years have led our community in the areas of education, law, medicine, business and cultural affairs.

I have been fortunate to have the input of Milton Gottlieb, a dedicated member of Temple Beth-El, who has provided important information about Temple Beth-El and this golden anniversary tribute.

It will be my privilege to present to Cantor Berman a framed copy of these remarks from today's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for his family use.

Temple Beth-El has received wide acclaim in recent years for its innovative ideas and leadership in civic affairs. Only last year, it received national recognition by creating its own Statue of Liberty-Ellis Island fund as part of the national effort to rehabilitate our two most famous shrines. It set an example for other religious institutions throughout the country by raising thousands of dollars for the fund in honor of one of its members, Morris Pesin. This year, for the first time in its 120-year history, it elected a woman, Blanche Dohrman, to serve as president of its congregation thereby recognizing the important role that women play in the religious life of the community.

Abraham Berman became cantor of Temple Beth-El in 1934. Three years later, the present rabbi, Samuel A. Berman (no relation to Cantor Berman) was engaged by the congregation, and the two have been close friends ever since.

The golden anniversary celebration of Cantor Berman's affiliation with Temple Beth-El will be a 3-day event culminating in a ceremony on Sunday, May 6 in which a bas relief of the cantor, fashioned by the world famous sculptor, Nathan Rapoport, will be unveiled. Nathan Rapoport is renowned for his sculptures in parks and museums in many cities throughout the world, having just completed a 15-foot statute exemplifying the liberation of Europe from Nazi oppression by the American soldier, which will be placed in Jersey City's Liberty State Park.

The principal speaker at the ceremonies will be Gov. Thomas H. Kean, of New Jersey, and a proclamation will be read by Mayor Gerald McCann of Jersey City, in recognition of the extraordinary service rendered by Cantor Berman to his congregation and the community of Jersey City.

The importance of the cantor to the synagogue, the integral part of the Jewish community, deserves a brief discussion. In the years of the ghettos, there were no social outlets for Jews, no places of entertainment insofar as music, drama, or the arts were concerned. As a result, the yearning to express themselves artistically remained unsatisfied. The community, therefore, demanded that the cantor fulfill these longings and perform a dual role; that of "Hazzan" catering to the religious needs, and that of entertainer satisfying the need for relaxation and artistic expression. He sang for the sake of the song. However, cantorial music did not destroy the liturgical purposes, and yet music had its own reason for existence.

Today, the cantor in the modern synagogue bears the responsibility of stimulating devotion to Judaism. He is invested with the honor of leading the service and officiating on behalf of the entire congregation. In the words of the Concise Code of Jewish Law:

> The one designated to lead the congregation in prayer must be a worthy person. He should be one who has a good reputation and is not known as a transgressor, even as a youth. He should be modest and agreeable to the congregation. His voice should be pleasant, melodious and pleasing. He should, of course, be conversant with the prayers and the order of the service.

Abraham Berman more than satisfies these criteria that are the hallmark of the ideal cantor. He is a graduate of the Rabbi Jacob Joseph Yeshiva in New York City. He received bachelor degrees from City College of New York and Brooklyn Law School, and is a member of the New York Bar. He laid the foundation of his love for music at Columbia University after which he arranged and orchestrated Israeli and Yiddish folk songs for a variety of radio programs. He organized a gala musical commemorative broadcast in observance of the centenary of the birth of Abraham Goldfaden, father of the Yiddish musical theater. This multitalented man served as choral director for the most celebrated cantors of this era from foreign countries as well as the United States. And throughout his career, he has been the musical voice of his beloved Temple Beth-El in faith, prayer, and hope.

Cantor Berman has been honored by the dedication of a nursing facility in his name in the Jewish Hospital and Rehabilitation Center of New Jersey, and on display in its main lobby is a valuable collection of Judaica which he donated.

In June 1980, he was the guest of honor at a testimonial breakfast in recognition of his dedication to the Jewish community and the State of Israel.

I have visited Jersey City Temple Beth-El on many occasions. Indeed it is an important anchor in our society, constantly reiterating the importance of family living and happy home life, where character is built, where sacrifices are made, and where love has taken residence.

Every time I visit Temple Beth-El I am reminded of our first President George Washington's speech before the first synagogue in Newport, R.I., in 1790 where he spoke out against bigotry:

> Happily the government of the United States gives to bigotry, no sanction. To persecution, no assistance.

Washington's wish that:

> The children of the stock of Abraham who dwell in this land continue to merit and enjoy the good will of the other inhabitants while everyone shall sit in safety under his own vine and fig tree and there shall be none to make him afraid. May the Father of all mercies scatter light and not darkness in our paths . . .

Cantor Abraham Berman indeed has been a tree in our lifetimes, growing upward to the heavens providing shade and shelter to many of us and by being an excellent servant of both God and man.

Indeed many of the thousands of individuals he has touched have gone to the four corners of the world, exercising leadership roles. They have been woven deeply into the fabric of America. Their contributions are reflected in the famous words of Rabbi Abba Hillel Silver:

> God built him a continent of glory, and filled it with treasures untold. He studded it with sweet-flowing fountains, and traced it with long-winding streams. He carpeted it with soft-rolling prairies, and columned it with thundering mountains. He graced it with deep-shadowed forests, and filled them with song.
> Then He called unto a thousand peoples, and summoned the bravest among them. They came from the ends of the earth, each bearing a gift and a hope. The glow of adventure was in their eyes, and in their hearts the glory of hope.
>
> And out of the bounty of earth, and the labor of men; out of the longing of heart, and the prayer of souls; out of the memory of ages, and the hopes of the world, God fashioned a nation in love, and blessed it with purpose sublime.
> And they called it America.

I am sure that my colleagues here in the House of Representatives join me in this tribute to Cantor Berman for a job well done.●

NEW POLL ON NORTHERN IRELAND SHOWS LITTLE SUPPORT BY BRITISH PEOPLE FOR POLICY

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the bipartisan 104-member Ad Hoc Congressional Committee for Irish Affairs, I wish to place into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article from the April 20, 1984, Irish Echo newspaper entitled "Three of Four Londoners Favor a United Ireland."

The article discusses the findings of a recent poll conducted by an independent radio station in London—LBC. The poll asked its listeners the question "should Northern Ireland remain part of the United Kingdom?" This was the main question asked and out of some 7,000 who responded, 84 percent said no.

This is not the first poll of this type that I have seen. It causes me to wonder how and why the British Government continues to conduct their present direct rule policies over the north of Ireland when there is so much popular opposition. In addition, the costs of their policy is economically staggering—estimates point to a cost of more than $1.5 billion a year.

I have long contended that the most significant catalyst for a political solution in Northern Ireland would be for the British Government to declare its intention to commence a phased and orderly withdrawal of their entire presence from Northern Ireland. Once this process began, all sides to the conflict could begin to conduct discussions on the new Northern Ireland. Then the United States together with other concerned nations should develop an economic aid program for the north.

It is said that those of us in political life in America read and study polls very carefully. I am hopeful that the same practice occurs in the United Kingdom and that this particular poll is given very serious consideration.

The article follows immediately:

THREE OF FOUR LONDONERS FAVOR A UNITED IRELAND

LONDON.—Less than two in every ten Londoners believe that Northern Ireland should remain in the United Kingdom, according to a survey conducted by an independent radio station, LBC.

Almost three in every four people in London think that the North should become part of the Republic, and fewer than one in every four think that Northern Ireland should become an independent state, the same survey found.

The vast majority of voters (6,791) responded during the first 24 hours of the survey, when the question was: "Should Northern Ireland remain part of the United Kingdom?" The overwhelming majority—84 percent—voted No and the remaining 16 percent voted Yes.

Voting on the two remaining questions was confined to two two-hour periods on the succeeding days. The first of these questions was: "Should Northern Ireland become part of the Irish Republic?" Of the 1,229 people who responded, 72 percent voted Yes and the remaining 28 percent voted No.

The final question was: "Should Northern Ireland become an independent state?" It attracted the smallest number of replies—884 during the two-hour period. Only 24 percent of these voted Yes and the remaining 76 percent voted No.●

THE CORONA-EAST ELMHURST BRANCH CELEBRATES 75TH ANNIVERSARY OF NAACP

HON. GARY L. ACKERMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, the Corona-East Elmhurst branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People will celebrate the 75th anniversary of the founding of the NAACP. This diamond jubilee will be held in the First Baptist Church of East Elmhurst, Queens, on Sunday, May 6.

The NAACP was founded in 1909 in New York City to "achieve equal rights through the democratic process and eliminate racial prejudice for all American citizens * * *," and quickly became an influential force for social justice. The NAACP is the oldest civil rights organization in the United States, and has consistently worked to achieve equality of opportunity for all Americans. As an active participant in the historic Supreme Court case Brown against Board of Education, the NAACP helped to end legal segregation in education.

The Corona-East Elmhurst branch of the NAACP has served the Queens community for 35 years. Its current president, Harry T. Stewart, also served as its first president in 1949. This active and important branch and its 600 members have provided day care facilities for working parents since 1972 at the Malcolm X Day Care Center in Corona. The Corona-East Elmhurst chapter has led the fight for community rights and neighborhood concerns. This branch also monitors local civil rights cases so that it may help to defend victims of discrimination.

Mr. Speaker, the Corona-East Elmhurst branch of the NAACP helps its community and membership maintain a vibrant and healthy environment, and sets an example for other organizations to emulate. I ask that the Members of the Congress of the United States join me in congratulating President Harry T. Stewart and the many members of this fine organization.●

WALL STREET JOURNAL PUBLISHES LETTER OF MAJORITY LEADER JIM WRIGHT

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, the Wall Street Journal yesterday published a letter from our distinguished majority leader, JIM WRIGHT, in response to the Journal's editorial about an earlier letter from him and a number of other Members of Congress to the Nicaraguan Government.

I wish to call this excellent letter to the attention of my colleagues in the House. The issue of Central America is a critical matter on which the Congress will be required to take a number of actions this session. Our majority leader's views are thoughtful and reasoned; they deserve our careful consideration.

As his letter concludes:

Change is coming to Latin America. We cannot prevent that. We should not try. We can help to shape the direction of that change by patience, by understanding, by deeds of good will, by a steady long-term commitment to peaceful cooperation.

The tone and direction of his letter provides a good point of departure for the decisions we in the Congress face.

THE EPISTLE TO THE SANDINISTAS

Your editorial of April 17 ("Dear Comandante") questions my motives, and those of Senator Moynihan, regarding Central America. The editorial accuses us of "posturing," of "hypocrisy," of crass political pandering, of lacking courage. Harsh indictments, indeed.

While I certainly do not object to being linked with Pat Moynihan, I will not attempt to speak for him. Anybody who knows the Senator from New York is aware he can speak quite adequately in his own behalf.

The basic charge against me is that I signed, with nine others, a letter to Daniel Ortega, head of the Nicaraguan governing junta. The thrust of that letter is not that we are satisfied with Nicaragua's scheduling of elections and its promise to lessen press censorship and allow greater freedom of assembly. The point of the letter is that these steps, while commendable, are not enough. Quoting from the letter: "We write with the hope that the initial steps you have taken will be followed by others designed to guarantee a fully open and democratic electoral process."

It was in the hope of encouraging a truly free and fair election and with it a fundamental change in the direction of Nicaraguan policy that we wrote the letter of March 20. That hope may be naive, but surely worthy of an effort.

Your editorialist saw a basic inconsistency between this effort and my support for the electoral process and the freely elected government in El Salvador. If we truly believe in political decisions by ballot rather than by bullet, then my position is consistent. It upholds that principle in both countries.

The two elections in El Salvador, which I have observed at first hand, convince me that the people of that country deeply desire and richly deserve a democratic government. We must support their right to sustain one. We are committed to do so by the Rio Treaty. We are pledged to respect and help protect the rights of local non-violent self-determination.

By the same logic, as we assist Salvadorans to defend the integrity of their institutions against externally supported terrorism, how shall we defend financing and directing external terrorism against the government of Nicaragua? It is a poor rule that doesn't work both ways. Is ours a policy of principle or of expediency?

There is much to criticize in the behavior of the Sandinistas. I have found fault with many of their policies. But we may not dictate their form of society. To attempt to do so is counterproductive. It breeds resentment. Financing terrorist attacks against that country merely feeds the fires of nationalistic resistance. It inflates the bogey man of "U.S. imperialism" and inflames the public against our country.

To foreclose all possibility of a peaceful reconciliation with Nicaragua would be to narrow our choices to two; the permanence of a hostile Marxist state in Central America, or the need to overthrow it by force of arms. To settle for either of those alternatives is to admit to a failed policy, bankrupt of creative ideas.

Our relations with Central America are vital. No other region is more important to our national future. The challenge is for patience and consistency. We must be willing to deal with Latin Americans as partners, not subordinates. Too often we've acted like a fire department. We ignore all of Central America until trouble erupts. We rush down to put out the fire, then return to a posture of benign indifference, distracted by other concerns.

That policy won't work anymore. Change is coming in Latin America. We cannot prevent that. We should not try. We can help to shape the direction of that change by patience, by understanding, by deeds of good will, by a steady long-term commitment to peaceful cooperation.

JIM WRIGHT,
Majority Leader,
House of Representatives.●

LAND REFORM IN EL SALVADOR

HON. MAJOR R. OWENS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, on January 25, 1984, the Secretary of State issued yet another report on land reform in El Salvador. Although the report indicates that there are some problems with land reform, it does not focus on the source of the problems or on the extent of the misery which exists as a result of Government impediments to land reform.

The basic plan for land reform in El Salvador is to provide a mechanism for the farmers who work the land to purchase the land as individuals or as members of cooperatives. In order for the farmers to plant crops, earn a living, and begin to pay for the land, credit is necessary to put in seed and fertilizer. The farmers must rely upon the Government banks for this credit. As a practical matter, the credit must arrive in time to get the crop in. This has not occurred, leading to reduced crops.

The second problem which the farmers face is how to sell the crop. According to those who have investigated the situation, the farmers say that they are required to sell their crops to the Government at low prices and that the Government resells the crop at higher prices. If one assumes that it is necessary for the Government to purchase all crops because of the breakdown in the marketing system, it does not follow that it is necessary for the Government to depress prices and leave the farmers with so little income that they are worse off than they were with the landlords.

It is clear that the farmers of El Salvador must become organized so that they can exercise sufficient control over the credit, production, and marketing needed to realize reasonable profit from their work. Organization efforts have been hindered, the farmers say, because the Government forbids them to speak with organizers from the United States and other parts of Latin America. One can suggest that the farmers might well ignore such directives, but one must remember that they live in a land where death through Government violence is all too common and they would be foolhardy to ignore this ever-present danger.

Where does this leave many of the farmers on the issue of land reform? They look to the conditions of their lives, the hunger of their families, and wish for the old days of the landlords when they had higher incomes and when the living conditions were somewhat better. From the perspective of an individual who is hungrier than he was before, the experiment has failed.

The overall situation in El Salvador is such that agricultural production has fallen by 8.1 percent since the beginning of land reform. The drop in export crops has been 1.6 percent. These realities make it clear that there is less food available for local consumption. The farmer is paying the price of hunger for this decline. Those who are responsible for the basis of this debacle, the tardy credit, and the lack of a nongovernmental marketing system, are not the farmers who are hungry.

What can the United States do to correct this situation? First of all we can stop approving a land-reform process which has so many built-in causes for failure. The point of land reform was to improve the standard of living for the farmers and not allow the Government to manipulate the system so that the reform measures would fail. Counting the farmers who are involved in land reform is no subsitute for looking at how the system is working. When the Secretary of State certifies that the Government has done nothing to alter, suspend, or terminate land reform, it seems a bit cynical to ignore whether or not the Government has managed the process in such a way as to effectively lower the standard of living of the farmers and create untold suffering.

The people of El Salvador will endure this latest hardship. Poverty will continue and people will become more and more distrusting of their neighbor to the north who is, in part, the author of their misery. This pattern must cease if our goal is to nurture fragile democracies through their infancy. One of the best ways to nurture the beginnings of a democracy is to support economic justice and to improve the standard of living for all of the people. We are not succeeding in doing this in El Salvador.●

A TRIBUTE TO JAMES M. HULSE

HON. ROY DYSON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. DYSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to James M. Hulse, a man of noteworthy distinction whose quest for peace and human rights spans almost 30 years and several continents. This week James Hulse will be honored for what President Dwight Eisenhower once described as impossible, earning three Combat Infantry Badges.

Combat Infantry Badges are awarded to servicemen who served in an infantry unit under actual combat conditions. Infantrymen can earn only one of these badges in each war. For his courage on the front lines during a 27-year military career that included World War II, the Korean war, and the Vietnam conflict, Hulse earned three Combat Infantry Badges.

James Hulse and 214 other servicemen who are the sole recipients of three Combat Infantry Badges will be honored in a special ceremony on Friday, May 4, at Headquarters U.S. Infantry Center at Fort Benning, GA. A plaque bearing the names of the triple badge holders will be unveiled at the cermony expected to be attended by 130 of the recipients and their families. The plaque will later be placed in the National Infantry Museum at Fort Benning.

Jim Hulse joined the Army following the attack on Pearl Harbor at the age of 20. His duties as a rifleman in World War II took him to North Africa, Italy, Sicily, Normandy, Holland, and Berlin. Though his paratrooper unit was under enemy fire for 367 days in 39 months, this great patriot was not wounded and returned home.

He was seriously wounded in the Korean war while a member of the 187th Airborne Brigade. A third of his unit died trying to capture one hill. Hulse made it to the top of the hill, but Chinese artillery wounded him and killed his friend. Peace was declared while he recuperated in a Japanese hospital.

James Hulse retired in 1964 but was called back in 1966 to join the Army's Special Forces, known as the Green Berets, in Vietnam. He made three tours of duty in Vietnam and was shot down twice in helicopters. He survived, though, and retired for good in 1970 when he was sent home with pneumonia.

James Hulse serves as an inspiration to all who believe in the strength of the human spirit and the benefits of a free society. On behalf of all who have benefited from his dedication and perseverance, I would like to commend James for his accomplishments and wish him a healthy and rewarding future.●

PRESIDENT REAGAN'S NEW DIRECTIVE AGAINST TERRORISM MOST WELCOMED

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I bring to attention of my colleagues the following editorial from the Santa Barbara News Press, dated Wednesday, April 18, 1984. The editorial praises President Reagan's new directive to implement a tough antiterrorism package.

We are all aware of the increasing use of terrorism by various religious and political factions across the globe. And, as can be witnessed in the recent terrorist bombing attacks against the U.S. Embassy in Beirut, followed by the truck-bomb attack on our Marines Headquarters also in Beirut, the United States is a prime target for such attacks. The President's decision is "a welcome commitment of American resources" against these fanatical groups and individuals."

I recommend this editorial to all my colleagues.

WAR ON TERRORISM

The United States has been a long time coming to the recognition that terrorism is a form of warfare to be prepared for and defended against as systematically as any more traditional call to battle. The tough new anti-terrorism policy signed this month by President Reagan is a welcome commitment of American resources to guard U.S. interest and values against increasing terrorist attacks launched against democracy abroad and at home. The United States will go on the offensive with this policy, striving to identify potential terrorist attacks and stop them before they occur.

U.S. officials don't delude themselves about the difficulty of sniffing out would-be attackers before they explode the bomb or kidnap the targeted diplomat; terrorists operate in small groups dedicated to secrecy and hard to infiltrate. But the alarming growth in attacks against American property and people demands a more active response than simply wondering—always afterward—whether and how the United States should strike back.

In the last decade, nearly 39 percent of some 6,500 terrorist attacks worldwide were directed against U.S. citizens or property. In the last five years, attacks on persons rather than property increased by 30 percent. In 1983 and this year, terrorist attacks on Americans have mounted monthly, in a rash of bombings, murders and kidnappings in the Middle East and in the United States.

Such attacks are apparently being planned, directed and financed by foreign governments, among them Libya, Syria, Iran, North Korea and Cuba.

Against such concerted global "warfare," the United States will now fight back with increased collection of intelligence data, reinforced security for potential American targets, specially trained antiterrorist squads, and a policy that holds nations that sponsor terrorism accountable through public exposure and the threat of military, paramilitary, political, economic or other action.

A package of proposed legislation submitted to Congress by the administration would provide for much of the anti-terrorist strategies. Most needed is high-level support for the nation's intelligence and law enforcement agencies. One proposed law would permit payment of huge awards for good information on terrorists. Using knowledge aforehand to prevent violence makes the best kind of business sense, and an excellent use of American resources against the war on democracy.●

THE NOT SO INVISIBLE POOR

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, the Ways and Means Subcommittee on Public Assistance and Unemployment Compensation held hearings today on a recent GAO report, which studied how the Reagan administration's budget cuts affected individuals receiving AFDC benefits. According to GAO, approximately 493,000 fewer families are receiving AFDC as a result of those cuts.

This tragic result is only a small segment of the Administration's overall design to eliminate the Government's responsibility for providing some economic security for poor Americans. The changes in AFDC have hit women who work particularly hard and left many, who continued to work, in worse financial shape due to lost eligibility for AFDC, food stamps, and medicaid.

This body recently took steps to ameliorate this problem, however. The budget reconciliation bill, recently adopted by the House, included a series of amendments to the AFDC program. These changes would assure these families of minimum AFDC coverage and the medicaid benefits they sorely need.

Concern for the plight of those in poverty is shared by a large segment of the American population and not just policymakers in Washington. Several major newspapers have editorialized about the cruel thud of poverty and its debilitating effects on those who have slipped through the Reagan administration's oft referred to and seldom seen social safety net. I especially would like to share recent editorials from the Atlanta Constitution, the Boston Globe, and the Washington Post with my colleagues at this time.

[From the Boston Globe, Apr. 3, 1984]

THE THUD OF POVERTY

One of the great successes of conservatives generally and the Reagan Administration in particular has been to capture the high ground on the issue of welfare, to successfully characterize welfare as an unmitigated evil, a program through which parasites feed off the rest of society. According to this view, any initiative that reduces welfare payments is an unalloyed good.

Thus one can reasonably expect President Reagan to begin touting the results of a new study by the General Accounting Office on the impact of welfare cuts initiated at his urging in 1981.

That study, based on a survey in five cities, found that the cuts in welfare programs for the working poor have reduced welfare payments to that group by more than 9 percent; that those affected have not quit work to reestablish welfare eligibility; that, in fact, they have increased their working hours slightly and that their earnings have thus increased.

Who could object to a welfare cut that produced these results? Those who read no further in the GAO study.

What the study found, in fact, was that despite the increased work effort by those whose benefits were reduced in 1981 and despite their increase in actual earnings, many of them are economically much worse off than they were in 1981 and many of them are now living in poverty. Their increased earnings have been more than offset by the decreases in welfare benefits and by the loss of such supplemental benefits as food stamps.

What the study does show, contrary to much of Reagan's rhetoric, is that welfare recipients—at least the working poor affected by the 1981 cuts—are not interested in a free lunch; are willing to work and want to work; and do not deliberately take steps that make them eligible for welfare but, in fact, endeavor as best they can to stay off the rolls.

The study illustrates that when all the rhetoric about welfare cheats and the culture of poverty is exhausted, welfare often serves its intended and beneficial purpose. It makes the social safety net work, it raises the economic floor above the poverty level and its saves Americans from the debiliating thud of impoverishment.

HIGH PRICE OF SAVING PENNIES

President Reagan's 1981 cutbacks in social programs have done exactly what he said they would: saved some money and reduced welfare caseloads. But they have done so at a devastating cost to the working poor, who have seen their chances of climbing out of poverty all but dashed.

Separate studies on the effects of the cutbacks by the General Accounting Office and by the Center for the Study of Social Policy in Washington detail the damage. It is extensive.

Despite working longer hours at higher wages than they enjoyed prior to the 1981 cuts; the working poor in five cities surveyed have experienced a substantial loss in net incomes, according to GAO, the investigative arm of Congress.

Their average monthly income dropped from $744 in Dallas to $515 and from $870 in Syracuse, N.Y. to $720. Similar patterns were found in Boston, Memphis and Milwaukee. Most have not been able to earn enough money to make up for the loss they suffered when welfare and food stamp assistance was removed.

The cutbacks have pushed more families, especially ones headed by working women, into poverty and made those who were already poor even poorer. Before 1981, the benefits had provided small but crucial assistance to people near the bottom, often just the boost the working poor needed to pull themselves up to better living standards. Timely aid helped thousands climb out of poverty.
